At peace with all the world—the personal liberty of the citizen sacredly maintained, and his rights secured under political institutions deriving all their authority from the direct sanction of the people—with a soil fertile almost beyond example, and a country blessed with every diversity of climate and production, what remains to be done in order to advance the happiness and prosperity of such a people? Under ordinary circumstances, this inquiry could readily be answered. The best that probably could be done for a people inhabiting such a country, would be to fortify their peace and security in the prosecution of their various pursuits, by guarding them against invasion from without, and violence from within. The rest, for the greater part, might be left to their own energy and enterprise. The chief embarrassments which, at the moment, exhibit themselves, have arisen from overaction; and the most difficult task which remains to be accomplished is that of correcting and overcoming its effects. Between the years 1833 and 1838, additions were made to bank capital and bank issues, in the form of notes designed for circulation, to an extent enormously great. The question seemed to be, not how the best currency could be provided, but in what manner the greatest amount of bank paper could be put in circulation. Thus, a vast amount of what was called money—since, for the time being, it answered the purposes of money—was thrown upon the country; an over-issue which was attended, as a necessary consequence, by an extravagant increase of the prices of all articles of property, the spread of a speculative mania all over the country, and has finally ended in a general indebtedness on the part of States and individuals, the prostration of public and private credit, a depreciation in the market value of real and personal estate, and has left large districts of country almost entirely without any circulating medium. In view of the fact that, in 1830, the whole bank-note circulation within the United States amounted to but $61,323,898, according to the Treasury statements, and that an addition had been made thereto of the enormous sum of $88,000,000 in seven years, (the circulation on the 1st January, 1837, being stated at $149,185,890,) aided by the great facilities afforded in obtaining loans from European capitalists, who were seized with the same speculative mania which prevailed in the United States—and the large importations of funds from abroad, the result of stock sales and loans—no one can be surprised at the apparent, but unsubstantial, state of prosperity which everywhere prevailed over the land; and while little cause of surprise should be felt at the present prostration of everything, and the ruin which has befallen so many of our fellow-citizens in the sudden withdrawal from circulation of so large an amount of bank issues since 1837—exceeding, as is believed, the amount added to the paper currency for a similar period antecedent to 1837—it ceases to be a matter of astonishment that such extensive shipwreck should have been made of private fortunes, or that difficulties should exist in meeting their engagements on the part of the debtor States. Apart from which, if there be taken into account the immense losses sustained in the dishonor of numerous banks, it is less a matter of surprise that insolvency should have visited many of our fellow-citizens, than that so many should have escaped the blighting influences of the times.

In the solemn conviction of these truths, and with an ardent desire to meet the pressing necessities of the country, I felt it to be my duty to cause to be submitted to you, at the commencement of your late session, the plan of an Exchequer; the whole power and duty of maintaining which, in purity and vigor, was to be exercised by the Representatives of the people and of the States, and, therefore, virtually by the people themselves. It was proposed to place it under the control and direction of a treasury board, to consist of three commissioners, whose duty it should be to see that the law of its creation was faithfully executed; and that the great end of supplying a paper medium of exchange, at all times convertible into gold and silver, should be attained. The board, thus constituted, was given as much permanency as could be imparted to it, without endangering the proper share of responsibility which should attach to all public agents. In order to insure all the advantages of a well-matured experience, the commissioners were to hold their offices for the respective periods of two, four, and six years; thereby securing, at all times, in the management of the Exchequer, the services of two men of experience; and to place them in a condition to exercise perfect independence of mind and action, it was provided that their removal should only take place for actual incapacity or infidelity to the trust, and to be followed by the President with an exposition of the causes of such removal, should it occur. It was proposed to establish subordinate boards in each of the States, under the same restrictions and limitations of the power of removal, which, with the central board, should receive, safely keep, and disburse the public moneys; and in order to furnish a sound paper medium of exchange, the Exchequer should retain of the revenues of the Government a sum not to exceed $5,000,000 in specie, to be set apart as required by its operations, and to pay the public creditor, at his own option, either in specie, or treasury notes of denominations not less than five, nor exceeding one hundred dollars; which notes should be redeemed at the several places of issue, and to be receivable at all times and everywhere in payment of Government dues; with a restraint upon such issue of bills, that the same should not exceed the maximum of $15,000,000. In order to guard against all the hazards incident to fluctuations in trade, the Secretary of the Treasury was invested with authority to issue $5,000,000 of Government stock, should the same at any time be regarded as necessary, in order to place beyond hazard the prompt redemption of the bills which might be thrown into circulation: thus, in fact, making the issue of $15,000,000 of exchequer bills rest substantially on $10,000,000; and keeping in circulation never more than one and one-half dollar for every dollar in specie. When to this it is added that the bills are not only everywhere receivable in Government dues, but that the Government itself would be bound for their ultimate redemption, no rational doubt can exist that the paper which the Exchequer would furnish would readily enter into general circulation, and be maintained at all times at or above par with gold and silver; thereby realizing the great want of the age, and fulfilling the wishes of the people. In order to reimburse the Government the expenses of the plan, it was proposed to invest the Exchequer with the limited authority to deal in bills of exchange, (unless prohibited by the State in which an agency might be situated,) having only thirty days to run, and resting on a fair and bona fide basis. The legislative will on this point might be so plainly announced, as to avoid all pretext for partiality or favoritism. It was furthermore proposed to invest this Treasury agent with authority to receive on deposite, to a limited amount, the specie funds of individuals, and to grant certificates therefor, to be redeemed on presentation, under the idea (which is believed to be well founded) that such certificates would come in aid of the exchequer bills in supplying a safe and ample paper circulation. Or, if in place of the contemplated dealings in exchange, the Exchequer should be authorized not only to exchange its bills for actual deposites of specie, but for specie or its equivalents to sell drafts, charging therefor a small but reasonable premium, I cannot doubt but that the benefits of the law would be speedily manifested in the revival of the credit, trade, and business of the whole country. Entertaining this opinion, it becomes my duty to urge its adoption upon Congress, by reference to the strongest considerations of the public interests, with such alterations in its details as Congress may in its wisdom see fit to make.

I am well aware that this proposed alteration and amendment of the laws establishing the Treasury Department has encountered various objections; and that, among others, it has been proclaimed a Government bank of fearful and dangerous import. It is proposed to confer upon it no extraordinary powers. It purports to do no more than pay the debts of the Government with the redeemable paper of the Government; in which respect, it accomplishes precisely what the Treasury does daily at this time—in issuing to the public creditors the treasury notes, which, under law, it is authorized to issue. It has no resemblance to an ordinary bank, as it furnishes no profits to private stockholders, and lends no capital to individuals. If it be objected to as a Government bank, and the objection be available, then should all the laws in relation to the Treasury be repealed, and the capacity of the Government to collect what is due to it, or pay what it owes, be abrogated.

This is the chief purpose of the proposed Exchequer; and surely, if, in the accomplishment of a purpose so essential, it affords a sound circulating medium to the country and facilities to trade, it should be regarded as no slight recommendation of it to public consideration. Properly guarded by the provisions of law, it can run into no dangerous evil; nor can any abuse arise under it, but such as the Legislature itself will be answerable for, if it be tolerated; since it is but the creature of the law, and is susceptible at all times of modification, amendment, or repeal, at the pleasure of Congress. I know that it has been objected that the system would be liable to be abused by the Legislature—by whom alone it cou'd be abused—in the party conflicts of the day; that such abuse would manifest itself in a change of the law, which would authorize an excessive issue of paper for the purpose of inflating prices and winning popular favor. To that it may be answered, that the ascription of such a motive to Congress is altogether gratuitous and inadmissible. The theory of our institutions would lead us to a different conclusion. But a perfect security against a proceeding so reckless, would be found to exist in the very nature of things. The political party which should be so blind to the true interests of the country as to resort to such an expedient, would inevitably meet with a final overthrow, in the fact that, the moment the paper ceased to be convertible into specie, or otherwise promptly redeemed, it would become worthless, and would, in the end, dishonor the Government, involve the people in ruin, and such political party in hopeless disgrace. At the same time, such a view involves the utter impossibility of furnishing any currency other than that of the precious metals; for, if the Government itself cannot forego the temptation of excessive paper issues, what reliance can be placed in corporations, upon whom the temptations of individual aggrandizement would most strongly operate? The people would have to blame none but themselves for any injury that might arise from a course so reckless, since their agents would be the wrongdoers, and they the passive spectators.

There can be but three kinds of public currency: 1st. Gold and silver; 2d. The paper of State institutions; or, 3d. A representative of the precious metals, provided by the General Government, or under its authority. The sub-treasury system rejected the last, in any form; and, as it was believed that no reliance could be placed on the issues of local institutions, for the purposes of general circulation, it necessarily and unavoidably adopted specie as the exclusive currency for its own use. And this must ever be the case, unless one of the other kinds be used. The choice, in the present state of public sentiment, lies between an exclusive specie currency on the one hand, and Government issues of some kind on the other. That these issues cannot be made by a chartered institution, is supposed to be conclusively settled. They must be made, then, directly by Government agents. For several years past, they have been thus made in the form of treasury notes, and have answered a valuable purpose. Their usefulness has been limited by their being transient and temporary; their ceasing to bear interest at given periods, necessarily causes their speedy return, and thus restricts their range of circulation; and being used only in the disbursements of Government, they cannot reach those points where they are most required. By rendering their use permanent, to the moderate extent already mentioned, by offering no inducement for their return, and by exchanging them for coin and other values, they will constitute, to a certain extent, the general currency so much needed to maintain the internal trade of the country. And this is the Exchequer plan, so far as it may operate in furnishing a currency.

I cannot forego the occasion to urge its importance to the credit of the Government in a financial point of view. The great necessity of resorting to every proper and becoming expedient, in order to place the treasury on a footing of the highest respectability, is entirely obvious. The credit of the Government may be regarded as the very soul of the Government itself—a principle of vitality, without which all its movements are languid, and all its operations embarrassed. In this spirit the Executive felt itself bound, by the most imperative sense of duty, to submit to Congress, at its last session, the propriety of making a specific pledge of the land fund, as the basis for the negotiation of the loans authorized to be contracted. I then thought that such an application of the public domain would, without doubt, have placed at the command of the Government ample funds to relieve the treasury from the temporary embarrassments under which it labored. American credit had suffered a considerable shock in Europe, from the large indebtedness of the States, and the temporary inability of some of them to meet the interest on their debts. The utter and disastrous prostration of the United States Bank of Pennsylvania had contributed largely to increase the sentiment of distrust, by reason of the loss and ruin sustained by the holders of its stock—a large portion of whom were foreigners, and many of whom were alike ignorant of our political organization, and of our actual responsibilities. It was the anxious desire of the Executive that, in the effort to negotiate the loan abroad, the American negotiator might be able to point the money-lender to the fund mortgaged for the redemption of the principal and interest of any loan he might contract, and thereby vindicate the Government from all suspicion of bad faith, or inability to meet its engagements. Congress differed from the Executive in this view of the subject. It became, nevertheless, the duty of the Executive to resort to every expedient in its power to negotiate the authorized loan. After a failure to do so in the American market, a citizen of high character and talent was sent to Europe—with no better success; and thus the mortifying spectacle has been presented, of the inability of this Government to obtain a loan so small as not in the whole to amount to more than one-fourth of its ordinary annual income; at a time when the Governments of Europe, although involved in debt, and with their subjects heavily burdened with taxation, readily obtain loans of any amount at a greatly reduced rate of interest. It would be unprofitable to look further into this anomalous state of things; but I cannot conclude without adding, that, for a Government which has paid off its debts of two wars with the largest maritime power of Europe, and now owing a debt which is almost next to nothing, when compared with its boundless resources—a Government the strongest in the world, because emanating from the popular will, and firmly rooted in the affections of a great and free people—and whose fidelity to its engagements has never been questioned;—for such a Government to have tendered to the capitalists of other countries an opportunity for a small investment of its stock, and yet to have failed, implies either the most unfounded distrust in its good faith, or a purpose, to obtain which the course pursued is the most fatal which could have been adopted. It has now become obvious to all men that the Government must look to its own means for supplying its wants; and it is consoling to know that these means are altogether adequate for the object. The Exchequer, if adopted, will greatly aid in bringing about this result. Upon what I regard as a well-founded supposition, that its bills would be readily sought for by the public creditors, and that the issue would, in a short time, reach the maximum of $15,000,000, it is obvious that $10,000,000 would thereby be added to the available means of the treasury, without cost or charge. Nor can I fail to urge the great and beneficial effects which would be produced in aid of all the active pursuits of life. Its effects upon the solvent State banks, while it would force into liquidation those of an opposite character, through its weekly settlements, would be highly beneficial; and, with the advantages of a sound currency, the restoration of confidence and credit would follow, with a numerous train of blessings. My convictions are most strong that these benefits would flow from the adoption of this measure; but, if the result should be adverse, there is this security in connexion with it—that the law creating it may be repealed at the pleasure of the Legislature, without the slightest implication of its good faith.

I recommend to Congress to take into consideration the propriety of reimbursing a fine imposed on General Jackson, at New Orleans, at the time of the attack and defence of that city, and paid by him. Without designing any reflection on the judicial tribunal which imposed the fine, the remission at this day may be regarded as not unjust or inexpedient. The voice of the civil authority was heard amidst the glitter of arms, and obeyed by those who held the sword—thereby giving additional lustre to a memorable military achievement.

If the laws were offended, their majesty was fully vindicated; and, although the penalty incurred and paid is worthy of little regard in a pecuniary point of view, it can hardly be doubted that it would be gratifying to the war-worn veteran, now in retirement and in the winter of his days, to be relieved from the circumstances in which that judgment placed him. There are cases in which public functionaries may be called on to weigh the public interest against their own personal hazards; and, if the civil law be violated from praiseworthy motives, or an overruling sense of public danger and public necessity, punishment may well be restrained within that limit which asserts and maintains the authority of the law, and the subjection of the military to the civil power. The defence of New Orleans, while it saved a city from the hands of the enemy, placed the name of General Jackson among those of the greatest captains of the age, and illustrated one of the brightest pages of our history. Now that the causes of excitement existing at the time have ceased to operate, it is believed that the remission of this fine, and whatever of gratification that remission might cause the eminent man who incurred and paid it, would be in accordance with the general feeling and wishes of the American people.

I have thus, fellow-citizens, acquitted myself of my duty under the Constitution, by laying before you, as succinctly as I have been able, the state of the Union, and by inviting your attention to measures of much importance to the country. The Executive will most zealously unite its efforts with those of the Legislative Department in the accomplishment of all that is required to relieve the wants of a common constituency, or elevate the destinies of a beloved country.

JOHN TYLER.

WASHINGTON, December, 1842.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, November 26, 1842.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report upon the various subjects committed to the charge of this department.

The condition of the army, of the fortifications, and of the other branches of the military service, and the state of our Indian affairs, and of the pensions and military bounty lands, are exhibited, as presented in the copious and very satisfactory reports of the General-in chief, and of the heads of bureaus to whose immediate direction the respective subjects are assigned. Such suggestions and recommendations as the good of the service seems to require, are made, and an account is given of the measures taken in execution of the laws passed at the last session of Congress.

Inspections and examinations of the men and means provided for the national defence, by independent and responsible officers, afford the only means by which an accurate knowledge of their condition can be acquired, by which responsibility can be enforced, and by which judicious improvement can be effected. During the past year they have been made vigorously and thoroughly. Posts and portions of the army that had not been inspected for many years, have been examined; the fortifications, the armories, arsenals, and depots of military stores, have been visited; and it is believed that but a very small portion of the army, and no important military establishment of the Government, has, during the year, escaped inspection. The information which this department is thus enabled to obtain, and much of which appears in this report, and those of the various bureaus, is of the most satisfactory character.

In pursuance of the act of the last session altering the fiscal year, the estimates of this department have been prepared for the first six months in 1843, and for the year commencing the 1st of July, 1843, separately. Those for the army proper, for the half year of 1843, amount to $553,586 88. The appropriations for thesame purpose for the service of 1842, amounted to $4,284,669, of which the half would be $2,142,334. This very great reduction is owing to various causes: first, the diminished expenses in Florida, effected mainly by the vigilance of Brigadier General Worth before the cessation of hostilities, of which an account was transmitted to the House of Representatives at its last session; second, the termination of those hostilities; third, the stopping of the recruiting service in August last; fourth, the doubt whether the state of the treasury would warrant even the expenditures authorized, particularly those in the Engineer and Ordnance Departments, induced a suspension of many of those which could be suspended with the least public injury, and considerable balances in consequence remain; and, fifth, a desire to economize, which is believed to have influenced all the branches of service. These, and other causes not so important, have saved the expenditure of a large portion of the amount appropriated for 1842, and left it to be applied to the service of the year 1843.

The same desire to economize and adapt our expenses to any probable state of the treasury, has induced the very moderate estimate for the service of the army proper, during the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1843, of $3,204,568 60, being $1,080,100 40 less than the appropriations for the same objects in 1842, and $867,430 40 less than the expenditures in 1840. It is confidently believed that the present military establishment of the country, including all the expenses of the military academy of a permanent or contingent character, may be maintained at a cost not exceeding $3,100,000. This estimate does not, of course, include the appropriations for ordnance, ordnance stores, small arms, and equipments, which are distributed among the States, or are accumulated for future use; nor does it include the expenditures of the engineers in erecting fortifications or other military defences, or in the measures preparatory to such erections. It will be seen that no appropriations are asked for the ordnance service for the first six months of 1843. Those recommended for the fiscal year commencing 1st July, 1843, are $775,200. The appropriations for the same objects in 1842 were $921,300. These have been reduced more in reference to the possible state of the treasury than to the actual wants of the service. In the Engineer Department the appropriations asked for the ensuing eighteen months amount to $1,245,500. The amount appropriated in 1842 was $278,000. A portion of the estimates is indispensable for the preservation of works already commenced; the residue is deemed necessary, and it is believed that true economy will be consulted by appropriating it; but still it is not indispensable at this time. The whole amount of the estimates for the military service of the country for the first half year of 1843, exclusive of fortifications, is $620,949 78, and for the fiscal year terminating July 1, 1844, is $4,144,154 80. The estimates are thus stated to prevent, if possible, the misunderstanding which frequently charges to the military service all the expenditures of this department. Thus, many of the estimates of the Chief of Topographical Engineers relate to works either exclusively of a civil, or of a mixed military and civil character—such as lighthouses placed under his charge, and improvements of harbors, rivers, surveys, &c.; and cannot, with propriety, be included among the military expenses of the country.

The estimates for pensions are also very much reduced from the amount appropriated during the last year, which is believed to be justified by the diminution of the number of pensioners. The estimate for that object, for the first half year of 1843, is $119,340, and for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1844, $697,650. The appropriations for the last year were $730,000.

In the Indian Department, the expenditures being regulated by treaties or by law, there is no room for the exercise of discretion in the reduction of their amount. As these are chiefly made within the first six months of any year, the estimate for that portion of the year 1843 is, in fact, for the service of the whole year, and amounts to $791,484 49; and those for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1843, amount to $850,978; being, however, nearly $450,000 less than the sum appropriated in 1842 for the same department. This arises solely from there being less required to fulfil treaty stipulations for the purchase of land.

The report of the Major General commanding the army shows the operations of the troops during the past year, and the present position of the different corps. The reasons which demanded a cessation of hostilities in Florida having been communicated to Congress by your special message, during the last session, and the policy recommended having been sanctioned by that body, by its adoption of the peaceful measure of inviting the occupation of the Territory by actual settlers, the number of troops serving there has been gradually diminished, leaving an adequate number to protect the inhabitants from the miserable remnants of tribes still remaining. We have advices that arrangements have been made with all but a very few of those Indians, for their removal to the west of the Mississippi, or to the district in the southern part of the peninsula assigned them for their habitation. And it is believed that, by this time, all the bands north of that district have agreed to cease hostilities and remove there. Two or three instances of outrages have occurred, since the orders were issued for the termination of hostilities; but they are ascertained to have been committed by bands who were ignorant of the measures adopted, or of the terms offered.

During the past year four hundred and fifty Indians have been shipped to the West, and it is supposed two hundred more have surrendered, and accepted the propositions to remove to the district assigned them.

A force consisting of two regiments and four companies, amounting to sixteen hundred and forty-four men, is retained in Florida, to afford protection to the inhabitants; and a sufficient number to garrison the posts will be kept there, with a view to remove all apprehension.

The troops withdrawn from Florida have been stationed at points where their presence was essential to the defence of our Western and Northern frontiers, or have relieved others at similar points, who have been collected on the seaboard. Our artillery regiments had been drilled and employed as infantry, and were quite unacquainted with the duties of their peculiar arm. It was deemed of great importance to bring together at the fortifications on the Atlantic frontier as many companies as possible, that they might there practise at the guns, and learn the exercise of garrison and field artillery.

The invasion of Texas by Mexico, and the threatening appearances among some of the wild tribes at the Southwest, rendered it expedient that a strong corps of observation should be placed near our Southwestern boundary line, as well to keep the Indians in that quarter at peace among themselves, as to check any disposition and prevent any attempts to engage in the conflict in which Texas was about to be involved. The dictates of humanity, as well as our neutral relations with that country, demanded this course. These troops have remained on and about the Red river; and under their judicious commander, General Taylor, have accomplished the objects in view. The troops are stationed at the different posts and forts, as specified in an accompanying report of the Adjutant General.

It requires but a slight examination of the extensive line of frontier on the Southwest, at the West, and in the Northwest, exposed to any attack of the Indians which may be prompted by unfriendly influences, or by supposed wrongs, to perceive that our present force is scarcely adequate to afford that protection which, it is admitted on all hands, the Government owes to its citizens, and especially those who, at its invitation, have occupied its remote public domain, and rendered it valuable to the whole country. The very nature of the service required renders the employment of mounted men indispensable. The rapidity of their movements, is the element which gives to us the advantage in any collision with Indians; while the same circumstance will render unnecessary the numerous and frequent posts which such an extended line would require, if foot soldiers only were employed. It may be affirmed that true economy, as well as effective service, will be promoted by the continuance of at least the present mounted regiments, reduced, as the rank and file will soon be, to fifty men for each company. Concurring entirely in the views of the Commanding General, it is earnestly hoped that the law which requires the dismounting of the second regiment of dragoons on the 4th of March next, will, at least, be so far modified as to leave the time discretionary.

The regular force, as now authorized by law, consists of seven hundred and seventeen commissioned officers; seventeen storekeepers, of whom fifteen are attached to the Ordnance and two to the Purchasing Department; two hundred and fifty enlisted men for the ordnance service, and seven thousand five hundred and ninety non-commissioned officers, musicians, artificers, and privates; twenty chaplains and schoolmasters, and as many ordnance sergeants as there are military posts. Clerks, foragemasters, and wagonmasters, are also employed in the Quartermaster's Department, from time to time, according to the exigencies of the service. The act of August 23, 1842, reduced the rank and file of the army three thousand nine hundred and twenty men. The reduction is gradually proceeding, in the manner contemplated by the act; and the excess, according to the last returns, is 1,970 men. It is supposed the prescribed minimum will be reached by the beginning of the year 1844.

From the general returns of the army, accompanying this report, it appears that the whole number of troops now in service is nine thousand eight hundred and forty-seven, consisting of seven hundred and eighty-one commissioned officers; nine thousand six hundred non-commissioned officers, musicians, artificers, and privates; and two hundred and forty-seven enlisted men of ordnance. The aggregate is eight hundred and forty-seven less than the number stated in the last annual report.

The desertions have not been numerous, but an unprecedented number of men have been discharged by the judges and courts (three hundred and eighty-eight between July 1, 1841, and October 31, 1842,) principally on the ground of their being aliens. The state of the law on this subject has occasioned various constructions perplexing to the officers charged with the duty of recruiting, embarrassing to the department, and injurious to the Government. It is very desirable that it should be rendered precise and definite. While, on the one hand, it is obvious our army ought not to consist of an undue proportion of foreigners; yet, on the other, the low wages offered constitute an inducement quite insufficient to the young men of our land, whose habits and enterprise enable them so easily to acquire the means of subsistence and of independence, if not wealth, in the cultivation of the soil. Probably a middle course would avoid all difficulties—namely, allowing those to be recruited who are citizens, or who have taken the preliminary oath and initiatory steps to naturalization.

The report of the officer in charge of the Ordnance Bureau exhibits the very satisfactory condition of that most important branch of the service. By a steady perseverance in the system of laying up, in the season of peace, those materials which require length of time to adapt them to use, and of fabricating those articles which cannot be supplied on an emergency, we shall soon have at our command cannon, small arms, fixed ammunition, gunpowder and its component parts, to an extent commensurate with our wants.

By the table exhibiting the apportionment of arms to the several States, under the act of 1808, for arming and equipping the whole body of the militia, it will be seen that, notwithstanding the efforts made by the department, and which are mentioned in the last annual report, several States are delinquent in the returns of their militia. As these returns constitute the basis of the apportionment, the States which fail to make them are deprived of their just proportion of military supplies. It will be seen that New Jersey, Delaware, Arkansas, and Louisiana, have not made returns for periods varying from twelve to eighteen years. If the cause of these omissions be the want of militia organization in those States, it may be worthy of serious inquiry whether some measure should not be adopted to remedy the evil, by withholding distribution until returns are made, or by the exercise of some other power vested in Congress. A reference to the same table will show an extraordinary disproportion between the arms allotted to several States and their respective populations. Whether this arises from variant constructions of the law in those States, (by which some return the number enrolled, and others the number mustered or inspected,) or from some other cause, would seem to be worthy of an inquiry by Congress, who alone can supply an adequate remedy.

The state of the treasury, as this department was advised by the proper authority, rendered it necessary to withhold the expenditure of as much of the appropriations made at the last session of Congress, as could be suspended without great and manifest injury to the public service. In reference to the condition of our foreign relations, and the quantities of arms, cannon, and gun-carriages, in our possession, it seemed that such suspension could take place in the operations of the armories and arsenals with less immediate public injury or inconvenience than in other departments. Extensive repairs also became necessary at the armories. For a time, therefore, no work was carried on at either of them during the past season. Labor has now, however, been resumed on a moderate scale, and instructions have been given to complete the muskets in the course of fabrication, and to make five hundred rifles, and five hundred percussion muskets, each month, for the ensuing six months. The arsenals will be chiefly employed in the repairs of arms, and in the manufacture of the iron work of gun-carriages and military equipments. Our supply of heavy cannon being very good, it is not contemplated at present to purchase many of that description; but a sufficient number of large-chambered guns, to arm our forts, will be procured. And in consequence of the adoption of the suggestion of the Treasury Department, beforementioned, a large portion of the money intended for the service of the year 1842 remains unexpended; and any specific appropriations for the Ordnance Department, for the first six months of 1843, will be unnecessary.

The estimates for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1843, are made upon a scale so reduced as to be warranted only by the possible state of the treasury. The usual appropriations for the ordinary objects of expenditure in this branch of service are as desirable now as at former periods; and it is believed that a mistaken economy only would dictate the continuance of such reduced amounts, when the condition of the public finances will admit of what is demanded by our true interests.

I cannot omit to refer to the recommendation contained in the last annual report, for a national foundry on a limited scale, at which the qualities of iron may be tested and ascertained, and models for ordnance may be fabricated. It is apprehended that the great importance of such a laboratory to the country at large, as well as to the Government, has not been sufficiently considered.

It will be seen that some legislative provision has become quite necessary in reference to the lead-mines and the mineral lands. Under the existing laws, no alternative was left to the Executive, but to proceed and lease the mineral lands reserved from sale. The difficulties of this course are detailed in the report of the Ordnance Bureau. The principal, if not the only cause of them, would seem to be the claims to those lands (in most cases utterly unfounded) by persons who have entered them for purchase at the land office when they were not liable to entry, or by persons who have occupied them without any right or pretence of right. It is unfortunate that these persons constitute a powerful, though not a numerous class, who are able to exact from the miners, who bring out the ore, a large portion of their produce, while they refuse to pay any rent to the United States. Thus the poor, industrious, and very numerous body of miners are oppressed, while the country is deprived of the use of its own property, and of any equivalent for such use by others. The difficulty incident to the leasing lands of any description, and collecting rents, by a Government, is so great, and is attended with so much expense and hazard of loss, that no essential benefit can be anticipated from the practice.

The tenure of land by short leases is so foreign to the genius of our institutions and the habits of our people, that it necessarily becomes somewhat odious, and increases the difficulty. To enable the Government to obtain some value for these lands and mines, and, at the same time, to afford to the humble and comparatively indigent laborers an opportunity to acquire lots for sums within their means of payment, and in quantities adapted to their means of working them, it is recommended that the reserved mineral lands in the north part of Illinois and in the Territories of Wisconsin and Iowa be allowed to be sold in lots of ten acres each, at a minimum price of ten dollars per acre. It is represented that they are worth from twenty to fifty dollars per acre, depending on their situation. Prior to such sales, the claims to any of the mineral lands should be determined by a board instituted for that purpose, and the claimants allowed to enter and purchase the lands at the same minimum price, in an order of priority to be settled in the law or by the board. The interest of the United States in these lands and mines is of very great value, and is endangered by delay in the proper measures to secure it. At the same time, the prosperity, and, indeed, the peace and quiet of the large number of citizens occupying the lands or working the mines, demand that their rights should be settled, and their conflicting titles and claims adjusted. What may now be accomplished without difficulty, may hereafter, when the parties interested become more numerous and more tenacious, be found impracticable. The subject is therefore commended to the earnest attention of Congress, who can alone provide the necessary means for rendering justice to the Government, to the claimants, and to the miners.

These suggestions are not intended to apply to the mineral lands in the south part of Illinois. The character and nature of the mines in that quarter are not yet sufficiently ascertained to enable us to affix a price to them, nor is there as yet any conflict between claimants and occupants to require the interposition of the Government. A strong belief is entertained by the lessees that these mines contain large proportions of silver. Should such expectations be realized, a different policy from that adopted in respect to the lead-mines may be expedient.

In the report of the Quartermaster General, the operations in that branch of public service during the year will be seen. The additional duties caused by the act of the last session, transferring to that department the business of the Commissary of Purchases, have been undertaken, and so far successfully performed. The termination of hostilities in Florida relieved a large number of assistant quartermasters from duty there, and placed them at the disposal of this department, many of whom have been returned to their companies, still retaining their appointments in the staff. The provisions of the ninth section of the act of July 5, 1838, render it questionable whether they can be deprived of those appointments without actual removal from office by the President. The same remark applies, although not with equal force, to the assistant adjutants general, provided for by the seventh section of the same act. It must happen that the number of these officers appointed in one state of circumstances, will not be required in another; and it is therefore highly expedient that the President should be authorized to dispense with their staff services, and vacate their staff appointments, whenever the public exigency no longer demands them.

The best and the most agreeable evidence that could be furnished of the economy which has prevailed in the disbursements, will be found in the circumstance that so much of the appropriations made at the last session remain on hand; that $131,000 only will be required for the first half of the ensuing year; and the estimates for the fiscal year, commencing on the 1st of July, 1843, are much below those that have been presented and sanctioned by Congress for several years.

The measures adopted for putting in order Fort Jesup, in Louisiana, and Fort Atkinson; for establishing the new posts on the Marmiton river, and on or near the False Washita, and the operations at Detroit, Plattsburg, Fort Sullivan, Fort Adams, and at various other posts, are detailed in the accompanying report of the Quartermaster General.

I concur in his recommendation of appropriations for new barracks at Fort Gibson, and consider the reasons urged by him so strong as to require nothing more than a reference to them.

I deeply regret the necessity for again invoking the attention of Congress to the dishonored pledge given by the Quartermaster General, in the name and by the authority of this nation, to the Creek Indians, to remunerate them for their services in Florida, and as a consideration for their removal. The earnestness with which a gallant soldier pleads for the faith and honor of his country, and for justice to a helpless tribe, who have no resort but to our own sense of right, it is hoped will not only be excused by the circumstances, but will find a hearty response in every bosom.

The report of the Colonel of Engineers exhibits a most gratifying account of the ability and fidelity of the officers of that corps, and of the results of their labors. Notwithstanding the state of the treasury rendered it indispensable to suspend some of the operations during the past year, yet it will be seen that many important works are in complete order, others in a condition to render effective service, and others very near completion. The arrangements, with all the requisite collateral preparations, are complete for mounting 2,085 guns, at points most important for the defence of the seacoast. This may be said to have been accomplished substantially within the last two years.

No satisfactory account of the work performed at the different forts, or of their present condition, can be given, without a minuteness of detail incompatible with the general design of this report. For this, reference is therefore made to the very clear and ample statements of the Chief Engineer. It will be seen with what cautious regard to the possible state of the public revenues the estimates have been made for continuing and completing the works now in progress, and for the repairs of such as require them. It is hoped that the moderation of these estimates, and the sound and just views by which they are sustained, will commend them to the favorable consideration of Congress. More, perhaps, depends on the steadiness and regularity of the appropriations, than upon their large amount. At a time when there is so little employment for labor, and it is so cheap, economy will be promoted by continuing our national defences, while the expenditures will operate most beneficially among the industrial classes of our fellow-citizens, and add much to the means and the spirit of our internal trade. If then, (what is not supposed to admit of doubt, and what this department will not suffer itself to question or to discuss,) it is the determination of the Government to place the country in a competent state of defence against foreign aggression, the present time would seem to be propitious for continuing the plan of fortifications heretofore adopted.

Although, for the reason before given, it would be impracticable to notice all the works specified in the report of the Colonel of Engineers, yet some of them seem to demand observation.

The reasons for the delay in the construction of the barracks and defensive works at Detroit and at Buffalo, are stated by the Chief Engineer. As they were of a temporary character, and have now been overcome, those works will be vigorously prosecuted, so soon as the season will admit, and, it is very satisfactory to know, without the necessity of any further appropriations for the next eighteen months.

The conclusion of a treaty with the envoy of Great Britain, by which a cession was made of the strip of land along the northern boundary of the States of New York and Vermont, which included the site heretofore selected at Rouse's Point for a fort, rendered it expedient to suspend all operations in reference to the two works on either side of the outlet of Lake Champlain, which had been contemplated in place of that at Rouse's Point, when it was ascertained that the latter did not fall within our boundary.

The report of the board of officers, in May, 1840, presenting a connected plan of defences by land, estimated the expense of a permanent work at Stony Point, on the New York side of the outlet, at $300,000, and the same sum for a permanent work at Windmill Point, on the Vermont side. By the cession referred to, and which has now become complete by the ratification of the treaty, these works have become unnecessary. As the existing appropriation will be sufficient for the present, immediate measures will be taken to carry into effect the design of Congress, by commencing the work at Rouse's Point.

It is believed that the appropriation made in 1841 for the erection of defensive works at the junction of the Matawamkeag and Penobscot rivers, in the State of Maine, can be better applied in the erection of a fort at the Narrows of the Penobscot; and it is respectfully recommended that authority for that purpose be given.

Although the state of the works for the defence of the harbor of New York is very gratifying, yet it should not be forgotten that they do not complete the system, and that, without such completion, they do not afford adequate protection. The fortifications on Staten island, at the Narrows, are deemed more important than the opposite forts—Hamilton and Lafayette. The United States has expended more than $15,000 in erecting the works on Staten island, upon land belonging to the State of New York. That State has offered to convey this land, on receiving the original purchase money and the interest. The difficulty respecting the title, which was supposed to exist, has been removed by the opinion of the Attorney General, that the right to the land is unquestionably in the State of New York. It is therefore confidently hoped that the necessary appropriation will now be made to purchase the site of the works erected, and to put them in repair. Should any apprehension be felt of a want of means, they can probably be supplied by the sale of the site of Fort Gansevoort, on the North river, which has become comparatively useless, and by the application of the proceeds of such sale to the works on Staten island.

Another and most essential part of the defence of the harbor of New York, (which has been rendered more necessary by the discovery of a new channel,) consists of a work on Sandy Hook, the immediate commencement of which is strenuously urged by the Chief Engineer, by the most convincing considerations. It is most earnestly and respectfully recommended to the consideration of Congress.

I would earnestly invite attention to the recommendations contained in the last annual report of this department, in favor of the establishment of military defences on the remote southern portion of our Atlantic frontier. As there appears to be some question whether the points on the coast within the State of Georgia, heretofore indicated, are the most advisable, the appropriation asked by the Engineer Bureau, and which is recommended by this department, may be for the commencement of a work on the coast of Georgia, at such site as the President shall select, after the necessary military surveys.

The recommendations in the last annual report of works for the security of Mobile Bay are renewed. This very exposed frontier would seem to demand more protection than has hitherto been awarded.

The report of the Colonel of Engineers shows the necessity of some provision for completing the work on the national road, which was begun, but which is left unfinished, and is now exposed to rapid destruction for the want of that finish which is essential to its protection. If it be the determination of Congress not to authorize any further expenditures on this road, it is suggested whether some measure might not be adopted by which the States through which it passes may be enabled to complete, and keep in repair, an avenue of such great importance to the whole community, and particularly to our Western fellow-citizens, and one so eminently beneficial to the operations of the Federal Government in peace, and almost indispensable in war.

The expenses of a survey for the continuation of this road through the States of Illinois and Missouri to the city of Jefferson, heretofore made under a resolution of the Senate, have not been defrayed, and provision for it would be but an act of justice to the public creditors by whom it was incurred.

The report of the Board of Visiters, appointed during the last year to examine the military academy at West Point, accompanies that of the Colonel of Engineers. It evinces great ability; and the close and critical scrutiny with which a board of disinterested and independent citizens have looked into every department of this great national institution, and the high praise which they award to its superintendent, professors and teachers, to the exact discipline maintained, and to the thorough instruction imparted, is inhanced by their obviously eminent capacity to form a correct judgment, and by their equally obvious regard for discriminating truth. The testimony of the Chief Engineer, himself so long and so thoroughly acquainted with all the operations of the academy, that, in his opinion, "it has never been in a condition so perfectly fulfilling the purposes of its creation and maintenance as now," is equally gratifying and convincing. A personal examination during the recess of Congress enables me to add what these testimonials scarcely required—my own conviction of their entire justness. Having, in the last annual report, expressed somewhat at large my views of the inestimable advantages of this institution to the whole country, in diffusing a species of knowledge that can be no otherwise acquired, and of its absolute necessity for preserving and improving that science upon which our safety in war must depend, it is not deemed necessary to repeat them. Indeed, the steady adherence of Congress, at all times, and under all circumstances, even of pecuniary difficulty, to an institution which so much resembles that body in its influences upon the formation of a national character, operating as it does upon pupils selected mainly by the immediate representatives of the people, from every district of the Union, renders superfluous any extended observations on the subject.

The alterations and improvements suggested by the Board of Visiters have received the most respectful consideration, and have been adopted where circumstances justified such a course. The barracks for the residence of the students have been a subject of complaint by every Board of Visiters for several years past. The single fact, that ordinarily three pupils, and frequently a larger number, are obliged to study and sleep in a room scarcely sufficient for one, is of itself calculated to show how indispensable additional accommodations in that respect have become. In one of the buildings, not only are the pupils deprived of the ordinary comforts of room, but their health is jeopardied by exposure to storms and to sudden transitions. I cannot too earnestly recommend the moderate appropriation asked by the Engineer Bureau for an addition to the barracks at the academy.

The subject of a corps of artificers to learn and practise the duties of military field engineering, was brought to the attention of Congress in the last annual report, and is renewed by the Chief Engineer. Deeming it impossible to increase the cogency of the reasons urged by him for some provision on the subject, I can but again add my earnest recommendation to those so repeatedly presented by my predecessors, in favor of the necessary provisions to effect that object.

The report of the Colonel of Topographical Engineers affords new and continued evidence of the great usefulness of that corps, and of the zeal and ability of its officers. An accurate knowledge of the topography of our very extended territory, particularly of its maritime and internal frontiers, of its lakes and rivers, of the obstructions to intercommunication, and of the positions most requiring, and most capable of, defensive works, is indispensable alike to intelligent legislation and to efficient executive administration. As a mere question of economy, such information can scarcely be acquired at too high a price. The advantage of an organized scientific corps, qualified by study and by practice for this peculiar duty, over the irregular services of persons transiently employed, without organization, and without the opportunities of mature and systematic deliberation, doubtless dictated the formation of this corps. And all our experience has shown the wisdom of the measure. The reports in detail of the several officers of the corps, appended to that of the Colonel, present a mass of the most valuable information respecting the topography of various parts of the Union—from the remote north to the extreme south. They exhibit the progress made in the surveys, in the improvement of harbors and rivers, in the construction of lighthouses and breakwaters, and various other works in charge of the corps. A brief notice of a few of those which seem to require attention, is all that will be attempted on the present occasion.

It will be perceived that considerable progress has been made in the survey of the Northwestern lakes, and that preparations for its continuance the next season have been made, which will enable those in charge of the work to accomplish more than was practicable during the last year. The expense of these surveys is comparatively so trifling, that they can scarcely be liable to objection in almost any state of the treasury. I cannot omit to call attention to the report of Captain Williams, respecting the urgent necessity of a harbor on the west side of Lake Michigan, and the improvement of the navigation at the mouth of St. Clair river. These are exceedingly important to the United States, to enable us to furnish supplies to the Indian tribes, and military stores and subsistence for the troops which, even in time of peace, must be maintained in that quarter, and which, in the event of hostilities, will afford the only barrier between savage ferocity and our frontier settlements. But to our fellow-citizens of that region, who have purchased the public lands, a safe access to the markets of the East is so essential as to justify their calls upon the Government for a common share of its protection. The commerce of the lakes, comprising the productions of seven States and one Territory, which must annually exceed twenty-five millions of dollars, would seem entitled to consideration and assistance, not only on account of the great interests involved in its success, but on the ground, also, of a fair apportionment of the fostering and protecting aid of the Government. This commerce affords the only effective means of supplying the nation with the mariners who will be found indispensable in that quarter, in the event of hostilities.

It will be seen that the surveys for the defences of Soller's flats and of Delaware breakwater harbor are completed. Those for the defences of Sandy Hook, and the harbor and town of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, are in execution, as well as the military reconnoissance of the peninsula of Maryland, south of the city. It is gratifying to learn that an extensive and very thorough reconnoissance of the defences of New Orleans, embracing a large extent of territory, has been completed.

The raft which formed the obstruction to the navigation of Red river has been removed—an event of no small importance to our fellow-citizens in that quarter.

The Potomac aqueduct is so far completed as to warrant the confident expectation that it will be in a condition to receive water in the course of the next season. The repairs of the Potomac bridge are drawing to a close, and it is believed that it will be passable in January next.

The measures taken to execute the law of the last session, appropriating one hundred thousand dollars for the improvement of the Ohio, Mississippi, Missouri, and Arkansas rivers, are also stated. So soon as the application for an injunction, by Henry M. Shreve, Esq., which has arrested the progress of those measures, shall be disposed of, they will be resumed. But it is manifest that the present appropriation is wholly inadequate; that it can only provide the necessary snag-boats; and that, unless followed by others, the expenditure of the money will be but to waste it.

The proceedings of the corps under the laws respecting the construction of lighthouses are also detailed in the report. It would seem that the expense of these invaluable auxiliaries to commerce may be much diminished by the adoption of Mitchell's patent screw moorings—a recent English invention; and that, by means of such moorings, they can be placed in positions far more advantageous to the mariner than any that can be occupied in the present mode of building them. The sanction of Congress is invited to the steps recommended by the Colonel of Topographical Engineers, to procure the necessary apparatus, and acquire a knowledge of its application.

It will be seen that a party of engineers is in the field for the survey of the Arkansas and Platt rivers and the adjacent country. A survey of the country north of the Missouri having been completed, the map of the same, constructed by Mr. Nicollet, unequalled in the accuracy and fulness of its details, is now nearly finished, and will be published in January next. It is intended to cause a similar survey of the country south of that river, embracing the approaches to the Rocky mountains, their several passes, and gradually the region between them and our possessions on the Pacific. These explorations and surveys are indispensable to such a knowledge of the country, its resources, and its streams, as we must possess before we can establish any communication with a region that is every day becoming more important to us. And it is hoped that there will be no reluctance to grant the very moderate appropriations asked for the continuance of the "military and geographical surveys west of the Mississippi river."

In the last annual report of the department, your attention, and that of Congress, was called to the great importance of establishing a chain of military posts extending from the Council Bluffs to the mouth of the Columbia river. A plan, and an estimate of the expense, were subsequently laid before the military committee of the House of Representatives, by whom a very able and interesting report was made, accompanied by a bill. I would again earnestly invite a consideration of the subject. There are two aspects in which it may be regarded. In the first place, the exhibition of military power is indispensable to counteract and control any hostile disposition of the Indians in that vast and sequestered region. They are now exposed to the unresisted influences of the traders and emissaries of foreign nations, by whom they could at any time be excited to devastate that entire frontier. We could command the avenues by which these Indians pass from the north to the south in their hunting expeditions, and thus make them sensible of our power to resist and punish aggression. In the second place, if we intend to maintain our right to the territories on the Pacific, belonging to us, (which, it is supposed, does not admit of a question,) we must occupy them; and we must establish a communication with them, other than that of a five months' voyage by sea at a particular season of the year. By extending our laws and civil jurisdiction over the country, and affording protection to our citizens disposed to emigrate thither, I have the strongest reason to believe, from communications to the department, that a sufficient number would soon establish themselves in that quarter, provided they could be assured of immunity from Indians on the way, and their journey could be facilitated by the Government. To attain these purposes, it is not supposed that a continued chain of posts is immediately necessary. The establishment of one at some proper point on the Missouri—probably between the great bend of that river and White river—at which stores and supplies could be collected, and from which parties could be sent out, would answer for the present, and until the whole ground should be better known. These parties would be occupied primarily in exploring and surveying, to ascertain the best routes, in removing obstructions and facilitating the passage of such routes, and in protecting the caravans of emigrants. And if small detachments of hired men, acquainted with the country, were furnished to the latter, upon their crossing the mountains, it is believed that nothing further would be required. Every colony that passed over the mountains would facilitate the progress of its successor; and every one that established itself beyond them would add to the strength and power of the Government, and would perhaps render permanent forts unnecessary.

There are many indications that the time has arrived for decided action on this subject, and I trust that at the ensuing session of Congress there will be such appropriations as will enable this department to make the necessary arrangements to send on to Oregon a colony of citizens impatient to undertake the enterprise. A post at or near the mouth of the Columbia would certainly be desirable; but it is not deemed absolutely necessary, in the present condition of things.

The operations in the Paymaster General's and the Surgeon General's departments are detailed in the reports of their respective chiefs. Under the authority of the appropriation at the last session, for extending and rendering more complete the meteorological observations conducted at the military posts, Professor Espy has been employed to render that assistance for which his extensive researches so eminently qualify him. Instructions and forms have been prepared, which, it is believed, will insure very exact and very extensive observations, from which an important science cannot fail to derive great advantages.

The report of the Commissary General of Subsistence exhibits the very prosperous condition of his department. All the accounts of disbursing agents have been faithfully rendered. For the reasons stated by him, no appropriations for the first six months of 1843 will be necessary, on account of subsistence of the army. The success which has so far attended the system of purchase by contract, induces me to dissent from the recommendation to change it. Perhaps more discretion might be safely allowed, to purchase in the open market when proposals are deemed exorbitant. The unsettled accounts for subsistence furnished in Florida in 1839 and 1840, would seem to require special legislation for their adjustment.

From the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, it appears that the number of pensions on the rolls is less, by 1,496, than at the date of the last annual report. The whole number at that time was 26,581. The number at present on the rolls is 25,035; of whom 2,662 are invalids; 3,724 received pensions under the act of 1818; 412 under the act of 1828; 15,535 under the act of 1832; 2,307 under the act of 1836; and 395 have been pensioned under the act of 1838, in consequence chiefly of the joint resolution and act of the last session of Congress, relating to the death of pensioners since 1832, and to the marriage of their widows. It is believed that many must have died, without the fact being known to the agents, and, of course, not reported by them. The persons who received their pensions, in the first and second quarters of 1842, amounted to 18,074; and it is supposed that this approximates very nearly to the actual number now alive. This would exhibit a diminution of 8,457, which is not so great as that which occurred between the dates of the reports in 1840 and 1841, and which amounted to 17,863. It will be seen that the estimate for pensions is much below that for 1842.

The law relating to military bounty lands, for services in the revolutionary war, and in that of 1812, having been derived by the act of July 27, 1842, the examination of the claims presented was referred to the Commissioner of Pensions, as the rolls and documents relating to them were in his office. From the statement annexed to his report, it will appear that 358 claims on account of revolutionary services have been presented within the year, and that 22 warrants have been issued for 5,250 acres of land; that 416 claims for services in the last war with Great Britain have been presented within the same time, and that 65 warrants have been issued for 10,720 acres of land.

By the act of March 4, 1840, the office of Commissioner of Pensions was continued until the 4th day of March, 1843, when it will cease, unless further continued by Congress. By the same act, the pension business of the Navy Department was transferred to the office of the Commissioner of Pensions.

The duties yet remaining to be performed under the laws relating to army and navy pensions, and to the military bounty lands, require the continuance of the office of the Commissioner.

The condition of our affairs with the Indians presents a subject of the deepest interest to every philanthropist. The report of the Commissioner who has them immediately under his charge, with the accompanying tabular statements, and the returns of the various superintendents and agents, furnish copious information of the results of past labors, and the grounds of hope for the continued improvement of these victims to the progress of civilization. The policy of removing the Indians from their native homes, to make room for the white man, and of collecting them in large bodies on our Western frontier, is not now debatable. It has been long settled, and it may now be considered as having been executed. There is no more land east of the Mississippi, remaining unceded, to be desired by us. No new source of expense on this account need be opened for many years to come; and when the treaties now pending shall be ratified, and those requiring the removal of Indians shall be executed, our system will become settled. It is to be hoped that the red man will then be suffered to rest in peace, and that undivided efforts will be bestowed in discharging the fearful responsibilities we have incurred to improve his intellectual and moral condition, as the only means of rendering him happy here or hereafter.

From the returns we have been able to obtain, it appears that 88,124 have been removed to the regions west of the Mississippi; and that of the once numerous tribes east of that river, less than 25,000 souls remain. The greater portion of these are under treaty obligations to remove within a very few years.

This policy of collecting the Indians has proceeded on the idea of relieving them from their dependent and degrading condition when mixed with a white population, and of isolating them from the vices of a semi-civilization. Scarcely capable of self-government, they are quite incompetent to protect themselves from the frauds and from the violence of the white man. The present system of superintendents and agents is inadequate, and the time seems to have arrived when we should turn our attention to devising some form of government which may secure peace and order among themselves, and protection against others. Until they feel safe in their persons and possessions, they can make no advances toward civilization. Although the criminal jurisdiction of the adjacent courts of the United States is extended over them, yet all experience has shown that it is merely nominal. The most atrocious offenders are seldom pursued, and more rarely brought to justice. Civil obligations it is wholly vain to attempt to enforce. There is no cause for surprise that, in this state of things, the law of force and of retaliation is the only one recognised. The plan of something like a territorial government for the Indians has been suggested; the object is worthy the most deliberate consideration of all who take an interest in the fate of this hapless race.

The vice to which they are most inclined, and which is the most deadly to their prosperity, is an indulgence in intoxicating liquors. All the powers given to this department by existing laws have been exerted to restrain this propensity, and to prevent the introduction of alcohol into the Indian country. Circulars to agents and superintendents, and instructions to military commanders, have been reiterated with but partial effect. The cupidity of the white man, boasting of his superior civilization, stimulates his craft in devising the means of evading the laws, and still further brutalizing his ignorant, weak, and yielding red brother. Depositories of ardent spirits are established on the confines of the Indian territory, within the jurisdiction of the States, where the laws of the Union cannot apply, and where there are none of the State adapted to the case, or, if they exist, are never executed. Some remedy may be provided, by substituting imprisonment for the present pecuniary penalty prescribed for selling or introducing liquor, or establishing distilleries, in the Indian country, (which is wholly ineffectual against a class of persons who have no visible property,) and by giving jurisdiction over the offence to some local or other authority to which convenient access can be had.

Among some of the more civilized tribes, particularly the Choctaws and Cherokees, it is understood that the doctrines and the practice of temperance have made much progress, and that they have passed some wise laws to restrain their own people. The fact thus established, that the Indian can be made temperate, is calculated to cheer us in efforts to save him.

An exhibit of the condition of the civilization fund, and of its application, accompanies the report of the Commissioner. This small fund has accomplished much. It scatters its good seed very extensively, and a great portion of it falls on good soil. Its fruits are to be seen in the gradual but decided improvement of many of the Indian tribes. This fund is applied so as to co-operate, as far as practicable, with the schools established and maintained by means of the moneys provided, by treaties with various tribes, for purposes of education. From table 84, appended to the Commissioner's report, it appears that the whole amount thus provided at the present time is $67,155. It will also be seen from table 83, that there are fifty-two schools maintained for Indian youth, at which there are 2,132 scholars; of whom 1,058 are boys, and 852 girls, and 222 whose sex is not stated, were instructed during the past year; and that, from seven schools, there are no returns. Wherever the means of comparison exist, it is gratifying to find that the aggregate number of pupils is on the increase. Convinced that the only means of diffusing elementary knowledge among the children of these people is to interest their parents in the undertaking, by enabling them to take a part in the establishment of schools and in their supervision, our efforts have been directed to the encouragement of such seminaries in the respective nations. A sufficient number of many of the tribes have already been educated, and prepared to become teachers among their own people. Every school becomes the nursery of new teachers, who, being thus prepared at home, removed from the temptations that assail them among the whites, and retaining the manners of their own people, will be more acceptable and more successful than any others. In this way only can females be educated, and the potent influence of mothers be properly directed in the formation of the character of the generation that is soon to take place in the scene of life. Although the academy in Kentucky is continued for the double purpose of fulfilling expectations which caused heavy expenses in its establishment, and for furnishing a higher grade of instruction, to enable the pupils to become physicians, clergymen, and teachers; yet, as it is supposed these pupils will be as nearly accomplished within two years as they can be at any time, consistently with the greater and main object of instructing the greatest possible number, it has been arranged with the founder and proprietor of that academy, that, at the expiration of that time, the obligations of the Government to furnish pupils to it are to cease.

Intimately connected with the improvement of the moral and intellectual condition of the Indians, is the system which supplies them with clothing and the means of procuring subsistence. It is undeniable that the trading system does not adequately accomplish these purposes. There are many honest faithful traders, but they cannot counteract the recklessness of the Indians, who will purchase goods either of a worthless kind, or in quantities altogether beyond their wants, which, with characteristic improvidence, they waste or barter for ardent spirits, and leave themselves destitute of the articles of necessity for the residue of the year. This destitution produces suffering, dependence, and inactivity; and they resign themselves to the allurements of intoxication, or of wretched idleness. At the same time, an influence is acquired over them by the traders, altogether beyond that of the officers of the Government, and which may be, and sometimes has been, wielded in opposition to its policy, and tending to the continued degradation and detriment of the Indians. In this respect, it seems to me the British policy is far preferable, which retains to the officers of the nation the means of influencing men who can be reached mainly only through their personal wants. I am disposed to concur in the views of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, as to the propriety of employing agents of the Government to furnish supplies to the Indians at fixed prices, of which they should be notified, and in such quantities, at given periods of time, as will insure their deriving the utmost benefit from them. It is not perceived why the principle recently adopted in reference to pursers in the navy, may not be applied to this case; and a system of checks established, that will guard against all fraud and abuse, and enable the Indian to receive the best kind of goods at the cost of purchase and transportation, and a per centage to defray the expenses of sale.

Since the last annual report, a treaty has been concluded and ratified with the Senecas of New York, by which a dispute that threatened the most vexatious consequences has been amicably adjusted, the rights of the Indians protected, their interest promoted, and the Government relieved from large pecuniary responsibilities.

With the Wyandots of Ohio a treaty has also been ratified, by which that State will be relieved from a population that encumbered the fairest portion of its territory—a portion that will now be open to enterprise, and contribute to the general prosperity.

A treaty has also been held with the Sac and Fox Indians, (which, under your directions, will be submitted to the Senate for ratification,) by which about ten millions of acres of some of the best land in the Territory of Iowa are acquired. A purchase has also been made of the Chippewas in the north-west of Michigan and in Wisconsin, of about fifteen millions of acres, by a treaty which will in like manner be submitted to the Senate. These treaties have been made at a reduced expense quite unprecedented, in the most open, fair, and frank manner, and on terms of justice, and even liberality to the Indians, becoming the character of the United States.

Pursuant to the act of the last session of Congress, commissioners have been appointed to adjust the claims arising under the Choctaw treaty of 1830, and instructions have been given them for the performance of their duties. Commissioners have also been appointed to settle the remaining claims under the treaty with the Cherokees of 1836. Delegates from that nation were in attendance at the seat of Government for several months during the last year, to obtain a recognition of other and extensive claims, and to settle some points in relation to the intercourse of our citizens with their people, and the administration of their laws. Their applications were listened to, not only patiently, but with a sincere desire to gratify them in every request that could be granted consistently with a regard to our own rights and duties. The propositions made to them, to meet many of their objects, were declined; and the whole negotiation failed.

During the year, the claims arising under the Creek treaty, connected with the contract of Watson & Co., have been disposed of; and many of those prior to that contract have been adjusted, and the residue will soon cease to encumber the department. The claims under the treaty of 1839 with the Osages have all been finally decided, except five, which have been referred for further information.

Appended to the report of the commissioners, are tabular statements of the investments made in stocks for the benefit of the several Indian tribes, and of the amounts retained in the treasury on which the Government pays the annual interest.

I found existing in the department a disbursing agent, in whose name large sums of money, belonging to various Indians, were deposited in different banks, or held by him in public securities. Although this money could not be drawn or used without a check countersigned by the Secretary of War and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, yet the system appeared to me erroneous in principle, and liable to abuse. As soon as the necessary arrangements could be made, directions were given to transfer these funds directly to the Treasurer of the United States. This has been done, with the exception of a small sum necessarily retained to meet outstanding demands, or to adjust unsettled accounts of agents.

I concur in the request of the Commissioner, that authority be given to sell the buildings, and the adjacent improvements, which have, at former times, been constructed and made for the use of the Indian agencies, but which have become useless to the Indian Department.

The reductions directed by the act "respecting the organization of the army, and for other purposes," passed at the last session, have been effected, so far as authority for that purpose was given by the act. The offices of the superintendents of the armories have been abolished; the military storekeepers attached to the ordnance service have been reduced to the number directed; the duties of the Commissary of Purchases have been transferred to the Quartermaster's Department; two paymasters, one surgeon, and ten assistant surgeons, have been disbanded; there being a vacancy in the office of paymaster, and in that of surgeon. Although the act directed that the office of one inspector general should be abolished, yet it did not authorize the President to discharge either of the incumbents, while it gave that authority in respect to the paymasters, surgeons, and assistant surgeons. The case was such as not to require or justify the exercise of the power of removal, by striking from the army register the name of either of the inspectors general, solely upon the Executive authority or responsibility. Deeming the legislation on the subject inchoate, as both those officers were engaged on highly important duties, and their services could not be dispensed with, without great injustice to the service, you were advised to follow the precedent of 1815, under similar circumstances, when the President found it impracticable to carry out the legislation of Congress, and suspended proceedings for the further action of the legislative body. As little more than two months would elapse before the opportunity for such action would present itself, you concluded to adopt that course. I beg leave, now, to express the decided conviction of this department, founded upon the information and advice of many of the most intelligent and experienced officers of the army, that the number of inspectors general cannot be reduced, without essential and permanent injury to the service. The reduction of the rank and file does not diminish the number of posts, of forts, of arsenals, or of depots. Without the inspection of an independent officer, in no way connected with the branch of service which may have charge of the public property, and not responsible for the condition of the troops, the Government will be obliged to rely mainly on the information of those whose feelings and whose interests would be adverse to the discovery of any delinquency. It is no imputation to apply to the military service the principles of supervision and check which pervade every other department of the Government. And to render such inspections effectual, it is indispensable that they should be conducted by officers not only of experience, but of high rank, whose authority would be respected. These observations are made here, in the hope that, on a reconsideration of the subject, it will be deemed most expedient to leave this part of the means of fulfilling the duties and meeting the responsibilities of the department, as it was established in 1821, when the army was reduced, and as it has continued since that time.

It appears, from statements furnished this department by the Second and Third Auditors, that the number of unsettled accounts in their offices has been considerably diminished since the last annual report. In the Second Auditor's office, there are none which were presented in 1840; that of those presented in 1841, 57, and of those presented in 1842, 815 remained unsettled—making 872 in the whole, and showing a reduction of 300 since the last annual report. In the Third Auditor's office, there remain unsettled, of the accounts presented in 1840, 294; of those presented in 1841, 345; and of those presented in 1842, 840—making 1,479, and exhibiting a reduction of the number stated in the last annual report, of 335. Although a decided improvement is thus shown, yet the number not disposed of is altogether too large. Some of them are known to be delayed for the want of explanation of deficient vouchers; but by far the greatest proportion have not been examined. Nothing can be more unjust to the faithful officers who have rendered their accounts, than the omission to settle them until the persons who could supply deficient vouchers are dead, or removed to unknown places, or until the means of explanation are lost or forgotten. It is a cruelty most ruinous in its result, which is believed not to exist in any other country. And its effects are very injurious to the Government. For it often happens that it is found necessary to charge another officer with a sum which has been paid or advanced to him by the one whose account is settled. During the delay that occurs in ascertaining the fact of such liability, the person to be charged becomes insolvent, or dies, or no trace of him can be found. I would most respectfully and most earnestly urge an increase of the force of the Second and Third Auditor's offices—at least temporarily, until the existing mass of accounts be disposed of. A very large proportion of the information called for by Congress is necessarily derived from these Auditors, and the time and labor required to furnish it are abstracted from the regular duties of the office. And this, doubtless, is the principal cause of their ordinary business being in arrear. They should, also, be relieved from the charge of what are called property accounts, which, in truth, belong to the administrative departments, rather than the accounting officers.

The accounts of the disbursing agents in the Indian Department are in a condition that defies any power of the executive officers to bring them to a close. Payments have been made to a large amount out of one fund, for objects legally authorized, but to which it was not by law applicable; and the agents remain charged with such payments, although they have rendered vouchers for the expenditure. Many accounts in other branches of the service are understood to be in a similar condition. A law authorizing transfers of appropriations, similar to that passed on the 27th January, 1831, to meet similar difficulties, which will not draw a dollar from the treasury, is demanded by the interest of the Government, and by a sense of justice to the agents. It is believed that they have accounted for the money placed in their hands; but it is impossible to have official certainty on the subject until their accounts are adjusted. The accounts of officers of the Quartermaster's Department, serving in Florida in 1838 and 1839, cannot be closed without legislative provision. The difficulty is stated in the report of the Quartermaster General, and I would respectfully solicit the passage of the necessary law to remove it.

I cannot close this report without again reverting to a subject that has so repeatedly been brought to the attention of Congress—namely, the inconvenience and the great insecurity of the outbuildings in which the offices of the Paymaster General, of the Ordnance Bureau, of the Bureaus of Engineers and of Topographical Engineers, of the Commissary General of Subsistence, of the Surgeon General, and of the Commissioner of Pensions, are kept. Vain as may be the effort, it is still a duty to ask that the invaluable papers and documents in those offices may be preserved from destruction, by being placed in a building not exposed, as they now are, to the slightest carelessness in the inhabitants of the houses that surround them.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN C. SPENCER.

To the PRESIDENT.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
December, 1842.

To the President of the United States:

SIR: I have the honor to present the following report, in relation to this department:

The home squadron, authorized by the act of the 1st day of August, 1841, has been put in commission, and placed under the command of Commodore Stewart. It is composed of the frigates Independence, the flag-ship now under the command of Captain Stringham; the frigate Constitution, Captain Parker; the steam-frigate Missouri, Captain Newton; the steam-frigate Mississippi, Captain Salter; the sloop Falmouth, Commander McIntosh; the sloop Vandalia, Commander Ramsey; the brig Dolphin, Commander Knight; and the schooner Grampus, Lieutenant Van Brunt.

The original design of this squadron was to cruise along our own coast, with a view to extend the usual protection to our trade; but more particularly to afford assistance to vessels in distress; to make accurate soundings and observations along our shores, from which charts might be formed; to afford vessels of different classes, always ready to take the places of those returning from distant stations; and to perform any occasional service for which vessels of war might be required. Finding, however, that it was unnecessarily large for these purposes, and that active employment could not be given to it, I determined to assign to it the duties of the West India squadron, and to withdraw that squadron from service. This has accordingly been done; and the cruising ground of the home squadron now extends from the Banks of Newfoundland to the river Amazon, including the Carribbean sea and Gulf of Mexico. This service requires one or two small vessels, in addition to those originally assigned to the squadron; and these I propose to add.

It is found that the steam-ships Missouri and Mississippi are unsuited to cruising in time of peace. Their engines consume so much fuel as to add enormously to their expenses; and the necessity that they should return to port after short intervals of time, for fresh supplies, renders it impossible to send them on any distant service. They will be useful vessels in time of war, as guards to our coasts and harbors, and as auxiliaries in fleets; but they cannot be relied on as cruisers, and are altogether too expensive for service in time of peace. I have therefore determined to take them out of commission, and shall substitute for them other and less expensive vessels.

The Independence has not yet gone to sea, owing in part to the fact that her crews have been taken from time to time for other vessels, and in part to the necessary engagements of Commodore Stewart in other services. The rest of the squadron has, under his orders, been kept actively and usefully employed, and promises to answer all the expectations of Congress in establishing it.

The duties originally contemplated for the home squadron are highly important, and such as require in the commander the best order of qualifications. They do not, however, require so many vessels as the law establishing that squadron authorizes. While, therefore, it is desirable that the squadron should be such as to be worthy of the best professional rank and talent, it is equally desirable that it should not be so large as to have any portion of it inactive. By assigning to it the duties of the West India squadron, and extending the cruising ground to the northern boundary of the cruising ground of the Brazil squadron, the larger vessels may be kept on constant duty to windward. In the mean time, the smaller vessels may, in like manner, be employed in the Caribbean sea and the Gulf of Mexico, where the harbors are too shallow to admit those of a larger size. The impossibility of beating up the coast, against the trade-winds and Gulf stream, suggests the propriety of assigning two or three steam-vessels of medium size to that duty. These would afford sufficient protection to our commerce, while they would serve to keep up the necessary intercourse between the commander of the squadron and that portion of it destined to service in the Gulf of Mexico. Without the aid of steam, that intercourse could not be well maintained; for a vessel, not propelled by steam, entering the Gulf of Mexico from the windward, could not regain her position without a tedious and dangerous passage through the Gulf of Florida.

The duties thus contemplated for the home squadron will afford full employment for it, except during the hurricane season, when it would not be prudent for it to keep the sea, except in the northern part of its cruising ground.

The Brazil squadron consists of the Delaware 74, Captain McCauly; the frigate Columbia, Captain E. R. Shubrick; the sloops of war Concord, Commander Boerum; John Adams, Commander Conover; Decatur, Commander Farragut; and the schooner Enterprise, Lieutenant J. P. Wilson; all under the command of Commodore Morris. This squadron, I have reason to believe, has distinguished itself for good order, discipline, and constant and strict attention to all the appropriate duties and exercises of squadron service. I have also the pleasure to report that the interests of our citizens, committed to the care of Commodore Morris, have been fully protected and secured; and that our relations with the countries within the range of his command have been preserved on the most favorable and honorable footing.

After the return of the frigate Brandywine, in July last, the squadron in the Mediterranean consisted of only two sloops of war—the Fairfield, Commander Tattnall, and the Preble, Commander Voorhees; under the command of Commodore Morgan. I regret to say that Commander Voorhees died at Smyrna on the 27th July last; he was an officer of a high order of merit, and his death is a serious loss to his country. The Preble is now under the command of Commander Nicholson; and Commander Bigelow has succeeded Commander Tattnall, who has returned to the United States.

On the 15th of July last, the frigate Congress,

Captain P. F. Voorhees, sailed for the Mediterranean; and, on the 29th of August last, the Columbus 74, Captain Spencer, was despatched to the same station. The squadron now consists of the Columbus, Congress, Fairfield, and Preble—all under the command of Commodore Morgan. Orders have been given, however, assigning to Commodore Morris the command of the Mediterranean squadron, and to Commodore Morgan that of the Brazil squadron. This exchange is made in execution of a plan which I propose for the management of all our squadrons, and of which I shall speak more at large in a subsequent part of this report.

Our relations with the countries of the Mediterranean have been preserved on the most friendly footing, with the single exception of the empire of Morocco. In consequence of an outrage, offered by a subordinate officer of that Government, to the late Consul of the United States, Mr. Carr, it was deemed necessary to call on the higher authorities to disavow the act, and to punish the aggressor. This was promptly done by Commodore Morgan; and, after many delays and much unnecessary formality on the part of the Emperor, ample redress was afforded by the public disavowal of the offence, and the dismissal of the offending officer. Commodore Morgan appears to have conducted this affair with much skill and address, asserting with proper firmness the respect due to our flag, and yet claiming nothing in an arrogant or dictatorial spirit. I have every reason to be satisfied with the part he has borne in this delicate transaction. The friendly relations between the two countries are now restored.

The squadron in the Pacific consists of the frigate United States, Captain Armstrong; sloop Cyane, Commander Stribling; sloop Yorktown, Lieutenant Nicholas; sloop Dale, Commander Dornin; and the schooner Shark, Lieutenant Eagle—all under the command of Commodore T. Ap C. Jones. The St. Louis, Commander Forrest, returned on the 16th September last, and her place has not yet been supplied.

Nothing has occurred, since my last report, to interrupt the friendly relations of our country with the nations bordering on the Pacific coast of America. Our squadron has, at all times, ably and faithfully performed its duty; but it is much too small to render all the services expected of it in that remote region. Every part of that vast ocean is traversed by our trading vessels, and in every part of it the protection of our naval flag is consequently required. The few ships allowed, even to the largest squadron that we have ever sent to the Pacific, are not enough to guard our whaling interest alone. It can scarcely be expected that five or six vessels, (most of which are of the smallest class,) can properly protect our commerce and our people, along a coast of three thousand miles in extent, and throughout an ocean four thousand miles wide. I respectfully suggest that too little attention has heretofore been paid to the important interests of our country in the Pacific ocean. There is, at this time, a stronger necessity than ever for more strict vigilance and more active exertion on our part, to prevent other nations from subjecting our trade to injurious restrictions and embarrassments. The English settlers have, by their enterprise, nearly engrossed the trade from the Columbia river to the islands, so that our countrymen are as effectually cut off from it as if they had no rights in that quarter. The people of various countries are rapidly forming settlements all along the shores of the Pacific, from Columbia river to the Gulf of California; and this, too, with the countenance and support of their respective Governments. In the mean time, we are doing literally nothing for our own interests in that quarter. To those of our people who are inclined to settle there, we do not even hold out the encouragement of a reasonable expectation that we will protect them against the violence and injustice of other nations. A few small vessels, scarcely as many as we ought to keep constantly on the coast of each of the South American nations, on the Pacific—these, too, charged with the duties which twice their number would not be able to perform—can offer but little aid or support to the infant settlements of our people, remote from each other, and demanding the constant presence of some protecting power. There are many considerations, connected with this subject, of deep importance in themselves, but which belong rather to other departments of the Government than to this. I advert to them only so far as to justify me in recommending a very large increase of the Pacific squadron.

In the East Indies we have only two ships—the frigate Constellation, Captain Kearney, commanding the squadron; and the sloop-of-war Boston, Commander Long. It is owing more to our good fortune than to our strength, that our commerce has suffered no material interruption. That little squadron has done all that could have been expected of it; and it deserves much credit for its great vigilance and activity, and for the prudence and sound discretion with which Commodore Kearney has acquitted himself of the important trusts reposed in him.

On the coast of Africa we have no squadron. The small appropriation of the present year was believed to be scarcely sufficient to answer the pressing demands of more important stations; and hence no vessel has been equipped expressly for the African seas. The sloop-of-war Vandalia, Commander Ramsay, belonging to the home squadron, was assigned to that service in March last, and is still on the coast. The ratification of the treaty with England renders it necessary that a squadron of at least eighty guns should be assigned to that service.

I regret to say that, in consequence of the unprotected condition of our trade on that coast, several of our vessels have been captured by the natives, and their crews barbarously murdered. The last aggression of this sort was upon the schooner Mary Carver, Captain Farwell, in the district of Beribee, ninety miles south of Cape Palmas. Instructions have been given to Commander Ramsay to proceed to that point, and demand such reparation as the circumstanees of the case may require. This, however, will be at best but little satisfactory, since no chastisement which can be inflicted upon such savages can either do honor to our flag, or prevent other outrages of the like kind. Our commerce with Africa is rapidly increasing, and is well worthy of all the protection which it asks. This protection is to be derived, not from any terror which can be inspired by the destruction of a few miserable villages on the sea-beach, but from the presence of armed vessels, able to prevent, as well as to punish, all violations of the rights and laws of fair trade.

I need scarcely add that our duty in the suppression of the slave-trade cannot be discharged without a much larger force on the coast of Africa than we have ever yet maintained there.

The return of the exploring squadron, late under the command of Lieutenant Charles Wilkes, has given to the country rich and abundant stores in all the departments of natural history. I am now arranging them, under the authority of a law of the last session of Congress. Lieutenant Wilkes himself is engaged in preparing a narrative of his voyage, and in completing the various charts of the numerous surveys made under his direction. In this work he has, at his own request, the assistance of Lieutenants O. Carr, T. A. Budd, and G. M. Totten, of the navy. I regret that I have no authority to furnish him with the additional aid which he has a right to expect, from the scientific corps attached to the expedition. There is no fund under my control, out of which a compensation could be paid to them. I respectfully suggest that provision ought to be made for this. The country looks, with very deep interest, for the results of this expedition; and it is due, not less to the officers concerned in it, than to the country itself, that they should be fairly and properly laid before the world. It can scarcely be expected that Mr. Wilkes, even with the aid of the few naval officers whose assistance he has asked, can in any short time accomplish a task of so much labor; nor is it reasonable to suppose that naval officers, however skilled in what properly belongs to their profession, will be able to perfect the drawings and other mechanical works, and works of art, necessary to prepare this publication in the style contemplated by Congress.

When I had the honor to present to you the usual report from this department, at the commencement of the last session of Congress, I proceeded upon the idea that it was the settled policy of the Government gradually to increase the navy. Notwithstanding the favorable change which has since occurred in our foreign relations, and notwithstanding the present unfavorable condition of the public treasury, I have seen no reason to believe that this policy is less approved now than heretofore, by the great body of our people. It is true that the circumstances in which we are now placed, render necessary very great modifications of the systems which would otherwise be proper; but the opinion is as general now as it ever has been, that a suitable navy is absolutely necessary to the protection of our trade, the security of our people, and the respectability of our Government. Fortunately, there is nothing in the circumstances of our country to render this, in any degree, a local question. Apart from the general proposition, that what is best for the general interest should be regarded as best for the whole, there is a local and particular interest in nine-tenths of our country, which demands a respectable naval establishment. The commercial towns on our sea-board, by which nearly all our foreign and coasting trade is conducted, have so immediate and due an interest in the subject, as to render unnecessary any remarks upon that point. The various agricultural and manufacturing classes scattered throughout the country, and connected with and dependent upon this trade, have an indirect interest not less apparent. The great and increasing commerce of the lakes, although less exposed than that of the ocean, is yet far too important to be left undefended, even against the single power which may become its enemy. But the Gulf of Mexico has peculiar claims. It is believed that there is not in the world an equal amount of commercial and agricultural interests belonging to any one country, so much at the mercy of the most inconsiderable maritime force as is that of the Gulf of Mexico. Not only the States which lie immediately upon that water, but all those whose streams enter into it, including the vast and fertile region of the Mississippi and its tributary waters, make this their chief channel of commerce; and we may properly add, also, no inconsiderable amount in the article of cotton sent from Texas, by means of the Red river, and paying tribute to our commercial agencies in its transit through our territory. Cotton is the principal material of our trade, both foreign and domestic; it probably constitutes three-fourths of our exports in its raw and manufactured states. Taking the year ending on the 31st August, 1842, it is found that the whole cotton crop amounted to 1,683,574 bales; of which 1,160,389 were shipped from the ports of the Gulf of Mexico. Of this crop, 1,465,249 bales were exported to foreign countries; and of these exports, 937,830 bales were from the ports of that Gulf. Thus it may be assumed that two-thirds of the most valuable article of our commerce, foreign and coastwise, is shipped in the ports of the Gulf of Mexico.

In other articles the productions of the West, the proportion, (although, perhaps, not quite so large,) is yet large enough to give peculiar importance to the Gulf of Mexico. The tobacco, the iron, the lead, the sugar, the hemp, and the provisions of that great and rich region, (and in a few years we may add also its coal,) find their way to market chiefly through that single channel. These already form no inconsiderable part of the entire exports of our country; and will, after no long process of time, enter still more largely into our trade, both foreign and domestic. Without pretending to perfect accuracy, we may safely assume that not less than two-thirds of the entire commerce of our country, exclusive of the whale fisheries, passes through the Gulf of Mexico; and we may, with even more safety, assume that this proportion will increase from year to year, with the increase of the population and wealth of our Western States.

It is to be borne in mind that nearly all this valuable trade is carried on through the Gulf of Florida. I had the honor to present my views upon this subject, in a report which I made to the Senate during the last session of Congress, but which was not acted on by that body. I respectfully refer to that document, as containing many suggestions connected with this inquiry, which I believe to be not wholly unworthy of public attention. I repeat here only the well-known fact—that, in consequence of the strength of the Gulf stream and trade-winds, there is virtually no passage for our trade eastward, on the south side of the island of Cuba. It must, of necessity, pass through the Gulf of Florida—a narrow strait, which can be effectually blockaded by two active steam-frigates, and probably by one. Even if a trading vessel should pass such a blockading force in the night, it would have but one path open to it for a great distance, and might of course be pursued with a certainty of being overtaken. It would not enjoy even the ordinary chances of a vessel escaping from a blockaded port into a wide and open sea.

The facts to which I have thus adverted show a striking peculiarity in our condition. The greatest portion of our commerce, confined to a single channel of some hundreds of miles, is exposed in a peculiar manner to any enemy having possession of the sea; and—what would render our condition still worse—if we be without a naval force, that commerce may be annihilated at a cost which would not be felt by any tenth-rate maritime power!

If these views be correct, I am at loss to perceive what portion of our country is not interested in them. To the States bordering on the Gulf of Mexico, and to all those which use the Mississippi river as a channel of trade, the subject is of a deep and daily-increasing interest. So far as their prosperity depends on the outlet of the various productions of their country, they have but a single question to decide: is, or is not, their commerce worth the cost of a naval power adequate to protect it? It has no other protection, and it cannot have any other until its present channels shall be changed.

To these considerations are to be added others, growing out of the peculiar character of our Government and institutions, and the exposed condition of our lake and sea coast. On these points I can only repeat the suggestions offered in my last report. No country in the world has a greater interest than ours to guard itself against invasion. If we are destined to see again the smoke of an enemy's camp, we should at least be careful not to allow it to ascend from our own soil. It is in all other respects better for us to repel an enemy from our own coast, than to subdue him after he had landed upon our shores. To do this, we must cherish our naval power—not as the institution of a day or of a year—not as a subject which we can lay aside, and take up again whenever we please, as the policy or the caprice of the moment may dictate; but as a great and permanent institution, worthy of a great people, and demanding the grave attention of Government—an institution resting upon a wise system, and worthy to be maintained in the spirit of a liberal, comprehensive, and stable policy.

These considerations forbid us to fall so far in the rear of other nations, and of the age in which we live, as to surrender our due share of the dominion of the seas. A commerce such as ours demands the protection of an adequate naval force; our people, scattered all over the world, have a right to require the occasional presence of our flag, to give assurance to all nations that their country has both the will and the power to protect them. Our position among the nations is such as to leave us without excuse, if we voluntarily strip ourselves of a power which all other nations are anxious to grasp. Our forms of government and municipal institutions suggest that a naval force is our safest, and perhaps our only, defence; and as an additional recommendation of no small weight, the expenditure which this defence requires is to be made chiefly among our own people, encouraging their enterprise, invigorating their industry, and calling out the abundant (and now almost hidden) resources of our country.

If our navy is not to be put down altogether, nor abandoned to neglect and decay, it is high time that it were placed upon some fixed and permanent plan. With a view to this, I respectfully offer the following suggestions.

In the present favorable condition of our foreign relations, promising a long continuance of peace, I cannot recommend any considerable appropriation for building new vessels of war. We have already as many vessels as it will be necessary to keep in commission—except, perhaps, in the classes of sloops of war and small brigs and schooners. A few more of these are required, and they can be built out of materials now on hand, at a very small cost. It seems to me to be too obvious to admit of doubt, that our true policy is to apply as much as possible of the appropriations for the general naval service, to the employment of ships in commission.

I hope to be excused for repeating here an idea thrown out in my last report, and which I am anxious to enforce, because it is the foundation of all sound policy in regard to the navy: It is an easy thing to build a ship of war; it is a difficult thing to qualify an officer to command her. This simple proposition, which every one knows to be true, should never be lost sight of by a nation that does not intend to abandon the ocean altogether. It requires at least five years of strict attention to make a good seaman; and not less than twenty years of active service, in different grades, to form a properly qualified naval commander. Surely, then, since competent officers cannot spring up with every exigency which may require their services, true policy demands that we should keep the requisite number of them in constant training, to be ready whenever their country shall call for them. The best ship of war is powerless, when unskilfully commanded. We build fleets for our enemies, when we put them in charge of incompetent men.

In order to carry out this idea, it is necessary not only that we should keep more ships in commission than heretofore, but that we should employ them in a different manner. Our squadrons on foreign stations have been generally kept too much in port; have been too little employed in cruising, and too seldom exercised in squadron manœuvres. To remedy this, I propose a system of interchange between the several squadrons; and with that view, so to arrange them that no ship (except, perhaps, that of the commander-in-chief) shall remain more than one year on the same station. I propose that the squadrons of the Mediterranean and the Brazils shall consist, as near as possible, of the same number and classes of vessels; and that the same equality shall prevail between those of the East Indies and the Pacific. After particular intervals of time, a vessel of the Mediterranean squadron shall be sent to Brazil; and, at the same time, one of the same description from Brazil to the Mediterranean: and so of the squadrons of the East Indies and the Pacific. The advantages of this system are great and obvious.

1. By keeping the ships more at sea, the officers will be more exercised in their proper duties, and will acquire more of the science and practice of their profession.

2. Discipline will be better learned and better enforced, both as officers and crews. It is always relaxed while vessels are in port.

3. The dangerous connexions and fatal habits, so often formed amid the seductions of luxurious ports, will be avoided.

4. Officers will have a better opportunity to become acquainted with different coasts and harbors; with their currents, winds, &c.; with the languages, manners, customs, &c., of different regions of the globe: all which information is indispensable to an accomplished naval commander.

5. The flag of the country will be displayed in different ports, on many different vessels; thereby given to foreign countries a better idea of the extent of our naval power. Heretofore, the habit of sending the same vessels repeatedly to the same foreign station, has produced the impression that we had no others to send, and has thus detracted from the respect which ought to attach to us as a naval power.

6. Our vessels of war will be kept constantly in the tracks of our commerce, and be thus ready, on all occasions and in all places, to afford to us whatever assistance it may need. In this way the small force destined for the protection of our African trade, and for the suppression of the slave-trade, may be occasionally strengthened by the presence of vessels of war interchanging between the Mediterranean and the Brazils. But the great interest of our commerce in the Pacific—and particularly that most important part of it, the whale fisheries—will derive peculiar advantages from this system. At present, most of our whalers rarely see one of our vessels of war, although it is well understood that they often need their protection. Our national ships, crossing the Pacific, should be directed to visit the whaling stations; a process by which that distant and now neglected part of our commerce may always be within the reach of the protecting arm of their country.

The system thus proposed will require, in order to prosecute it with all its advantages, larger squadrons than we have heretofore employed. The good effects, however, which may reasonably be expected from it, will, it is hoped, recommend it to adoption. The charge upon the treasury need not be materially (if at all) increased, if the appropriations heretofore made for "increase and repair" should be, as far as possible, for "equipment, pay, and subsistence."

I have caused estimates to be prepared for such squadrons as could, in my opinion, be most usefully and profitably employed in the manner above mentioned. This it is my duty to do, submitting it to Congress to determine whether, under the circumstances of the country, so large a force can properly be put in commission, or not. If the condition of the treasury will warrant it, (of which they are the judges,) I have no hesitation in earnestly recommending the employment of the largest force estimated for. But, in order that Congress may, without trouble, apportion the appropriation to the force which they are willing to keep in commission, I have caused to be prepared a table, showing the cost of a ship of each class. Thus the reduction in the estimates may be made in exact proportion to the reduction of the vessels in commission.

Whether it be the pleasure of Congress to authorize a large or small naval force, the necessity will be the same for placing it on a proper footing. The navy cannot be reformed by merely reducing its size. In my report of last year, I invited your attention to a variety of points on which I considered legislation necessary, in order to give due efficiency to this department, and to correct the abuses existing throughout the whole naval establishment. In my opinion, every reform necessary to place the navy upon the most useful, and at the same time upon the most economical footing, may be easily effected. With that view, I respectfully offer the following suggestions:

So far as the materiel is concerned, nothing is required except fidelity, vigilance, and industry on the part of those to whom that matter is intrusted; and such changes in the laws as will insure a proper accountability. A great deal has already been accomplished in this respect. It is confidently believed that the expense of building, repairing, and equipping our vessels of war, is much less at this time than it was at any previous period within the last twenty years. This result is attributable, not so much to the head of the department, as to the steady and zealous efforts of those officers of the navy who have had charge of the navy-yards. Little is now required, except to establish a rigid system of accountability in every branch of expenditure. Much has already been done to attain this object.

The law for the re-organization of this department has been carried out, as far as has been found practicable. The advantages of this change in the increased facilities of transacting business, and in the concentration of responsibilities, are manifest and great. I regret to say, however, that the system is yet very imperfect. It is with extreme reluctance that I bring this subject again to your notice; and I should not do so, if I were not convinced that it is the wish of Congress to make the work of reform, which they have just commenced, as perfect as possible. The bill, as it passed the Senate, would, it is believed, have proved as complete and effective in its provisions, as could be reasonably expected of any new measure, running so much into details; but the changes which were made in it by the House of Representatives have produced difficulties and embarrassments in practice, which were not foreseen at the time. The uniting of two bureaus, whose duties are wholly distinct, and require a wholly different order of qualifications to discharge them, has been found extremely inconvenient and embarrassing. The bureau

f construction and repairs, for example, is charged vith duties of the bureau of equipment. It requires ship carpenter to build or repair a vessel of war; it equires a naval officer to equip her. In like manner, he providing of ordnance and ordnance stores has io natural connexion with hydrographical surveys; nd these two subjects are intrusted to the same ureau. It would probably be impossible to find ny one man properly qualified to perform all the luties of building, repairing, and equipping a vessel f war; and although it would not, perhaps, be so lifficult to find one competent to the duties of the wo bureaux of ordnance and hydrography, yet it would probably happen, in most instances, that he who was best qualified for the one, would be least qualified for the other. Besides, great confusion will necessarily exist, in keeping, by the same set of clerks, the accounts of matters so wholly distinct. The clerical force allowed to these two bureaux is much too small. Indeed, this is true (though not to the same extent) of the other bureaux. The severe labors imposed, and the small salaries allowed, are positive discouragements to a zealous and energetic discharge of duty.

In providing a chief of the bureau of construction, equipment, and repair, the alternative was between a naval captain qualified to equip, and a naval constructor qualified to build and repair. I did not hesitate to prefer the former, and the place is filled by a member of the late Board of Navy Commissioners. But, in uniting the two bureaux, it was, I presume, not perceived that the salary, originally contemplated for the bureau of construction and repairs, was retained. Thus it happens that one of the captains, at the head of a bureau, receives five hundred dollars per annum less than his pay as captain in command; and less, by the same sum, than is received by each of the captains holding correspondent stations in the department. This was doubtless not intended, and will be corrected.

I also respectfully suggest that there is no good reason for giving to the chief of the bureau of medicine a less salary than is received by others in corresponding positions. He ought to be, and it is presumed always will be, a man of a high order of professional attainments and general education, holding a social position equal, in all respects, to that of any other man. His expenses, of course, will be as great, and his sacrifices certainly will not be less. Of the importance and utility of this bureau, I already have the most satisfactory proof, in the improved organization of the medical department of the service, and in the saving of expense greatly beyond my expectations. An expenditure, twice as large as the bureau now calls for, will be more than twice saved annually, by its services. Its claims, therefore, to the increase of salary which I recommend, are of the strongest character in every respect.

These defects in the law are obvious. Whenever they shall be corrected, it is confidently believed that a system of administration may be established in this department, as prompt, exact, and efficient as can be found in any other department of the Government. The acts of the last session, "to establish and regulate the navy ration," and "to regulate the pay of pursers and other officers of the navy," promise he most beneficial results to the economy of the service; and will probably remove many of the difficulties which would otherwise have existed, in accomplishing all the objects proposed in the reorganization of the department.

The personnel of the navy is a subject of much deeper interest, although it presents no greater difficulties. That abuses exist, and that the public eye is occasionally offended with displays of disreputable behavior, is not surprising. Such things might be expected in any body of men equally numerous; they are seen every day in social circles on shore, without affixing to those circles any individual, or even general reproach. The navy is as free from such scandals as any equal number of men in any order of society. It is matter of just surprise that it should be so. Withdrawn, in a great degree, by the very nature of their pursuits, from the immediate influence of that public opinion which is the best corrective of manners, and with a most imperfect system of laws and regulations as a substitute for it, what is there but their own sense of propriety to prevent naval officers from falling into the worst excesses? For twenty years past, the navy has received from the Government little more than a step-mother's care. It was established without plan, and has been conducted upon no principle, fixed and regulated by law. Left to get along as well as it could, the wonder is, that it retains even a remnant of the character which it won so gloriously during the last war.

Reform, in this particular, must commence with the midshipmen. After a time, these boys become men, and these midshipmen become lieutenants, and commanders, and captains. Hence it is of the utmost importance that none should be appointed who are not duly qualified, and suited in all respects to that peculiar service. And yet, to this great and fundamental truth no attention has hitherto been paid. The department has been left free to appoint whom it pleased, and as many as it pleased, without any law whatever to guide or regulate its judgment. The only rule by which the Secretary can be governed, is to appoint those who are, or who seem to be, best recommended; and yet, in half the cases, the boy himself is as well known as those who certify in his favor. Hence the Secretary acts in the dark, and must, of necessity, be often in error. It is a notorious fact, that wayward and incorrigible boys, whom even parental authority cannot control, are often sent to the navy, as a mere school of discipline, or to save them from the reproach to which their conduct exposes them on shore. It is not often that skilful officers or valuable men are made out of such materials. The corrective which I propose is this:

1. The naval establishment shall be fixed by law; ascertaining, among other things, the number of officers to be allowed in each grade. There must be a due proportion among the several grades, or else it will be impossible that the different duties of the service can be properly discharged. In this respect, the proviso of the appropriation bill of the last session of Congress, limiting the number of midshipmen to the number who were in service on the 1st January, 1841, and of other officers to the number who were in service on the 1st January, 1842, will, if persisted in, prove extremely unfortunate in its action. The precise proportion, proper for the effective officering of a ship, depends upon her class. We may find, in an average of the different ships, a rule near enough to perfect accuracy to afford a safe guide of legislation upon the subject. But this proportion is wholly destroyed by the proviso above mentioned; so that it will be impossible, under that law, to furnish the proper officers for the several stations of our ships of war, supposing any considerable number of our captains and commanders to be employed. The inconvenience of that proviso is already felt, in regard to the medical officers in the service. I had the honor to represent, at the last session, the pressing necessity for an increase of the number of surgeons and assistants. There are not now in service enough to afford the aid which it is the acknowledged duty of the Government to afford to those who are engaged in her service at sea; and yet, whatever may be the necessity for them, their numbers cannot be increased. In regard to the forward warrant officers, (such as boatswain, carpenter, gunner, &c.,) the restriction is scarcely less inconvenient. They are appointed only as their services are required; so that there is no danger that their numbers will be inconveniently great. At all events, they should bear a due proportion to the other officers.

2. There should be established proper naval schools on shore. Little or no attention has hitherto been paid to the proper education of naval officers. Through a long course of years, the young midshipmen were left to educate themselves and one another; and it is creditable to them that they lost few opportunities of doing so. Suitable teachers are now provided for them; but their schools are kept in receiving ships and cruising vessels, in the midst of a thousand interruptions and impediments which render the whole system of little or no value. Under such circumstances, the foundation of a solid and useful education can rarely be laid. This subject was brought to the attention of Congress at its last session, and a bill establishing a naval school passed the Senate. It was not acted on by the House of Representatives, for want of time. I again earnestly recommend it, convinced, as I am, that its effect upon the navy will be in the highest degree beneficial. If adopted, Congress will, of course, prescribe such rules and regulations in regard to it, as may seem to them proper; but I respectfully suggest the following as the outline of the system:

The school shall be established at such of the old military fortifications on the seaboard as may afford suitable accommodations, and as may not be required by the War Department.

The officers and teachers shall be supplied from those actually in the naval service; and all nautical instruments, boats for practice, &c., shall be furnished from the navy. This will save nearly the whole expense of the schools.

Instruction in the schools shall be given to candidates for admission into the navy, and to midshipmen actually in the service.

The admission of candidates shall be regulated by law, as is done in regard to the West Point Academy.

No boy shall receive an acting appointment in the navy, until he shall have passed a certain period of diligent study at a naval school; nor unless he shall produce the necessary certificates from his officers and instructors of his good conduct, capacity, physical ability, and general fitness.

Among those who shall produce such certificates, appointments shall be made according to such rule as Congress shall prescribe.

These precautions will afford a reasonable assurance that no boy will be admitted into the navy, without being qualified for, and worthy of, that station. But the watchful care of the Government over him should not stop here. He should receive, in the first instance, an acting appointment, (as is now the practice,) and not be entitled to a full appointment until he shall have seen at least one year's service at sea, and made suitable progress in the science and practical duties of the service. After receiving his full appointment, he should pass not less than five years in active service at sea, before he should be entitled to examination for a warrant as "passed midshipman." That examination should be rigorous and thorough, and none should be entitled to it who could not produce the most satisfactory proofs of good conduct, attainments, capacity, and general fitness. By this time, the boy will have attained a period of life when the character is generally well developed, and, in some degree, fixed; so that the country will have good reason to trust him in the higher grades of the service. A corps of officers, formed of such materials, would probably present few instances of misconduct or incapacity; and would reflect honor on the country, while rendering to it the most valuable services.

This system could not fail to relieve the personnel of the navy, after a time, of all its present incumbrances, and would certainly tend to keep it in a healthy condition. But it would be too slow in its operation for the cure of existing evils. Probably there never was a similar institution in any country, into which abuses have not crept, after so long a period as thirty years of profound peace, and of consequent neglect. Governments and their people are too apt to overlook the military arm, when there is no immediate need of its protection; forgetting the wise maxim, that in peace we should prepare for war. Our navy has experienced its full share of those unfavorable influences; and the natural consequence is seen in the admitted fact, that it contains some officers who do no credit to their commissions. Their number, however, is much smaller than might have been justly expected, under the operation of so many discouraging and corrupting causes. Every nation finds it necessary, after particular intervals of peace, to revise and reform its military establishments; and the time has now arrived when such a corrective may be advantageously applied to the navy of the United States. The only difficulty is in adopting the right process. To dismiss from the service officers who have committed no positive offence, would be unjust and cruel. The nature of their profession is such as to disqualify them for nearly all the pursuits of industry on shore. Most of them have been kept long on probation, and have been thus encouraged to expect that they would remain in the service. Many of them now have families dependent on them, who would be exposed to great suffering if the public support should be entirely withdrawn. On the other hand, it is to be borne in mind that the officer stipulates with his country, that he will be both willing and able to perform all the duties of the station which he solicits and receives at her hand; and he has, therefore, no right to complain that she rejects him when he proves either neglectful or incompetent. Perhaps no more just rule can be adopted than to compel the officer to retire, upon a certain proportion of his annual pay. A system of compulsory furlough, properly regulated, and guarded against abuse, would have the most salutary effect. To lodge such a power in the Secretary of the Navy, would probably not be generally acceptable. The natural jealousy which every one feels of whatever approaches to arbitrary power, would present a strong objection with most persons to intrusting so much to the discretion of any one man. For myself, however, I have no doubt that the only danger would be that the power would be too cautiously and too seldom exerted. Public opinion, in this country, is a sure corrective of all abuses of that sort; and no man, who valued either his reputation or his comfort, would hazard the one or the other by challenging that public opinion for the indulgence of any feeling unbecoming the impartial justice of his station. Still, however, it is desirable, not only that the department should be in fact just and impartial, but that the public and the navy officers should believe it to be so. I propose, therefore, that, whenever the Secretary of the Navy shall be of opinion that an officer is unfit for the service, he shall be required to present his name to the Senate for furlough; stating fully, (if required so to do,) the reasons for that opinion. If the Senate, after such inquiry as it may choose to institute, shall concur with him, the officer shall be put on furlough upon a certain proportion—say one-half his pay, and be considered out of the service. In this way, the same power that appoints, will remove; and the act, receiving the sanction of the Senate, will be placed above the suspicion of injustice or oppression.

It may be urged, as an objection to this plan, that it will create a body of quasi pensioners upon the treasury, who have done nothing to deserve such favor. This is not true in point of fact. These officers are already in the service; and if they be not put on furlough, will receive their whole pay instead of only half of it. No officer will ever be put on furlough if he be really qualified for the service; and if he be not qualified, he ought not to be, and I presume will not be, called into service at all. Of course, he will remain a dead weight upon the treasury, to the full amount of his whole pay. To put him on furlough, therefore, is a positive relief to the treasury, to the extent of one-half his pay.

But the evil, if it really be one, will be of very short duration. When the navy officer shall come to understand that there is a process more certain and summary than a trial by court-martial, by which his dignity and his income may both be reduced, he will be cautious not to bring himself within such peril. The effect of the furlough system will be to create a new motive on the part of the naval officer to exert himself to excel in his profession, and to place himself above suspicion in point of personal character and conduct. The belief, heretofore prevailing, that an officer of any standing in the navy could not be driven out of it, or at least that he could not be kept out of it, has had a strong influence in ruining its discipline, and corrupting its morals and manners. The furlough system, firmly administered, will serve to remove this impression; and, with the assistance of an unsparing and impartial administration of the law, through courts-martial, will soon purify the service, and will long keep it pure. When the inefficient, who are now in the navy, shall have been removed, it is probable that the treasury will thereafter be rarely taxed with the pay of furloughed officers. The necessity of some mode of proceeding, by which the navy may be rid of the incompetent as well as of the guilty, is universally admitted; and I have not been able to devise any mode more just, more effective, or less objectionable on the score of expense, than that which I now suggest.

If this system should be fully and faithfully carried out, I do not perceive that anything more will be necessary to insure to the navy competent and honorable officers. Hitherto it has been their great misfortune, that with fewer opportunities than others to educate themselves, the Government has done nothing to educate them. The cadet from West Point enters the army well-founded in the principles of solid and useful learning, and fully prepared to engage with advantage in any pursuit, whether of civil or military life. The candidate for the navy, on the contrary, is deemed well enough qualified if he be able to read and write, to answer a few simple questions in geography and English grammar, and to solve plain problems in the elementary rules of arithmetic. Why should this difference be made? Important as a proper preparatory education may be to the army officer, it is even more important to the officer of the navy. Apart from the fact that he has few opportunities to improve himself, it is to be remembered that he is the most frequent representative of his country abroad; the standard by which foreign nations will be most apt to measure her moral and intellectual character. He is also frequently intrusted with important and delicate negotiations, involving the rights of our citizens, and the peace and honor of our country. The function of the naval commander is much more useful, important, and dignified, than is generally supposed. To his skill and vigilance are intrusted, at every hour of the day and night, the safety of the ship, and the lives of her crew. The honor of his country's flag, and, in a great degree, her harmonious relations in peace, and her protection in war, are among the awful trusts with which he is clothed. Very few men can be found qualified in every respect for so high and imposing an office; and, unhappily, there are too few among those who now hold it, who duly feel its importance and dignity. I humbly think that it is a high duty of Government to adopt every means, calculated in any degree to elevate the standard of character in the naval commander, and to fit him in knowledge, in professional skill, and in personal character, to discharge the high and solemn duties of his office. This can be best done, by giving him a suitable preparatory education, and by providing proper and ready means of removing him from the ranks of his profession, whenever he may be found unworthy to occupy a place in them.

I respectfully renew the suggestion heretofore made, that there is yet one thing more, necessary to complete the process of reform. The naval officer should feel that he has a place in the respect and confidence of his country, and that the honors and distinctions which his services shall have earned will not be withheld from him. PROMOTION is the vital principle of military service; and hence as many grades should be established as may be found consistent with the due order and efficiency of the service. The experience of every day tends to confirm me in the belief that the several grades of admiral, vice admiral, and rear admiral, ought to be established in our navy. I had the honor to bring this subject to your notice in my last report, and to urge such reasons as seemed to me to be sufficient in support of the recommendation now renewed. I have only to add that this important measure need not increase the expenses of the navy at all. It will afford an opportunity to reward, by well-deserved promotion, many officers in the several grades, who are well qualified for the highest stations and most important duties of the service. These men, most of whom would soon become the ornaments and grace of any other navy in the world, are likely, under our present system, to grow gray in subordinate and obscure stations; their merits unacknowledged and their usefulness thrown away. We may at least be allowed to regret that the higher officers of the navy—those who, by their services in war, have reflected most honor on their country, and given the best proofs of their own merits—are so rapidly passing from the stage of life, that even if our policy in this respect should ultimately change, others are likely to reap the honors which they have so richly earned. This should be deemed by a generous country a reason for adopting, at once, a policy which, beyond all doubt, will ultimately be forced upon us, if we shall continue to maintain any navy at all.

I again respectfully ask for an increase in the number of marines, and of marine officers of the lower grades. Not less than twenty millions of dollars of the public property are now exposed in our navy-yards, to conflagration and theft, for want of proper marine guards. Thefts to a considerable extent have recently been detected, and doubtless others have been committed which never will be detected. One fire, which a single additional marine might prevent, would probably destroy in a few hours more than the expenses of the whole marine force for ten years. Surely, it cannot be true economy to leave so much of the public property exposed to such great dangers, oir want of so very cheap a protection as a few additional marines.

It is an object of great interest to me, to make the navy subservient to the encouragement of American industry. This may be done, not only by the protection which it affords to American commerce, (upon which I have already commented,) but also by means of the supplies which it requires. We are probably the only people in the world who can, with perfect convenience, build, equip, arm, feed, and clothe a navy of the largest size from our own home resources. A nation of any magnitude, having all the materials of war constantly at its command, is essentially powerful. Hence it is of the utmost importance that we should adopt a policy calculated at once to cherish and to develop these sources of our strength and security. The measures more immediately necessary to accomplish this object have already been brought to the notice of Congress; but, as they have not yet been acted on, it would seem to be proper that I should again refer to them.

The first in importance is the preservation of navy timber, growing on the public lands. No other country possesses so rich a store of this material as the United States. Properly protected, it would afford a supply for the largest navy in the world, for an indefinite time, without any sensible diminution. But I regret to say that the laws which have been enacted with this view, are in some respects inoperative, and in all respects inefficient. Depredations of the most ruinous kind are daily committed, in spite of all the vigilance which this department can use, and in defiance of all the power which it is authorized to exert. Our own people are daily selling to the Government, timber which they take against law, from the public lands; and it is understood that large supplies of the same timber are already contracted for by foreign Governments. It is impossible to prevent these depredations under existing laws. The subject is, in my opinion, worthy of the serious and prompt attention of Congress. If they should thoroughly investigate it, the information which this department can afford will not fail to convince them of the necessity of a reform in the laws relating to it, and of additional grants of power and means to the officers of the Government to whom they may choose to intrust this valuable part of the public property.

The subject next in importance is the establishment of a navy-yard on the largest scale, on the waters of the lower Mississippi. I had the honor to give my views upon this subject, in a report to the Senate of the 31st of January last. Respectfully referring to that report, I forbear to repeat at large the suggestions which it offers. I will only say that the object which I have in view is to afford whatever facilities such an establishment can afford to the industry of the whole valley of the Mississippi, now cut off, in a great degree, from its due share in the supplies of the navy. The iron of that region would find there a ready and convenient market; an extensive rope-walk—a necessary appendage to such a navy-yard—would present a constant demand for hemp; the provisions of the West, now worth little or nothing, from their superabundance, would find a ready purchaser at fair prices. Every branch of Western industry would feel, directly or indirectly, the influence of such an establishment; while the navy itself would be secure of abundant and cheap supplies, sufficiently convenient to the ocean, and yet perfectly safe from the attacks of any enemy.

It is by arrangements of this sort that the navy can be made to return to the country twice the wealth which is expended in support of it. The wealth of a nation does not consist in the quantity of gold which it may have in its treasury; the economy of a nation is not shown only in the smallness of its expenditures. It is rich only in proportion as its people are rich; and it is economical only so far as it applies the public money to uses more valuable to the people who pay it, than the money itself. This is but another name for national thrift; but it is the only sense in which national economy is of any value. Nine-tenths of the appropriations to the navy are paid back to our own people for materials, labor, and subsistence. It is thus put into circulation, paying debts, supplying wants, and sustaining credit. Every dollar thus employed increases the tax-paying ability of the people to twice that amount: and this tax-paying ability is the true wealth of the nation. The expenses of the navy, therefore, are not to be considered a dead tax upon the treasury. They not only go back and circulate among our own people, but, unlike most other expenditures of the Government, they give employment to industry, encouragement to enterprise, and patronage to genius. They perform, to a great extent, the office of a protective tariff, in developing and bringing into use various sources of our national wealth, particularly in copper, iron, hemp, provisions, and coal. The effect of even a small disbursement, so made, upon the public prosperity and comfort, is much more important and extensive than the first view of it would lead us to suppose. I am far from saying that taxes ought to be levied merely for the purpose of so expending them. No tax should be imposed, direct or indirect, which is not required for the legitimate and proper uses of Government. But if a necessity for the tax can be shown to exist—if the purposes to which it is proposed to apply it clearly appear to be useful and profitable to the country, far beyond the measure of the tax itself,—it ceases to be a burden, and is relieved from all fair objection. Such, in my opinion, is emphatically the case with almost the entire appropriation to the naval service. It is confidently believed that such appropriations, as liberal as any convenient and proper revenue system will allow, may be, and of necessity must be, applied to "uses far more valuable to the people who pay them, than the money itself;" and that, far from being an oppressive burden, they will operate as a measure of positive relief.

In looking for the sources of unnecessary expense throughout the naval establishment, I have found much to correct. It cannot be denied that our navy has cost much more than it ought to have cost, considering the small number of vessels that we have usually kept in commission. I do not know that this could have been very easily prevented under the former defective organization of the department. The mode heretofore pursued, of obtaining the supplies of the surgeon's and purser's department, has subjected the seamen to unnecessary charges, the Government to constant imposition, and in many cases to gross frauds, and consequently to heavy losses. These losses have been the greater, in consequence of the want of proper means of establishing a system of strict accountability, which would have enabled the department not only to see the extent of the evil, but to apply the proper remedy. The bureaux to which these subjects belong have been diligently and successfully engaged in devising suitable means of guarding against similar impositions for the future. The articles are now procured, as far as possible, from those who make or produce them; so that the profits—always large, and often extortionate—which have heretofore been paid to the grocer, the apothecary, and the contractor for clothing, are saved to the Government and the sailor. Such supplies as we are still compelled to obtain in the former mode, are subjected to rigorous inspection, which assures us of their good quality and reasonable prices; and when brought into the public stores, the persons under whose charge they are placed are required to account for them, with a degree of minuteness which promises to guard effectually against any waste or extravagance in the use of them.

I have very little doubt that much of the mechanical labor which has been performed at our navy-yards has been too dearly paid for. I can perceive no good reason why a mechanic should work fewer hours in the day, or receive higher wages in a public dockyard, than in a private workshop; on the contrary, if there be any difference, it should be in favor of the Government, in consequence of the more constant employment and the more prompt and certain pay. It is certainly good policy on the part of the Government to give such wages as will command the most competent and faithful workmen; but this can always be done, for the reason above assigned, for the same wages which are paid at the best private establishments. Measures have been adopted to place the Government upon terms of just equality with individuals in this respect.

But a still more considerable source of expense in building, repairing, arming, and equipping our vessels of war, may be found in the high prices and indifferent quality of the iron and copper which have been used. The department has given much attention to these two important subjects, with a view to the correction of former abuses. In particular kinds of iron, the standard has been raised seventy-five per cent.; and yet it is found that supplies can be obtained at less prices than heretofore, although the quality is nearly twice as good. The fact now generally known, that proper tests are applied, and that no iron will be received which does not bear them, has served to create an honorable competition among those engaged in that branch of industry; so that the most important improvements are constantly made. The United States can furnish as good iron as any other country in the world, and, with suitable encouragement, would soon be able to supply the world with that metal.

In chain cables an invaluable improvement has been made. None but the very best iron is ever applied to that use; and an apparatus is now in progress, and very nearly completed, for subjecting the cables, when finished, to thermotension. A long series of careful and accurate experiments has ascertained that this process adds seventeen per cent. to its strength. By this means, the weight, and consequently the cost, of a cable of given strength is greatly diminished; and so also is the labor of handling it on board ship. For this great improvement we are indebted to the scientific information and industrious researches of Professor Walter R. Johnson, of Philadelphia. It is impossible to calculate its value to the whole navigating interest of the world. The fate of the largest ship and of all her crew often depends upon the strength of her cables; so that a little more or less of strength in a single link may save or destroy her. I have considered it, therefore, of the utmost importance to improve, by every practicable means, the quality of chain-cable iron. It is believed that even at the present day, we are not surpassed in this respect by any other nation; and if improvements shall advance hereafter, as rapidly as heretofore, we may in a short time safely challenge the competition of the world.

A similar improvement has been made in iron for ordnance. Too much importance cannot be attached to the soundness of cannon. The bursting of a single gun in battle, is often more disastrous than many broadsides from an enemy. It not only destroys life, and withdraws so much from the effective battery of the ship, but it also creates confusion and disorder; excites in the minds of the crew distrust in the soundness of the other guns, and thus discourages and renders them timid. Hence, no consideration of mere money-saving should ever enter into the arrangements for procuring ordnance for the navy. True economy requires that the very best guns which can be made, and none others, should ever be used. Upon this idea this department is acting. No cannon is received, which does not bear the most satisfactory tests; and yet it is not found that the cost of ordnance is any greater than heretofore. On the contrary, guns of the same kind, which have heretofere cost more than one hundred and thirty dollars per ton, have recently been contracted for at ninety-five dollars.

In copper, the frauds which have been practised upon the Government have been gross and enormous. Pure copper ought to last upon a ship's bottom twenty years; and yet, that which we have used upon our ships of war has not lasted, upon an average, more than seven. Upon examining a portion of the copper recently taken from the bottom of the Columbus, I found that it exhibited the appearance of worm-eaten wood; the reason of which is, that it was full of impurities, which corroded and fell out. Even that which remained, instead of possessing the toughness which belongs to pure copper, would not bear to be bent, but broke short off, like a piece of cast iron. It is impossible to be too careful in procuring an article so costly as copper. Nothing but the application of proper scientific tests can detect its impurities, or prevent the grossest and most ruinous impositions. A single defective sheet on the bottom of a large ship will render it necessary to bring her into dock, and will thus cost the country ten times as much as would have been required to prevent any such result. The copper in a ship's bottom is no small part of her entire cost; and this cost is more than doubled by using copper of bad quality.

The great importance of guarding against impositions in this respect, has induced the department to institute a series of experiments, under the management of Professor Johnson; the results of which promise to be of great benefit to the economy of the service. These results I have the honor to communicate in a copy of Mr. Johnson's report, hereto annexed.

As steamships will hereafter form a part of our navy, it becomes important to ascertain what kind of fuel can be most advantageously used. With this view, I have taken measures to cause a proper analysis to be made of the several coals of our country, and also of those of England. All persons interested in this subject were invited, by public advertisement, to send samples of their coal to the navy-yard in Washington, in order that a proper comparison might be made, under suitable philosophical tests. About thirty samples have been sent, and some progress has been made in the examination of them. Professor Johnson, to whom this investigation has been intrusted, was called from Washington before any conclusive results had been obtained; but his experiments will be resumed as soon as possible, and will undoubtedly present a mass of most useful information on this important subject.

The application of scientific principles in the mechanical arts is now universal. The mere artisan, whose skill is derived only from practice, is far behind the times. Science is now lending her aid to the arts, in all their departments, expanding their powers, multiplying their uses, and perfecting their works. I respectfully suggest that this aid is nowhere more important than in the various operations connected with a naval establishment. When we consider the number and variety of the materials which are used, the costliness of many of them, and the high importance that they should all be of the best and most durable kinds, the propriety of subjecting them to all necessary tests, and of improving their quality as far as possible, will at once be admitted. This can be done only by the union of science with practical skill. The knowledge which we obtain from experience is always slow, always costly, and not always sure; that which we obtain from experiment, particularly in physical science, rarely deceives, and seldom fails richly to repay us. The experiments which have already been made, under the direction of this department, have imparted to it a degree of information which could not have been derived from any other source, and which will more than repay their cost in the building of a single ship. These experiments, however, are but the beginning of what might be accomplished in the same way. If the department were in a condition to avail itself of the improvements which are daily made in practical science, the most important results would soon be realized, in the improved quality of our ships, and in the general economy of the service. I respectfully recommend the subject to the favorable consideration of Congress.

I shall, in a few days, have the honor to lay before Congress a code of rules and regulations for the navy, prepared in obedience to their directions.

I invite attention to the existing laws on the subject of navy pensions, which appear to me to need many changes and modifications.

I have thus, sir, submitted without reserve my views of the present condition and actual requirements of our naval service. It is my duty to do this, without reference to any other considerations. Whether my recommendations shall be adopted or not, must of course depend on the view which may be taken of them by the legislative department of the Government. In presenting my own views, I simply discharge my own duty to those to whose better judgment all the measures which I have proposed must be referred.

All which is respectfully submitted.

A. P. UPSHUR.

POSTMASTER GENERAL'S REPORT.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
December 3, 1842.

To the President of the United States:

SIR: In presenting to your consideration a report of the condition and operations of the Post Office Department for the year preceding the 30th June, 1842, it affords me pleasure to say, its condition has been improved, and the service has been attended with more than ordinary success, whether considered in reference to the management of its financial concerns, or the regularity and extent of its operations.

A public service, which requires the agency of 13,733 postmasters and their clerks, 2,343 contractors and their agents, covering during the year 34,835,991 miles of transportation, and extending almost to the door of every citizen, must encounter difficulties, and be subject to occasional irregularities, not only from the neglect of some of its numerous agents, but from physical causes, not in the power of this department to overcome.

When this vast machinery of the General Post Office; the minuteness of its details, and the character of the majority of the roads over which the mail is transported, are contemplated, there should be more of astonishment at the general regularity of the service, than of surprise and discontent at occasional failures. Absolute certainty and unbroken regularity in the arrival and departure of the mails, at all times, cannot, and ought not to be expected. And it is with pleasure I bear testimony, on this occasion, to the general zeal and fidelity of those employed in this branch of the public service.

The whole amount of mail transportation for the year ending June 30th, 1841, was 34,996,525 miles, at a contract cost of $3,159,375. The whole amount of transportation for the year ending June 30, 1842, was 34,835,991 miles, at a contract cost of $3,087,796.

The amount of expenditure of the department, for the year ending June, 1842, was estimated, in my report of December last, at $4,490,000. The revenue to be derived from postage, &c. in the same report was estimated at $4,380,000. The amount estimated for the expenditure did not include the sums due by the department prior to the 31st March, 1841. Thus exhibiting a probable liability of $110,000, beyond its estimated current receipts of that year.

To bring the expenditures within the income of the department, was a duty demanded at my hands, by a regard for the observance of the principle upon which I desire to conduct the administration of the General Post Office, viz: that, while the department should not be regarded as a source of revenue to the Government, it must not become an annual charge upon the public treasury.

To effect this object, great labor and minute attention have been bestowed by all concerned.

A revision of post-roads and post offices, necessary to a reduction of unprofitable routes, and the discontinuance of unproductive and useless post offices, and the substitution of others at more important points, better suited to the public wants; the institution of a system for the preservation and safety of the public property, and the reduction of useless expenditures, was a task requiring no ordinary portion of labor and time; and its performance could not fail often to subject the head of the department to censure and criticism from those who did not feel the necessity of the measures adopted. The effect has been salutary to the public service, as well in reference to its income, as to its usefulness and cost. I refer you to the reports of the 1st and 3d Assistant Postmasters General, which will give more in detail the effect which has been produced by the measures adopted.

Useless and unproductive routes have been discontinued; whilst others, more convenient, less expensive, and more productive, have been substituted. In many instances, where the nature and size of the mail did not demand the higher grade of service, the less expensive modes of transportation have been employed. This may be more satisfactorily illustrated by a reference to the service in the Northwestern and Southwestern districts, comprising the States of Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Louisiana, and the Territories of Wisconsin and Iowa, prior to the 1st July, 1842, and the service under the recent lettings. The whole number of miles of mail service in these districts annually was 11,005,865, costing annually the sum of $1,102,045 prior to the 1st July last. The recent contracts require the transportation of the mail, in each year, 11,424,128 miles, at a cost of $957,768—thus giving, in fact, 418,263 miles more of service for $144,277 less expense. And I do not hazard much when I assert that this saving has been made while the service itself has been, in the aggregate, greatly improved.

The heretofore heavy expenditure of mail-bags and locks has been greatly reduced. Entertaining the opinion that, by a proper system of preservation, and a just responsibility imposed upon public agents, the number of mail-bags on hand was equal to the wants of the service, and would be sufficient to meet its demands for several years, I have, in effect, ordered their manufacture to cease.

By the report of the Third Assistant, it will be seen that the expenditure for mail bags was, in the year 1837 - - - - -	$56,702 28

In 1838 - - - - -	38,737 36
In 1839 - - - - -	36,082 46
In 1840 - - - - -	35,337 23

From 1st April, 1841, to 1st April, 1842, the amount expended was but $13,566 30.

From 1st April, 1842, to 1st October, 1842—six months—$7,540 59. A large proportion of which was the mail-bags manufactured prior to 1841.

It is important, in every branch of the public service, to impress upon those in its employment the necessity of taking care of and preserving the public property. This is best done by the adoption of an appropriate system, and holding to a just responsibility those charged with administrative duties; and, when they prove themselves faithless or negligent, to appoint others in their places.

The good effects of this rule are strictly illustrated, not only in the item of expenditure just enumerated, but they are manifested throughout the results of the entire year's service.

It will be seen, by reference to my report of December last, that the amount received from the postage on letters and newspapers, and fines, for the year commencing 1st July, 1840, and ending 30th June, 1841, was stated to be $4,379,317 78.

The amount arising from the same sources for the year ending 30th June, 1842, is $4,546,246 13. Thus showing an increase of the revenue of the department of $166,928 35 over the revenue of the preceding year.

This increase has not been the result of an increase of mail matter, I am persuaded; but has arisen from a more systematic and vigilant execution of the law.

The gross expenditures of the department for the year ending 30th June, 1842, so far as they have been audited and paid, are $4,627,716 62—exceeding the amount derived from postage, during the same year, $81,470 49.

It will be remembered that, by the act approved the 9th September, 1841, there was appropriated, "to enable the Post Office Department to meet its engagements and pay its debts," the sum of $482,657.

Of this sum, there has been expended, during the last fiscal year, the sum of $392,664 51 in satisfaction of demands against the department prior to the month of April, 1841. The report of the chief clerk upon this subject, will exhibit more in detail the application of this fund.

There remained unexpended of this appropriation on the 30th of June, 1842, $89,992 49, to meet such other demands as may be established to be due prior to the 31st March, 1841.

This sum of $392,664 51 constitutes no part of the $4,546,246 13, given above as the revenue for the last year, derivable from postage and fines. It does, however, constitute part of the $4,627,716 62, the gross expenditure for that year; and, if deducted, will show the gross expenditure, for ordinary current service, to be $4,235,052 11.

This would present an apparent balance, of excess of revenue over expenditures, of $311,19

As it is highly probable that there are yet cl unsatisfied, not having been presented for pay and claims which were due prior to that time, which, if presented, would have been audited paid within the year, and which have been since 30th June, 1842, and, consequently, will charged in the expenditures for the current year is not intended to convey the idea that $311,194 02 is a surplus on hand; but it is a from which I am authorized to state that the come of the department has been equal to its rent expenditures during the year ending in J 1842; and it induces me to hope that, unless burdens of the service shall be too greatly mented by the additional routes created by the last session of Congress, the department wi future, be enabled to sustain itself. I cannot pate, however, any great extension of the ser beyond its present limits and amount, unless C gress shall, in some mode, relieve the departm from the heavy annual demands made upon its come by railroad transportation, and protect it, appropriate legislation, against the inroads it by private expresses and rival mail estab ments.

It affords me great satisfaction to report to your excellency that every legal demand by the contractors, properly vouched, upon the department, for services rendered since I have had the honor of superintending its operations, has been promptly paid.

Justice to contractors requires that, as soon as they have performed the service, they should be paid. To enable the department to do this, punctuality on the part of postmasters in the payment the balances due from them at the end of each quarter, is all important.

In every instance where there has been a failure on the part of such postmasters to meet the drafts of the General Post Office, I have felt it a duty, not to be omitted, to relieve such from the burden of official duty. The knowledge of the existence of this rule has banished defalcation from the department.

It is a fact worthy of notice, that, although the aggregate amount received from postage during the past year has been greater by the sum stated, the receipts at the large offices for 1842 have been less than in 1841. The aggregate increase has been in the medium and smaller offices.

This is accounted for by the fact, that the means of intercommunication between the great commercial points have been such as to invite contraband and increasing infractions and violations of the laws of Congress regulating the General Post Office.

I took occasion to invite your attention to this subject in my report of last year, under the hope that some legislation, in aid of the present laws, would take place, to enable the department more effectually to protect itself.

It is made the exclusive duty of the General Government to establish post offices and post roads. The State Governments have no right to interfere with the subject; neither has any individual, or company of individuals, such right.

Upon most of the railroads in the United States over which the mail is transported at an immense expense, there are to be found individuals engaged in the transportation of mail matter, in violation of the laws of the land—laws which prohibit the offence, but do not punish it by adequate sanctions.

A modification of the laws regulating the franking privilege is essential to the continued prosperity of the department. The original grant of the privilege was designed the better to enable the public officer to discharge his official duties without burden upon his private means. It is now generally esteemed more as a private and individual right than an official privilege. If persons entitled to this privilege were content to enjoy it themselves without lending their franks to others, the burden and loss to the department would not be so great and there would be less cause of just complaint by the public.

Although the act of 1825 expressly declares that "if any person shall frank any letter or letters, other than those written by himself, or by his order, on the business of his office, he shall, on conviction thereof, pay a fine of ten dollars; and it shall be the especial duty of postmasters to prosecute for said offence." The penalty declared by this law has no een sufficient to prevent the too frequent violaion of its provisions.

If Congress shall deem it inexpedient to limit, or arther restrain, this right, an imposition of the ame penalty upon him who uses the frank of anther, as is imposed upon the person who abuses is privilege, would tend greatly to lessen the vil.

The whole number of free letters sent through he post office annually, so far as the returns of estmasters exhibit, is about three millions.

Assuming fifteen cents as the average rate of each etter, if charged with postage, four hundred and fty thousand dollars would be the amount received. Thus it will be seen that nearly one-ninth of all he matter which passes through the mail, passes ree of postage. The loss to the department does ot stop here. Two cents are paid to postmasters n each of these letters, constituting an annual harge upon the revenue of $60,000. An evil of his magnitude, I trust, will not fail to arrest the ttention of Congress, who alone can apply the roper corrective. It is wrong to burden the busiess and friendly correspondence of the community rith this heavy charge.

The public voice has called for a reduction of he rates of postage upon letters; and whilst I have elt its force, and am constrained to acknowledge is justice, I have heretofore been deterred from aking any specific recommendation upon this ubject, lest, by a sudden reduction, the only source f income might fail to meet the demands of the ervice. With a proper regulation of the franking privilege, and a further protection against the iolations of the laws of the department, I have o doubt a considerable reduction in postage might e safely made, and the benefits and advantages of he department extended to many portions of the ountry which are now, in a great measure, destiute of proper mail accommodations. More especially could this be done, if Congress, by some permanent arrangement with the railroad companies, would relieve the department from the immense nd constantly increasing amount annually paid hose companies for transporting the public mail.

I ventured to recommend, in my former report o you, that Congress should then legislate upon his subject. Nothing has occurred since to cause he to doubt the correctness of the opinions then xpressed. On the contrary, subsequent developments have strengthened the views then obtruded pon your consideration.

Without the right in the department to control the rrival and departure of the mails, regularity and espatch cannot be expected. This is a right which he railroad companies, in their periodical contracts, will not yield willingly; and, when they do ield it, make it a ground to increase their demands pon the department for transporting the mail. For the service of railroad transportation there ever can be competition. Why, then, subject the epartment to the useless ceremony of advertising eriodically for bids to carry the mail on railroads, equiring it to take the lowest bid, when there will e but one bid for the same route? Each letting as heretofore been, and will hereafter be, but an nvitation to the companies to increase the prices reviously paid.

It is in vain to disguise the fact, that the United States are compelled to employ these roads as carriers of the mail. Justice and policy alike require f the Government to send the mail by the most expeditious means of conveyance, and it cannot employ any of its own creation equal to the railroads. As a Government, it cannot, by legislation, control hose companies which have their corporate existence by State enactments. The United States must, therefore, purchase the right; and the question presented is, whether it is best to purchase this right every four years, or for the period of the charter of the road.

It is more a question of ability, at this time, on he part of the Government, than policy, in my humble opinion.

The plan which I proposed was, that Congress should authorize the department to purchase this right; enter into the stipulations of a contract with he companies, and report those contracts, as made, rom time to time, to Congress, to be binding only when ratified by Congress. Nothing dangerous an arise from thus treating with the companies. No enlargement of executive power is asked. On he contrary, it is proposed to subject executive power directly to the controlling influence of Congress. As the law now stands, the department has the power to contract with these companies for four years, with a nominal limitation as to the amount to be paid them per mile. Surely, no danger can arise to public liberty, or legislative authority, by authorizing the department to make a provisional permanent contract, subject to the approval of both Houses of Congress.

The great question involved is, whether Congress should make these contracts, and pay the consideration out of the resources of the Government; or whether the department shall levy the amount, by continuing the present rates of postage upon letters; and, in all time to come, devote so large a portion thereof to the payment for railroad transportation, as to deny even the hope to the more distant and less favored portions of our country of any increased mail facilities? The cost of railroad transportation for the last year stands at $432,568. The whole length of mail road in the United States is 149,732 miles, costing $3,087,796. Of this length of mail road, only 3,091 miles is railroad transportation, at a cost of $432,568—only one-forty-eighth part of the whole number of miles costing one-seventh part of the gross sum.

I repeat the inquiry made on a former occasion: Is it just, that the whole burden of the public correspondence—now nearly equal to half a million of dollars annually—should be sustained by a tax upon the business and friendly correspondence of the community? If the Government exacts from the citizen no more than the cost and expense of transporting his letters, he has no right to complain; but when an additional sum is wanted to defray the expenses of transporting the correspondence of the Government and its officers, that sum, like the tax for every other public service, should be drawn from the common resources of the country.

It is proposed that, in lieu of an annual drain from the treasury to pay the postage upon the public correspondence, the United States now secure and pay for the perpetual right to transport the mails over railroads. Can this right be now secured upon fair and reasonable terms? is a question worthy to be tested by fair experiment. I am of opinion it can be secured upon most, if not all of the important roads, upon reasonable terms, and with ample guaranties.

It is no part of the business of this department to speak of the effects which such contracts with the railroad companies would produce upon public credit, both at home and abroad. The effects, whatever they may be for good, are but incidental to the great object to be attained in reference to the mail service of the United States.

Entertaining these opinions upon this subject, I pray you will allow me most respectfully to press them upon your consideration.

Public opinion seemed so strong in favor of a reduction of postage upon letters, that it could be regarded in no other light than a demand upon those having the power over this subject. I have felt its influence, but have been unwilling to act unadvisedly in any recommendation I might make upon the subject. It will be remembered that England recently reduced her rates of postage. The effect upon the revenue, and upon the amount of mail matter, I was anxious to know. For this, and other objects connected with the operations of this department, I availed myself of the services of General Green, in November last, who was about to visit England and France upon private business, and instructed him to make certain investigations and inquiries. The result of his investigations may be seen by a reference to his report to me, a copy of which accompanies this report.

The dissimilarity in the government of the two countries, as well as the difference in the extent of territory, induce me to doubt whether the same system of mail service and rates of postage could be safely adopted in the United States.

One fact, however, is clearly developed by the report of General Green—that, since the reduction of postage in England, the number of letters mailed has greatly increased. I forbear to trouble you with any particular suggestions upon this subject, because it has been a duty devolved upon me by a resolution of the Senate, to make to that body a specific report upon an alteration of the rates of postage, which I purpose to do at as early a day as practicable.

It will be seen, by reference to a part of the report of Mr. Green, that the French Government is anxious to make a treaty with the United States for an interchange of mail service by the agency of packet and steamships of the two countries.

You will remember, this subject was brought to your attention by the minister of France during the last session of Congress. It was submitted by you to Congress, as one worthy of their consideration, and requiring specific legislation, if, in the opinion of that body, such an arrangement would prove advantageous to the United States. The Committee on Foreign Relations made a report favorable to the measure, and the House of Representatives adopted the following resolution:

"That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be prepared and reported to this House, by the Secretaries of State and of the Navy, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, a plan for the establishment, in concert with the Government of France, of a line of weekly steamers between the ports of Havre and New York, together with estimates of the expense which may be required to carry the said plan into effect."

That portion of Mr. Green's report, and the accompanying documents, are submitted under the belief that it may be serviceable to place before Congress the outlines of the plan contemplated by the French Government.

In the month of August last, I caused to be established and put into operation a city despatch post for the city of New York, confined to the delivery, through the post office of that city, of the correspondence within its limits. I am gratified to know that its operations have proved highly satisfactory to the community, giving to the citizens a prompt and cheap medium of communication, the income of which will not only maintain the expenses of the establishment, but, in the course of time, promises a considerable addition to the revenue of the department. The report of the postmaster of New York upon this subject is submitted, in order that its details may be more generally known; and, when understood, I have little doubt that the other large cities of the Union will call for a similar establishment. Its usefulness has been fully tested in New York, by the saving of a heavy daily expense of money and time to the business community in their city correspondence.

The amount of expenditure for the current fiscal year, for the service of this department, may be stated, by way of estimate, in round numbers, at $1,390.000.

This estimate does not include the probable expense of the new routes established by Congress at the last session, none of which have yet been put in operation. The probable cost of these routes per year will be $130,000, making the whole estimated expense of $4,520,000.

Any estimate of the income from postage during the present year must of course be altogether conjectural, founded upon the amounts received for the year ending in June, 1842.

The amount received the quarter ending 30th September last, is less than the amount of the corresponding quarter of 1841; and I therefore conclude the income of the department for the current year will fall considerably short of that for the year ending 30th June. It is, however, my intention to put these routes in operation by the time specified in the act. And as there is no discretion vested in the department by the act, if I find its means will not be otherwise equal to the additional expense, it will become my unpleasant duty to curtail the expense upon routes already in existence, equal to the cost of the new ones peremptorily ordered by Congress.

There are other matters more of detail, requiring, in my judgment, the legislation of Congress, which I forbear to obtrude upon your attention; but will seek the opportunity to submit to the committees to whom the affairs of this department may be referred.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your excellency's obedient servant,

C. A. WICKLIFFE.

REPORT ON THE FINANCES.

LETTER FROM THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY ON THE STATE OF THE FINANCES.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 15, 1842.

SIR: In obedience to the directions of the act of Congress of the 10th May, 1800, entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act to establish the Treasury Department,'" and an act entitled "An act to establish the fiscal year," &c., approved the 26th August, 1842, the Secretary of the Treasury respectfully submits the following report:

I.—Of the public revenue and expenditure.

The balance in the treasury on the 1st January, 1842, (exclusive of the amount deposited with the States, trust-funds, and indemnities,) was		$230,483 68
The receipts into the treasury during the first three quarters of the present year amount to		$26,616,593 78
Viz:
From customs	$14,260,830 35
From lands	1,091,638 95

Interest on loan	152,442 58
Unclaimed dividends	3,000 60
Principal and interest on treasury notes	400,000 00
To which add outstanding warrants issued prior to 1st January, 1842,		805,474 03
Making		$25,308,634 38
Leaving a deficiency in the treasury on the 31st December, 1842, of		$575,556 92

The above estimates of expenditures for the 4th quarter of the present year include, as it will be perceived, the sum of $805,474 03, being the amount of outstanding warrants issued prior to the 1st January, 1842. It is presumed, however, that a like sum will remain outstanding on the 1st January next; and that, instead of the apparent deficiency as stated above, there will be an actual balance in the treasury on the 1st January, 1843, of at least $224,000. It is expected, also, that a like amount of warrants may be outstanding on the 30th June, 1843, and at the end of the succeeding fiscal year.

It is proper to remark, that, at the time the estimates of the expenditures of the 4th quarter were prepared by the several departments, it was believed that the expenditures for the current quarter would amount to the sum already stated; but it is now ascertained that they will fall considerably short of that amount; yet, as they will become a charge on the treasury early in the next year, it has not been deemed necessary to alter the amount as first estimated.

II.—Of the estimates of the public revenue and expenditures for the half calendar year ending 30th June, 1843.

The receipts for the half year are estimated as follows:
From customs		$7,500,000 00
From lands		1,500,000 00
From treasury notes and loans		5,538,113 45
From miscellaneous sources		50,000 00
		14,588,113 45
The expenditures for the half calendar year ending the 30th June, 1843, are estimated at		$10,381,186 76
Viz:
Civil, miscellaneous, and foreign intercourse	2,722,796 80
Army, fortifications, pensions, fulfilment of Indian treaties, suppression of Indian hostilities, &c.	3,033,829 50
Naval service	4,019,060 46
Interest on public debt and treasury notes	606,500 00

III.—Of the estimates of the public revenue and expenditures for the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1844.

The receipts for the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1844, are estimated as follows:
From customs		$16,000,000 00
From lands		2,700.000 00
From miscellaneous sources		150,000 00
		18,850,000 00
The expenditures for the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1844, are estimated at		20,945,498 76
Viz:
Civil, miscellaneous, and foreign intercourse	3,804,434 44
Army, fortifications, pensions, fulfilment of Indian treaties, suppressing of Indian hostilities, &c.	6,612,042 61
Naval service	7 318 021 71
Interest on public debt and treasury notes	1,211 000 00
By the foregoing statements, it will appear that a deficiency will exist in the treasury on the 31st December, 1842, of		575.556 92
The receipts for the half calendar year ending on the 30th June, 1843, are estimated at		14,688,113 45
And the expenditures for the same period at		10,381,186 76
Leaving a balance of		4,306.926 69
From which deduct the amount of deficiency as above, and the balance remaining in the treasury on the 30th June, 1843, will be		3,731,369 77
The receipts into the treasury for the fiscal year ending on the 30th June, 1844, are estimated at		18,850,000 00
Making, with the balance, as above		$22,581,369 77
From which deduct the estimated expenditures for the fiscal year		20,945,498 76
And the balance in the treasury on the 30th June, 1844, will amount to		$1,635,871 01

Assuming (as is highly probable) that the balance of the loan authorized by the acts of 21st July, 1841, and the 15th April, 1842, amounting to $5,538,113 45, will be negotiated prior to the 15th April, 1843—the limit of the term within which it can be taken—it has been included in the receipts of the next half year. Should, however, this reasonable expectation be disappointed as to the whole amount of such balance, the deficiency thence arising may be supplied by the issue of treasury notes under the authority of the act of the 31st August last, to the amount of $3,500,000; which sum, together with that realized by the sale of stock, will, it is believed, place in the treasury an available amount adequate to meet all the anticipated demands up to the 30th June, 1844; and if the whole of the balance of the loan be taken within the period limited by law, the several balances remaining in the treasury on the 30th of June, 1843, and 30th June, 1844, will be as indicated in the foregoing exhibit.

It will be perceived that, in the estimate of expenditures subsequent to the 1st of January next, the redemption of treasury notes is not taken into account. But few notes have been presented at the department for redemption since the passage of the act of the 31st August last; and nearly the whole amount cancelled since that day was taken in payment of public dues. Should the notes issued under the act above mentioned be placed on the same footing with the previous issues, so as to bear interest after maturity, payable half-yearly, until called in for redemption, it is believed but a small amount would fall into the expenditures for the ensuing eighteen months. It is recommended, therefore, that this be done: otherwise, the expenditures during the period last mentioned must necessarily be increased to the amount of probably three to four millions of dollars, in redemption of issues under the act of 31st August last. But, for the purpose of guarding against unforeseen contingencies, it is further recommended that the existing authority to reissue treasury notes should be extended to the 30th of June, 1844.

The loan of $5,672,976 88, borrowed under the provisions of the act of the 21st July, 1841, will be redeemable on the 1st of January, 1845; and, on the assumption that a re-issue of treasury notes, as above suggested, shall be authorized by Congress, the whole amount now outstanding, together with that of the issues that may be hereafter made under the act of the 31st August last, will fall due prior to the 30th June, 1845. Although payment of those notes may not be at once demanded when due, and the time of repayment of the loan of 1841 is placed at the pleasure of Government, yet the liability to pay those several amounts must exist, and the means to provide for the exigency can be afforded only by further legislation.

The present tariff, in its main features, resembles so nearly the bill submitted to Congress by the department on the 9th May last, that the views expressed in the report which accompanied the bill may be considered as applicable, to a great extent, to the system of duties now established. The period within which the tariff has been in operation has been much too short to furnish any decisive evidence as to its permanent influence upon importations. The foreign trade of the country has continued to decline, and importations have been comparatively small since the passage of the act. How far this state of things may have been influenced by the existing system of duties, it is impossible to determine. The smallness of the importations may be well accounted for, by the embarrassed condition of the country, and its extremely limited means of purchase. The amount of foreign commodities in our markets is still found greatly to exceed the demand; and the fall in the prices of merchandise since the 1st September is supposed to be, on an average, not less than ten per cent. This fact will be found verified in a letter from the collector at New York, annexed hereto, to which reference is respectfully made; and it is deemed conclusive to show that the decline in the importations since the 1st September cannot justly be referred to our system of duties; and that the effect of the existing tariff remains to be determined by further and more satisfactory experience.

The importance of adequate provision for revenue cannot be too often or too strongly urged upon the attention of Congress. The resources of the country are abundant; internal taxation, either direct or indirect, has not of late years been found necessary; and it is still believed that a system of custom-house duties may be made sufficiently comprehensive to yield an income commensurate with all the wants of the country.

There are various articles of import, several of them of very large and universal consumption, at present untaxed, or subject to duties extremely low; and some of which (without, perhaps, in any considerable degree, lessening the amount of their consumption) might bear imposts yielding an aggregate addition to the revenue accruing under the existing laws, of not less than $3,000,000. These offer themselves for selection; and it rests with the wisdom of Congress to make that selection, or adopt any other mode of securing the receipt of such an amount of revenue as shall be sufficient to meet the expenses of an economical administration of the Government, and afford the means of sustaining measures necessary for the defence of the country and the maintenance of the public credit.

This last object is of infinite importance. The honor of the country, its just self-respect, the pride which every citizen must feel in the high character of its Government,—all these require that the public faith, and the credit of that Government, should be placed above doubt or question.

Deeming it highly probable that the policy of establishing a warehouse system might engage the deliberations of Congress at the present session, the attention of collectors and other officers at various ports was called to this subject by a circular issued from the department on the 24th November last—a copy of which, together with the answers received, and a table of exports of foreign merchandise, are annexed. It has been thought advisable, also, for the sake of convenient reference in a matter of such general interest, to attach to this report a copy of the statute of the 3d and 4th William IV, which embodies the warehouse system of Great Britain in a form matured by a long experience. In connexion with this, will be found a copy of regulations established under authority of the statute above mentioned, by the commissioners of the treasury, which will afford a satisfactory view of the practical operation of the system as it now exists in that country.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

W. FORWARD,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. WILLIE P. MANGUM,
President of the Senate.

SPEECH OF MR. REYNOLDS, OF ILLINOIS.

In the House of Representatives, Dec. 17, 1842—
On economy and retrenchment.

Mr. REYNOLDS of Illinois, having the floor, said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I see no reason to induce me to become so warm and excited on this subject, as I see evinced in other gentlemen who have taken part in the discussion. I feel as cold on the occasion as an ice-house; and will have no other feelings in the case, except what truth and justice may inspire me with.

The question before the committee is, to strike out of the bill under consideration $50,000 for the survey of the coast of the United States. This appropriation is for six months only; and, should it not be stricken out, the same sum must be appropriated for the other six months of the year; making, in all, $100,000 for the whole year; and so on until the work is completed.

Mr. Chairman, I consider this sum not of itself so vastly important to the public, as the principle which will be established by the Representatives of the people in the decision of this question. We will see whether the promises of economy and retrenchment, made so frequently to the public, will be binding on the Representatives or not.

A committee was raised at the last session of Congress, consisting of five members, to inquire into this same subject—the survey of the coast. This committee have not made a formal report; but a majority of them have come to the conclusion that Mr. Hassler, the superintendent of the survey, is incapable to carry on the work. This statement has given to the discussion a deeper tincture of Mr. Hassler than should, in my opinion, figure in the debate; yet his peculiar and particular friends have forced him to occupy such an important and prominent position in relation to this work, that, in order to arrest the appropriation, we are compelled to give him a passing notice.

The ardent and zealous gentleman [Mr. J. R INGERSOLL of Philadelphia] who last addressed the committee, seems to suppose that Mr. Hassler has no friends on this floor. If the gentleman had paid the same attention to his own efforts for Mr. Hassler that I did, he would have witnessed in himself a most powerful and influential friend to the old gentleman.

In fact, Mr. Chairman, I believe Mr. Hassler has no enemies in this House. What inducement could exist in any one's breast to make him hostile to Mr. Hassler? I myself feel no hostility towards him; and, I presume, others entertain as friendly feelings to him as I do. A majority of the select committee, in the discharge of their official duties, acting under the solemnities of an oath, have concluded that he is incapacitated to prosecute the survey of the coast. This is not a declaration of war against Mr. Hassler, to gratify private feelings of enmity towards him; but it is a solemn act of official duty, performed by part of the select committee, as the Representatives of the people; and, as such, must and will have a most powerful influence in the case of Mr. Hassler.

The peculiar friends of Mr. Hassler have in such an efficient manner identified and dovetailed him with this national work, that some might suppose the survey could not go on without him. His friends seem to think that he and the work are both national, and, like the Siamese twins, one dying, the other cannot live. The praise and eulogies heaped on him with such unsparing profusion, will do him an injury. Anything that is not natural cannot be forced to return a permanent existence. And, moreover, it is an indirect reproach and censure on the science of the nation. That no other person in this Republic, consisting of seventeen millions of people, can be found equal to Mr. Hassler to survey the coast, is a proposition so preposterous and absurd, that it will provoke the derision of the people, rather than their belief. It would seem that this vast confederacy must wither and decay, if Mr. Hassler were removed from office.

Has he any more right to the office than any other citizen? The office does not belong to the incumbent, but to the people; and all citizens are equally eligible. This is the perfection of our republican institutions. No one has a fee-simple right in office; and although, as it is stated, Mr. Hassler has been fifty-six years in office, yet this gives to him no more right to office than another individual; and, to permit him to retire, will attach to him neither disgrace nor criminality.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot see that it is absolutely necessary to the prosecution of this work, that Mr. Hassler should be continued the superintendent of it. The survey can go on, in my opinion, better without him than with him. The work was commenced in Rhode Island nine or ten years ago, and is completed not far beyond the Delaware bay. At this rate, it will be fifty or sixty years before the whole coast of the United States is surveyed, and will cost the Government millions and millions of dollars. Is this economy, either in time or money? If this work be of such great utility to the nation, why delay it for fifty or sixty years?

The first law authorizing the survey of the coast of the United States, was passed the 10th of July, 1807; and the work was almost entirely suspended until 1832, when another act of Congress was passed on the subject. I have heard of no calamity or disasters visited on commerce during this long period of twenty-five years' suspension, more than we experience at present. And, in fact, if the work were suspended, while we are compelled to carry on the Government by borrowing money, it would be justified by three-fourths of the people.

It is said this work is a magnificent effort of science and talent, and has excited the admiration of Europe; and that it is an honor to the United States and Mr. Hassler. I am proud of this, if we do not pay too much for the whistle. These great and scientific works ought, nevertheless, to be kept within the bounds of moderation and economy.

I am not that barbarian who, as a matter of course, opposes science and the works of art. I am proud that we have men of science and works of art in our country. They add greatly to the honor and happiness of the people, and should be sustained, if we can do it on just and equitable principles. And, moreover, I am not opposed to this work because it is an Atlantic measure. We cannot, in the interior of this vast continent, expect a seacoast, or the shipping of the ocean to visit us. We are benefited by foreign commerce, and must bear our portion of the expenses of it. All I contend for, Mr. Chairman, is, that these works of national improvement shall be conducted with economy, and with equality in respect of all the sections and various interests of the Union.

An act of Congress, passed 14th April, 1814, confined the appointment of all officers concerned in this coast survey to the navy. This act was repealed. I would repeal the repealing act, and confine the appointments to the officers of the army or navy of the United States.

It is a well-known and deplorable fact, that the United States sustain, at an enormous expense, the Military Academy at West Point, for the express purpose of educating officers for the army. Each cadet, when he completes his education, and is ready to enter the army, costs the Government six thousand dollars for his education; and, according to the report of the Secretary of War of the 28th January, 1831, there are eighteen cadets each year, whose education has been completed, more than there are offices vacant in the army. These supernumerary cadets are attached to the army, and receive pay as officers.

These are facts which the public records will establish, to the satisfaction of every one who will examine them. The records will also show that thousands and thousands of the public money have been expended to sustain the academy at West Point, so that scientific and talented officers might be placed in the command of our armies. The friends of the academy praise and eulogize the institution for the profound learning and the variety of useful science which are taught in it. They claim for the academy the great honor of teaching the science of mathematics to the greatest perfection. This is the science, and its accessories, that are most essentially necessary in the survey of the coast.

I would, therefore, ask, Mr. Chairman, would it not be just and right to require some of these literary and scientific officers to make the survey of the coast, and thereby save the amount of money which is now expended on it under the present system? The friends of the academy dare not say that the officers educated in that institution are incompetent to make the survey of the coast. These officers are intrusted with the destinies of our armies. The glory, the honor, and the character of the army are in their hands. And can it be said that such officers are incapable to survey the coast?

If they are incapable for the performance of this work, then let no time be lost in exterminating the institution, and in having the least and last recollection of it eradicated from our minds. The President, in his late message, proclaims, not only to this nation, but to all nations, "that we are exempt from domestic convulsion, and at peace with all the world;" so that the officers of the army will have sufficient time and leisure to make the survey—and particularly those cadets who have been educated at the public expense, and have no vacant offices to fill in the army.

We see that the engineer corps of the army are intrusted with the survey and estimates of the greatest public improvements in the nation. They superintend the work, and why not also superintend the coast survey? The Government possess a sufficient supply of instruments and all the necessary apparatus to execute the survey; so that the work could be carried on with very small additional expense.

But, Mr. Chairman, some individuals may consider it inappropriate for the officers of the army to make the survey, and that the work would fall more properly into the hands of the officers of the navy. The Congress of the United States in 1814 provided that the officers of the navy should prosecute the work; and why not revive the same law? Will any one deny the competency of the officers of the navy to make the survey? Where are the naval officers on earth more respected or more meritorious, not only for their courage and gallantry in battle, but for their science and literature, than those of the United States? Many of these officers have become aged and experienced in the science of their profession, and are, therefore, more competent, in my opinion, for the accomplishment of this great national work than any other class of men. An experienced and scientific officer of the navy, whose profession has caused him, during a great portion of his life, to observe, with care and caution, not only the coast and shoals of the United States, but also many other coasts, is more capable, in my judgment, than any other person, to superintend this work. This naval officer must, of necessity, be a man of science and literature, and particularly and profoundly versed in the mathematics and all its various branches. He must, also, have an intimate acquaintance with all the instruments and apparatus necessary to execute a survey, and must be more competent than any landsman can be, to sound the coast, ascertain the shoals, and mark them on the chart. The wise and the foolish, the learned and the unlearned would, in my opinion, at once agree that this work should be conducted by the officers of the navy.

There is a superabundance, and, in fact, a redundancy of these officers in the pay of the United States, and doing nothing, and "at peace with all the world:" why not have the services of some of them in the execution of this work?

Mr. Chairman, I am justified in the conclusion that the naval officers are fully competent to superintend this work, by the fact that an officer of the navy made and executed in a practical, and also in a scientific manner, the survey of Lake Ontario; and the commerce on the lake has suffered no injury by the work not being properly and scientifically performed. The charts made by the officer have regulated the navigation of the lake in such manner, that we hear of no complaints for the want of a proper and correct survey of the coast. Therefore, I have no hesitation in saying, that either the officers of the engineer corps of the army, or the officers of the navy, are fully competent to execute the survey of the coast, and make all the charts that are necessary for the purposes of commerce.

This policy being adopted, a vast sum of money will be saved to the public. I received an official note from Mr. Smith, the register of the treasury, in which it is stated, that from the year 1808 to the present time, the sum of $786,730 28 has been paid for the survey of the coast.

Mr. Chairman, within a very short time, important and essential changes have taken place in the country. Extravagance and speculation have passed away, and the sober realities of industry and economy have taken possession of the people. The excess of a spurious paper circulation has ceased to exist, and a more permanent and solid currency has taken its place. The banks, and their fraudulent promises, were the greatest calamity ever inflicted on the country. They excited the people to speculation, extravagance, and ruin; and have themselves, (many of them,) in turn, broke, and become loathsome nuisances in the community. Nothing on earth is more filthy and disgusting than the fraudulent remains of a broken bank. The people turn from them with the same disgust as they would from a deadly pestilence; they have left the banks, and are now depending on God and themselves for support. They have turned their minds and their bodies to industry and economy; and the country commences to enjoy that prosperity and happiness that will always attend virtuous industry and economy. The habits and pursuits of the people have changed; and why not change, also, the legislation of Congress, to correspond with this prudence and economy? The Government should be the shadow and image of the people; and, I presume, it will not be considered any disparagement of members to say that we are the public servants of the people, and ought to do their will. Can any one, no matter how careless he may be of public opinion, mistake the sentiments of the people on this subject, and believe that they will sanction any wild or prodigal appropriation of the public money? It is known to all, that the circulation of money, and particularly in the Western country, is extremely limited; and, of course, the price of property uncommonly low. All these considerations will compel the Representatives of the people to reflect on the subject, and force the expenditures of the public money to the very lowest point on which the Government can be justly and properly administered.

Mr. Chairman, I am clearly satisfied that the whole machinery of the Government can be carried on yearly for the sum of eighteen millions of dollars. Then, in truth, we would have a wise and economical administration of the Government. The last years of the Democratic Admiuistrations of the Government were verging to this sum, although millions were expended on the Florida war, which is now closed Particularly the army and navy should be reduced; and all expenditures curtailed in such manner that the appropriations should not, under any circumstances, exceed eighteen millions of dollars.

The scanty circulation of money in the country, in comparison to the superabundance in 1836, and the important changes in the sentiments and habits of the people—from prodigality and extravagance to industry and economy—imperiously demand of their Representatives a corresponding change in the administration of the Government.

It requires an effort to reduce the expenditures of the Government; but such effort and such reduction are confidently anticipated by the people.

It is in the House of Representatives where people should expect relief from these extravagant appropriations of money. The people have more intimate connexion with the House than any other department of Government. The Representatives are elected every two years, and therefore have a common feeling and identity with their constituents. It is not so with the Senate. The Senators are elected for six years, and then not by the people. Therefore, neither in theory nor in practice with the Senate, as far as I have observed them to act, need the people look to them, as a body, for relief from extravagance. In fact, the Constitution, in the first instance, commits all these money matters to the House of Representatives; and it is on them that the responsibility mainly rests in making these extravagant appropriations of money.

Mr. Chairman, I need only mention the fact, that every member, as far as I understand the subject, is pledged to his constituents to observe economy in the expenses of the Government. This subject has been the great bone of contention between the contending political parties for years past; and I take it to be true, that both parties, and the individual members of each party, are solemnly pledged, before God and man, to observe economy in all things, and to prosecute, with zeal and efficiency, every reform and retrenchment in Government that is proper to be made. Every member of this committee can probe his own heart, and see if I am not reviving in his mind the recollections of the pledges he made to his constituents.

Although the sum proposed to be stricken out is but small, yet the decision will be important, to test the disposition of this House on economy and retrenchment.

Mr. Chairman, there is another consideration which has a powerful influence on me in opposing this appropriation. I believe that the good of the public requires a different location to be given to it. The officers of the Government may be required to complete the survey of the coast; and the money heretofore appropriated for that work be applied to the improvement of the Western rivers—or the national road, if you please. I consider it an act of the greatest economy to appropriate money for the essential and necessary national improvements of the country. Suppose, for the sake of example, that a few thousand dollars applied to the removing of the snags in the Mississippi would save millions to the people: would not this be economy? Money may be expended so as to advance the most essential principles of economy.

I would only mention some of the improvements that ought not to be neglected any longer. The completion of the national road to Alton, in the State of Illinois, would be an improvement of much more benefit to the public than the survey of the coast. This great national work has been commenced by the Government, and the high expectations raised among the people should be realized by completing the road to Alton.

One other important and essential improvement, is the purchase, by the Government, of the private stock in the Louisville and Portland canal, in Kentucky, and making it free. There is no improvement on all the length of one thousand miles of the Ohio river, so essential and necessary as the free navigation of this canal. Although it is only three miles in length, yet it is a great national work. I need not inform the members of this committee of the extent of navigation which the falls of Ohio obstruct. The great and increasing population in the West, that is interested in the removal of this obstruction, is greater than is generally known. All the valley of the Mississippi, amounting to six millions of people, or upwards, are more or less directly interested in this improvement. The importance of this work, and the interest the people feel in it, ought to attract the attention of Congress to it, and cause them to purchase the stock, and make the canal free to the public.

But, Mr. Chairman, the most important national work in all the West is the improvement of the Mississippi river. My congressional district borders on the Mississippi; and that part of the river which has acquired for itself, by the destruction of such a number of boats, the name of the "boat grave-yard," is located in my district. So, I consider it my imperious duty to urge this subject respectfully on the consideration of Congress. And I have no hesitation in saying, that, if Congress will give the subject their deliberate consideration, a large appropriation will be made to remove the snags from this river.

I have no doubt there is more wealth floated on the Mississippi than any other river in the United States; and the commerce is increasing on it every year. This will be readily conceded, when we take into consideration the fertility and extent of the country which this river and its tributaries water. The variety of climate, and the extreme productiveness of the soil, together with the energy and industry with which this region of country is cultivated, furnish more surplus for exportation than any other section of the Union. There were navigating the Mississippi and its tributaries, in 1840, 437 steamboats; and more than two hundred millions worth of property was shipped yearly on the Western waters.

I pretend not to enter into the detail of the great amount of property that is exposed every year, and every day, to the uncertainty of the navigation of these Western waters. It is more than any one, who does not see it, could scarcely believe; and the losses and destruction of steamboats are also almost incredible. Although I reside not far from the scene of destruction, and hear much on the subject, yet I was astonished to see on the Mississippi, for twenty or thirty miles up from the mouth of the Ohio, such numerous hulls and wrecks of the finest steamboats that navigated the Western waters. I saw and heard of such destruction of property, and saw, myself, the remains of so many of the most splendid and costly steamboats, that I consider it my solemn duty to state these facts to the committee. And I am confident, if the members of the committee had seen this ruin and loss of property, as I did, that they would not hesitate one moment to make a liberal appropriation to improve the river.

Mr. Chairman, I will exhibit a statement of facts, which I have no doubt are correct. Even this short epitome of cases will give some faint idea of the realities:

"WESTERN NAVIGATION.—The following facts for the consideration of Congress are furnished in a report, made by a committee at a public meeting in St. Louis, in the nature of a memorial to Congress: The number of steamboats sunk in the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, in the year 1839, was forty; in 1840, forty-one; in 1841, twenty-nine; and in the present year, twenty eight. The aggregate value of these boats and their cargoes was $3,540,000; and, in addition, the repairs of damage by snags, where the boats have not been sunk, have averaged $40,000 per year. Between the 11th of September and 12th of October, (less than five weeks,) eight fine boats, with their cargoes, were sunk between St. Louis and the mouth of the Ohio. The aggregate of the loss by the sinking of these eight boats was $234,000."

"STEAMBOAT DISASTERS.—The steamboat Saratoga was sunk in the Mississippi last week. Passengers and baggage saved; boat and cargo lost. The Patrick Henry was snagged near Memphis—no lives lost. The Boston was also snagged near the same place, and much of her cargo lost—about $10,000 worth. The Fame stove. The Scioto Belle snagged and much injured. The steamboat Rialto was snagged about thirty miles from Little Rock, and sunk; boat lost, and cargo much damaged."

I would ask any man, had these losses of boats and property, to the amount of $3,540,000 within four years, occurred on the Hudson river, between New York and Albany, if the forty Representatives of the Empire State would not have had appropriation after appropriation to improve the Hudson? The justice and propriety of the improvement are the same, whether in the Hudson or the Mississippi; and, if any difference, it is more just to improve the Mississippi, because there is more commerce on it than on the Hudson. The people in the city of New York, who were injured by a fire in 1836, were relieved by Congress; and why not relieve the people of the Mississippi valley from these losses, as well as in other sections of the Union?

I would compare the necessity and utility of the improvement of the Mississippi to the Hassler survey of the coast. No one says there would be any loss of property or life incurred by the delay for a while to survey the coast; and it will not, under the Hassler administration, be completed in less than fifty or sixty years; so that several generations will pass away before the country will experience the full benefit of the work. The Mississippi, of all the rivers in the Union, is the easiest improved. A small sum will remove almost all the snags which have caused the losses, and improve upper and lower rapids on that river.

Mr. Chairman, my conclusion is, that, on the strictest principles of economy, the appropriation for the survey of the coast should be applied for the improvements in the West, and the officers of the Government should prosecute the survey of the coast without expense to the nation.

NOTE.—The appropriation was stricken out.

SPEECH OF MR. PAYNE, OF ALABAMA.

In the House of Representatives, December 20, 1842—On the bill to repeal the bankrupt law.

The bill to repeal the bankrupt law being under consideration—

Mr. PAYNE, of Alabama, rose and said:

Mr. SPEAKER: When the bill establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy was under consideration, I had strong objections to the passage of the measure. As I was prevented from stating those objections to the House and to the country then, I avail myself of the opportunity afforded to do so now.

One objection, which operated upon my mind, was the retroactive feature of that law. Had it been prospective in its operation, and conformable in other respects to the Constitution, it would have received my support; nor would I now oppose a permanent system of bankruptcy freed from the odious objections to which the present one is liable. That a bankrupt law, freed from those objections, could not have passed then, we all know; consequently, we were forced to vote upon the law as it now is, with all its imperfections. I believed then, and I believe now, that Congress has not the power to pass any law which is retrospective in its operation. Nor will it be pretended that it belongs to the legitimate powers of this Government to pass a law impairing the obligation of contracts; yet, this famous bankrupt law was retrospective in its operations, and did impair the obligation of contracts, by releasing the debtor from the payment of his debts without the consent of his creditor. Another objection which I had to the law, was lo not say, sir, that such ought to be the decision. I do not say that it would be a fair and honest interpretation of the article. But I do say, there is enough in it to cavil about—enough to afford the English Government a plausible pretext for doing what they are now doing without a pretext.*

*The following account, given by the notorious Tappan, of a conference which took place between Lord Ashburton and a committee of the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, shortly after the ratification of the treaty, appeared in the New York Courier and Enquirer of the 12th September last. If we can credit this statement (I admit of doubtful authenticity) we have already a commentary on this article of the treaty by the minister who negotiated it, declaring, not only that it does not apply to cases like the Creole, but that, in framing the treaty, great care had been taken to prevent any such application. I refer to this publication here, not only as furnishing some indication of his Lordship's views on this subject, but especially as an evidence of the connexion which exists between the Abolitionists of this country and the Government of Great Britain. How diseased must be the state of public opinion in a community which can tolerate, within its bosom, foreign societies formed for the avowed purpose of warring against the fundamental institutions of the country, and does not cover with universal opprobrium American citizens who publicly apply to the ambassador of a foreign nation to protect them against the acts of their own Government.

"ABOLITION MORALITY.—We find in the Journal of Commerce the following gross attack upon the honor and honesty of Lord Ashburton:

"'We have heretofore alluded to the fact, that the Abolitionists have openly recommended slaves to steal from their masters whenever it would aid them in effecting their escape; and now Lewis Tappan would have the world believe that Lord Ashburton approves of such advice!

'In law, the receiver of stolen goods is as criminal as the thief; and in morals, all must agree that the person who can deliberately advise a human being to set at naught the laws of God and man, and justify—nay, urge—his stealing, would himself be guilty of theft when an opportunity offered. 'Thou shalt not steal' is one of God's commandments; and he who advises his fellow-being to violate it, would undoubtedly violate it himself if secure from punishment.

"And yet, because Mr. Lewis Tappan and some of his associates are willing to advise others to steal, these honest and pious gentlemen infer that Lord Ashburton would give similar advice! In other words, they in fact publish his Lordship as a THIEF.

"Let the reader peruse the following, and form his own opinion of Mr. Tappan and his honest and religious associates."—Ed. Cour. and Enq.

INTERVIEW WITH LORD ASHBURTON.

The Executive Committee of the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, apprehending that the tenth article of the treaty lately concluded between the British minister and our Government, might be used to the injury of fugitive slaves escaping into Canada, appointed a deputation to solicit an interview with Lord Ashburton just before his departure for England, to lay before him facts in relation to the subject, which might be communicated to his Government. He very readily complied with the request, and appointed 10 o'clock A. M. September 3d, for the interview, at his lodgings at the Astor House. The committee consisted of Messrs. S. S. Jocelyn, Leonard Gibbs, Le Roy Sunderland, and Lewis Tappan. Mr. Gerrit Smith being present, was invited to accompany the delegation. The delegation was courteously received by Mr. Aldmay, secretary of the special mission of her Britannic Majesty, and by him presented to Lord Ashburton, who invited them to be seated, expressed much satisfaction at seeing them, and entered into a frank and full conversation on the subject on which the interview was requested. The delegation, after congratulating the British envoy on the successful termination of his mission, informed him of the particulars of the case of Nelson Hackett, a slave who fled from Arkansas to Canada, where his pursuers overtook him, had him arrested on a charge of stealing a coat, gold-watch, and horse of his master. Hackett was imprisoned, and meantime a grand jury in Arkansas indicted him. A demand was forwarded from the Governor of Arkansas to the Governor General of Canada, for his surrender. Sir Charles Bagot complied, and Hackett was taken back to Arkansas. The delegation stated to Lord Ashburton their apprehensions that such a course occurring without any treaty stipulation, there was great cause of apprehension that, under the tenth article of the treaty, which provides for the mutual surrender of all persons charged with certain specified crimes, no fugitive slave would be safe in Canada, when it is notorious that slaveholders allege crimes against fugitive slaves as one expedient for their reclamation.

Lord Ashburton went into an explanation of the 10th article, and mentioned several particulars of the discussion that took place, both on that topic and others relating to slaves. He said that it was very desirable to have an article in the treaty to meet cases similar to that of Holmes, who fled from Canada into Vermont, and the cases that would frequently arise, considering the extent of the bordering lines, and the temptation for criminals to flee across the lines in hope of securing themselves from arrest and punishment. The Governor of Canada was anxious that deserters should be included; but as Lord A. learned that a claim would be put in for the delivering up of fugitive slaves, he abandoned the question of deserters from her Britannic Majesty's possessions. He was also very desirous to secure the delivery of mutineers; but did not press it, lest it should involve, on the part of his Government, the delivery of slaves situated as were those on board the Creole. With regard to the case of the slave Hackett, he did not know all the facts. Sir Charles Bagot was known to him, and he did not believe he would do anything intentionally wrong. But he had just entered upon his duties, and was probably desirous, at that juncture, of promoting good feeling with his great neighbor. The fact that the slave had taken his master's watch, was a circumstance that probably went against him. "Had he only taken the horse," said Lord A., (looking at Gerrit Smith, significantly, though he could not be supposed ever to have read the advice of that gentleman to fugitive slaves,) "he would not probably have been surrendered; for you know the horse was necessary for his escape." Lord A. said that, in framing the 10th article, great care had been taken that inferior magistrates in Canada should have no authority to surrender fugitives, as had been urged by the other party; and that only the Governor himself could perform an act of so great importance. Great care would be taken, he had no doubt, to protect the innocent; and that the taking of any article necessary to effect an escape would not be considered felonious. If, said he, the operation of the 10th article prove injurious, he had no doubt the British Government would put an end to it, agreeably to another provision of the treaty, viz: "The 10th article shall continue in force until one or the other party shall signify its wish to terminate it, and no longer."

Lord Ashburton said that, when the delegation came to read his correspondence with Mr. Webster, they would see that he had taken all possible care to prevent any injury being done to the people of color; that, if he had even been willing to introduce an article including cases similar to that of the Creole, his Government would never have ratified it, as they will adhere to the great principles they have so long avowed and maintained; and that the friends of the slave in England would be very watchful to see that no wrong practice took place under the tenth article.

The delegation now rose, and, after thanking Lord Ashburton for the candid and satisfactory manner in which he had received their communications, and answered their inquiries—wishing the divine blessing for the part he had taken in perpetuating peace between the respective countries, and protecting the rights of the oppressed, and a safe and speedy return to his native land—took their leave, highly gratified with the courtesy, frankness, intelligence, and philanthropy of this distinguished nobleman. Believing the above statement will be interesting to your readers, especially to those who labor and pray for the slave—for the poor fugitive, particularly—that it will tend to quiet the fears of the twelve thousand colored inhabitants of Canada, most of whom have fled from Southern slavery, and their numerous friends on both sides of the line; and that there will be found an additional occasion for the thankfulness to God, that he has, through the instrumentality of the American and British ministers, brought about a peace that will, it is hoped, be lasting. I remain, very respectfully, yours,

LEWIS TAPPAN.

BRITISH TREATY.

SECRET SESSION.

SPEECH OF MR. RIVES,

OF VIRGINIA.

In Senate, August 17 and 19, 1842—On the treaty with Great Britain.

Mr. RIVES said that the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which the treaty had been referred, not having been able, from the shortness of the time allowed by the now advanced stage of the session, and the consequent necessity of early action on the subject, to make a formal and written report, it devolved on him, as the organ of the committee, to state the views and considerations by which the committee had been influenced, in recommending to the Senate to give the constitutional sanction of their "advice and consent" to its ratification. He begged leave to say, in the outset, that, in forming their judgment on the grave question submitted to them, the committee had felt themselves bound, by the most solemn of all obligations, to discard from their minds every consideration but such as appertained to the true interest and honor of their country. They had felt that it would be to betray the trust reposed in them by the Senate, and to show themselves unworthy of the confidence of the country, if they could, for a moment, permit themselves, in pursuit of party objects, or under the influence of personal or political prejudices, to turn aside from

Some gentlemen, I know, although, like myself, they do not entirely approve this treaty, are yet willing to vote for it as the price of peace. However anxious I may be to preserve peace, I am not willing to purchase it. I differ from them, moreover. I do not believe any peace will be permanent, as long as this agitating subject remains unsettled. England has told you that the door of negotiation on this subject is closed. It will never be re-opened, except at the point of the bayonet. If you were to go to war now, it would be the war of the whole country. From the banks of the Penobscot to the Mississippi, we would present an unbroken front. But, once separate these questions; let the North settle those in which she is more immediately interested, and leave the South alone with its wrongs unredressed; and you increase the chances of war, while you diminish those of its successful prosecution. Your forbearance now will only increase the insolence of Great Britain, and encourage the repetition of outrages like those of the Hermosa and the Creole. She will unfurl the banner of abolition still more conspicuously before the eyes of your slaves. She will accustom them to consider her as their benefactress, the champion of their rights, the avenger of their wrongs; and when war does come—as come it will—she may then hope to realize her threat of being welcomed by them as a deliverer, and her flag, wherever it appears, becoming the signal of servile insurrection.

the national question, to inquire by whom the treaty had been negotiated, or whose name stood subscribed to it. They have looked to the treaty in itself, isolated from every invidious reference to persons or parties; and have pronounced upon its acceptance or rejection as, in their best judgment, the interests and honor of the nation demand.

The stipulations of the treaty embrace three distinct objects: an exact and permanent definition of the boundaries, where they had been the subject of doubt or dispute, between the territories of the United States and the adjacent provinces of Great Britain; a plan of co-operation for the more effectual suppression of the African slave-trade; and an agreement for the mutual surrender, in certain cases, of criminals fugitive from justice. The first of these objects, from its intimate connexion with the tranquillity of the frontier, and the peace of the two countries—on several recent occasions exposed to imminent hazard of interruption, from intrusions on the disputed territory, and the conflicting jurisdictions exercised over it—naturally occupies the foreground of the treaty.

The merits of the controversy respecting our Northeastern boundary, and the respective claims and arguments of the two parties in regard to it, are too well known to the Senate, (said Mr. R.,) to require any recapitulation of them at my hands. A brief retrospect of the history of the controversy, however, may be necessary to enable the Senate to comprehend the position of the question at the moment when the negotiations which terminated in this treaty were entered upon.

The second article of the definitive treaty of peace of 1783, describes the Northeastern boundary of the United States as follows: "Beginning at the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, to wit: that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the source of the St. Croix river to the highlands; along the said highlands, which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean, to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river;" and then, pursuing the description of the boundaries of the United States around their whole territory, on the north, the west, and the south, it returns to the eastern boundary of Maine in the following words: "East by a line to be drawn along the middle of the river St. Croix, from its mouth, in the Bay of Fundy, to its source; and from its source, directly north to the aforesaid highlands, which divide the rivers that fall into the Atlantic ocean from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence."

Nothing could afford a more striking evidence of the extremely defective knowledge of the geography of the country in question, which existed at the time of the signature of the treaty of peace, than the fact, that, in the very first year succeeding the conclusion of the treaty, a serious controversy arose between the high contracting parties as to which was this river St. Croix, here called for as a natural boundary between their adjacent possessions. There were three rivers emptying themselves into Passamaquoddy bay, a part of the Bay of Fundy, (as it was subsequently formally declared to be,*) each one of which, it seemed, had, some time or other, passed under the name of the St. Croix. This territorial comedy of errors, like all other questions of disputed boundary, was, on several occasions, near producing tragical results, by embroiling the authorities and population adjacent to the controverted limits. The most eastern river was claimed by the United States as the true St. Croix—the western by Great Britain. Finally, after lowering over the peace of the frontiers for ten years, this controversy was put in a train of amicable adjustment by the treaty of 1794, (commonly called Jay's treaty,) which provided for the appointment of joint commissioners to determine which was the river truly intended under the name of the St. Croix, in the treaty of peace. The commissioners met, and in 1798 closed their deliberations, by declaring an intermediate river, called the Scoodiac, to be the true St. Croix of the treaty; which has been, accordingly, ever since recognised and observed as the actual boundary of the United States in that quarter, and to that extent.

In a very short time after this portion of the Northeastern boundary was ascertained and established, new difficulties and uncertainties arose in following it out, according to the terms of the treaty of peace. The decision of the commissioners, under the treaty of 1794, in identifying the true river St.

expect, if it succeeded in adjusting the difficulty, it would be (as it has been) on a compromise line. Notwithstanding, when it was first announced that the line agreed on included a considerable portion of the territory lying to the west of the line awarded by the King of Holland, he was incredulous, and expressed himself strongly against it. His first impression was, perhaps, the more strongly against it, from the fact that he had fixed on the river St. John, from the mouth of Eel river, taking the St. Francis branch (the one selected by the King of Holland) as the natural and proper compromise boundary, including in our limits all the portion of the disputed territory lying north of Eel river, and west and south of the St. John, above its junction; and all the other within that of Great Britain. On a little reflection, however, he resolved not to form his opinion of the merits or demerits of the treaty on rumor or imperfect information; but to wait until the whole subject was brought before the Senate officially, and then to make it up on full knowledge of all the facts and circumstances after deliberate and mature reflection; and that he had done with the utmost care and impartiality. What he now proposed was, to give the result, with the reasons on which it rests, and which would govern his vote on the ratification.

He still believed that the boundary which he had fixed in his own mind, was the natural and proper one; but, as that could not be obtained, the question for them to decide was, Are the objections to the boundary as actually agreed on, and the stipulations connected with it, such as ought to cause its rejection? In deciding it, it must be borne in mind that, as far as this portion of the boundary is concerned, it is a question belonging much more to the State of Maine than to the Union. It is, in truth, but the boundary of that State; and it makes a part of the boundary of the United States, only by being the exterior boundary of one of the States of our Federal Union. It is her sovereignty and soil that are in dispute, except the portion of the latter that still remains in Massachusetts; and it belongs in the first place to her, and to Massachusetts, as far as her right of soil is involved, to say what their rights and interests are, and what is required to be done. The rest of the Union is bound to defend them in their just claim; and to assent to what they may be willing to assent to in settling the claim in contest, if there should be nothing in it inconsistent with the interest, honor, or safety of the rest of the Union. It is so that the controversy has ever been regarded. It is well known that President Jackson would readily have agreed to the award of the King of Holland, had not Maine objected; and that to overcome her objection, he was prepared to recommend to Congress to give her, in order to get her consent, one million of acres of the public domain, worth, at the minimum price, a million and a quarter of dollars. The case is now reversed. Maine and Massachusetts have both assented to the stipulations of the treaty, as far as the question of the boundary affects their peculiar interest, through commissioners vested with full powers to represent them; and the question for us to decide is, Shall we reject that to which they have assented? Shall the Government, after refusing to agree to the award of the King of Holland, because Maine objected, now reverse its course, and refuse to agree to that to which she and Massachusetts have both assented? There may, indeed, be reasons strong enough to authorize such a course; but they must be such as will go to prove that we cannot give our assent consistently with the interests, the honor, or the safety of the Union. That has not been done; and, he would add, if there be any such, he has not been able to detect them.

It has, indeed, been said that the assent of Maine was coerced. She certainly desired to obtain a more favorable boundary; but when the alternative was presented of another reference to arbitration, she waived her objection, as far as she was individually concerned, rather than incur the risk, delay, uncertainty and vexation of another submission of her claims to arbitration; and left it to the Senate, the constituted authority appointed for the purpose, to decide on the general merits of the treaty, as it relates to the whole Union. In so doing, she has, in his opinion, acted wisely and patriotically—wisely for herself, and patriotically in reference to the rest of the Union. She has not got, indeed, all she desired; and has even lost territory, if the treaty be compared to the award of the King of Holland; but, as an offset, that which she has lost is of little value, while that which she retains has been greatly increased in value by the stipulations contained in the treaty. The whole amount lost, is about half a million of acres. It lies along the eastern slope of the highlands, skirting the St. Lawrence to the east, and is acknowledged to be of little value for soil, timber, or anything else—a sterile region, in a severe inhospitable clime. Against that loss, she has acquired the right to navigate the river St. John; and that, not only to float down the timber on its banks, but all the productions of the extensive, well-timbered, and, taken as a whole, not a sterile portion of the State that lies on her side of the bosom of that river and its tributaries. But that is not all. She also gains what is vastly more valuable—the right to ship them on the same terms as colonial productions to Great Britain and her colonial possessions. These great and important advantages will probably double the value of that extensive region, and make it one of the most populous and flourishing portions of the State. Estimated by a mere moneyed standard, these advantages are worth, he would suppose, all the rest of the territory claimed by Maine without them. If to this be added the sum of about $200,000 to be paid her for the expense of defending the territory, and $300,000 to her and Massachusetts in equal moieties, in consequence of their assent to the boundary, and the equivalents received, it must be apparent that Maine has not made a bad exchange in accepting the treaty, as compared with the award, as far as her separate interest is concerned. But be that as it may, she is the rightful judge of her own interests; and her assent is a sufficient ground for our assent, provided that to which she has assented does not involve too great a sacrifice on the part of the rest of the Union, nor their honor or safety. So far from that, as far as the rest of the Union is concerned, the sacrifice is small, and the gain great. They are under solemn constitutional obligations to defend Maine, as one of the members of the Union, against invasion; and to protect her territory, cost what it may, and at every hazard. The power, claiming what she contended to be hers, is one of the greatest, if not the greatest, on earth. The dispute is of long standing, and of a character difficult to be adjusted; and, however clear the right of Maine may be regarded in the abstract, it has been made doubtful, in consequence of admissions, for which the Government of the Union is responsible. To terminate such a controversy, with the assent of the party immediately interested, by paying the small sum of half a million—of which a large part (say $200,000) is unquestionably due to Maine, and would have to be paid to her without the treaty—is, indeed, a small sacrifice; a fortunate deliverance. President Jackson was willing to allow her, as has been stated, more than twice as much for her assent to the award; and, in doing so, he showed his wisdom, whatever might have been thought of it at the time. Those, at least, who opposed the treaty, will not charge him with being willing to sacrifice the interest and honor of the Union, in making the offer; and yet the charge which they make against this portion of the treaty, does, by implication, subject what he was ready to do to a similar one.

But it is said that the territory which England would acquire beyond the boundary of the awarded line would greatly strengthen her frontier, and weaken ours; and would thereby endanger the safety of the country in that quarter. He did not profess to be deeply versed in military science; but, according to his conception, there was no foundation for the objection. It was, if he did not mistake, the very last point on our whole frontier, from the mouth of the St. Croix to the outlet of Lake Superior, on which an expedition would be organized on either side to attack the possessions of the other. In a military point of view, our loss is as nothing in that quarter; while in another, and a much more important quarter, our gain by the treaty is great, in the same point of view. He referred to that provision by which we acquire Rouse's Point, at the northern extremity of Lake Champlain. It is among the most important military positions on the whole line of our eastern and northern frontier, whether it be regarded in reference to offensive or defensive operations. He well remembered the deep sensation caused among military men in consequence of its loss; and he would leave the question of loss or gain, in a military point of view, (taking the two together,) to their decision, without the least doubt what it would be.

But if it should be thought by any one that these considerations, as conclusive as they seemed to be, were not sufficient to justify the ratification of this portion of the treaty, there were others, which appeared to him to be perfectly conclusive. He referred to the condition in which we would be left, if the treaty should be rejected. He would ask—if, after having agreed at Ghent to refer the subject to arbitration, and, after having refused to agree to the award made under that reference, by an arbitrator of our own selection, we should now reject this treaty, negotiated by our own Secretary of State, under our own eyes, and which had previously received the assent of the States immediately interested—whether there would be the slightest prospect that another equally favorable would ever be obtained? On the contrary, would we not stand in a far worse condition than ever, in reference to our claim? Would it not, indeed, be almost certain that we should lose the whole of the basin of the St. John, and Great Britain gain all for which she ever contended, strengthened as she would be by the disclosures made during this discussion?* He was far from asserting that the facts

*The following extract from the speech of Mr. RIVES, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, will show what the disclosures were:

It appears to the committee, therefore, in looking back to the public and solemn acts of the Government, and of its successive administrations, that the time has passed, if it ever existed, when we could be justified in making the precise line of boundary claimed by us the subject of a sine qua non of negotiation, or of the ultimo ratio—of an assertion by force. Did a second arbitration, then, afford the prospect of a more satisfactory result? This expedient seemed to be equally rejected by all parties—by the United States, by Great Britain, and by the State of Maine. If such an alternative should be contemplated by any one as preferable to the arrangement which had been made, it is fit to bear in mind the risk and uncertainty, as well as the inevitable delay and expense, incident to that mode of decision. We have already seen, in the instance of the arbitration by the King of the Netherlands, how much weight a tribunal of that sort is inclined to give to the argument of convenience, and a supposed intention on the part of the negotiators of the treaty of 1783, against the literal and positive terms employed by the instrument in its description of limits. Is there no danger, in the event of another arbitration, that a farther research into the public archives of Europe might bring to light some embarrassing (even though apocryphal) document, to throw a new shade of plausible doubt on the clearness of our title, in the view of a sovereign arbiter? Such a document has already been communicated to the committee; and I feel it (said Mr. R.) to be my duty to lay it before the Senate, that they may fully appreciate its bearings, and determine for themselves the weight and importance which belong to it. It is due to the learned and distinguished gentleman, (Mr. Jared Sparks of Boston,) by whom the document referred to was discovered in the archives of France, while pursuing her laborious and intelligent researches connected with the history of our own country, that the account of it should be given in his own words, as contained in a communication addressed by him to the Department of State. I proceed, therefore, to read from that communication:

"While pursuing my researches among the voluminous papers relating to the American Revolution in the Archives des Affaires Etrangeres in Paris, I found in one of the bound volumes an original letter from Dr. Franklin to Count de Vergennes, of which the following is an extract transcript:

"PASSY, December 6, 1782.

"SIR: I have the honor of returning herewith the map your Excellency sent me yesterday. I have marked with a strong red line, according to your desire, the limits of the United States, as settled in the preliminaries between the British and American plenipotentiaries.

"With great respect, I am, &c.,
"B. FRANKLIN."

"This letter was written six days after the preliminaries were signed; and if we could procure the identical map mentioned by Franklin, it would seem to afford conclusive evidence as to the meaning affixed by the commissioners to the language of the treaty on the subject of the boundaries. You may well suppose that I lost no time in making inquiry for the map, not doubting that it would confirm all my previous opinions respecting the validity of our claim. In the geographical department of the Archives are sixty thousand maps and charts; but so well arranged with catalogues and indexes, that any one of them may be easily found. After a little research in the American division, with the aid of the keeper, I came upon a map of North America, by D'Anville, dated 1746, in size about eighteen inches square, on which was drawn a strong red line throughout the entire boundary of the United States, answering precisely to Franklin's description. The line is bold and distinct in every part, made with red ink, and apparently drawn with a hair pencil, or a pen with a blunt point. There is no other coloring on any part of the map.

"Imagine my surprise on discovering that this line runs wholly south of the St. John, and between the head waters of that river and those of the Penobscot and Kennebec. In short, it is exactly the line now contended for by Great Britain, except that it concedes more than is claimed. The north line, after departing from the source of the St. Croix, instead of proceeding to Mars Hill, stops far short of that point, and turns off to the west, so as to leave on the British side all the streams which flow into the St. John, between the source of the St. Croix and Mars Hill. It is evident that the line, from the St. Croix to the Canadian highlands, is intended to exclude all the waters running into the St. John.

"There is no positive proof that this map is actually the one marked by Franklin; yet, upon any other supposition, it would be difficult to explain the circumstances of its agreeing so perfectly with his description, and of its being preserved in the place where it would naturally be deposited by Count de Ver-disclosed established the claim of Great Britain, or that the map exhibited is the one to which Franklin referred, in his note to the Count de Vergennes, the French Minister; but it cannot be doubted that the conformity of the line delineated on the map, with the one described in his note, would have the effect of strengthening not a little the claims of Great Britain, in her own estimation and that of the world. But the facts stated, and the map exhibited by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, [Mr. RIVES,] are not the only or the strongest disclosure made during the discussion. The French map introduced by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] from Mr. Jefferson's collection in the Congress library, in order to rebut the inference from the former, turned out to be still more so. That was made in the village of Passy, in the year after the treaty of peace was negotiated, where Franklin (who was one of the negotiators) resided, and was dedicated to him; and that has the boundary line drawn in exact conformity to the other, and in the manner described in the note of Dr. Franklin—a line somewhat more adverse to us than that claimed by Great Britain. But, as striking as is this coincidence, he was far from regarding it as sufficient to establish the claim of Great Britain. It would, however, be in vain to deny that it was a corroborating circumstance, calculated to add no small weight to her claim.

It would be still further increased by the fact that France was our ally at the time, and, as such, must have been consulted, and kept constantly advised of all that occurred during the progress of the negotiation, including its final result. It would be idle to suppose that these disclosures would not weigh heavily against us in any future negotiation. They would, so much so—taken in connexion with the adverse award of the King of Holland, and this treaty, should it be rejected—as to render hopeless any future attempt to settle the question by negotiation or arbitration. No alternative would be left us, but to yield to the full extent of the British claim, or to put Maine in possession by force—and that, too, with the opinion and sympathy of the world against us and our cause. In his opinion, we would be bound to attempt it, in justice to Maine, should we refuse to agree to what she has assented. So much for the boundary question, as far as Maine is concerned.

Having now shown (satisfactorily, he hoped) that Maine has acted wisely for herself in assenting to the treaty, it remained to be considered whether we, the representatives of the Union on such questions, would not also do so in ratifying it—so far, at least, as the boundary question is involved. He would add nothing to what had already been said of the portion in which Maine was immediately interested. His remarks would be confined to the remaining portion of the boundary, extending from the northwestern corner of that State to the Rocky mountains.

Throughout this long-extended line, every question has been settled to our satisfaction. Our right has been acknowledged to a territory of about one hundred thousand acres of land, in New Hampshire, which would have been lost by the award of the King of Holland. A long gore of about the same amount, lying in Vermont and New York, and which was lost under the treaty of Ghent, would be regained by this. It includes Rouse's Point. Sugar Island, lying in the water connexion between Lakes Huron and Superior, and heretofore in dispute, is acknowledged to be ours; it is large, and valuable for soil and position. So, also, is Isle Royale, near the northern shore of Lake Superior, acknowledged to be ours—a large island, and valuable for its fisheries. And, also, a large tract of country to the north and west of that lake, between Fond du Lac and the river St. Louis on one side, and Pigeon river on the other—containing four millions of acres. It is said to be sterile; but cannot well be more so than that acquired by Great Britain, lying west of the boundary awarded by the King of Holland. In addition, all the islands in the river St. Lawrence and the lakes, which were divided in running out the division line under previous treaties, are acquired by us under this; and all the channels and passages are opened to the common uses of our citizens and the subjects of Great Britain.

Such are the provisions of the treaty in reference to this long line of boundary. Our gain—regarded in the most contracted point of view, as mere equivalents for the sum assumed to be paid by us to Maine and Massachusetts for their assent to the treaty—is vastly greater than what we have contracted to pay. Taking the whole boundary question together, and summing up the loss and gain of the whole, including what affects Maine and Massachusetts; and he could not doubt that, regarded merely as set offs, our gain greatly exceeded our loss—vastly so, compared to what it would have been under the award of the King of Holland, including the equivalent which our Government was willing to allow Maine for her assent. But it would be, indeed, to take a very contracted view to regard it in that light. It would be to overlook the vast importance of permanently establishing, between two such powers, a line of boundary of several thousand miles, abounding in disputed points of much difficulty and long standing. The treaty, he trusted, would do much to lay the foundation of a solid peace between the countries—a thing so much to be desired.

It is certainly much to be regretted, after settling so large a portion of the boundary, that the part beyond the Rocky mountains should remain unadjusted. Its settlement would have contributed much to strengthen the foundation of a durable peace. But would it be wise to reject the treaty, because all has not been done that could be desired? He placed a high value on our territory on the west of those mountains, and held our title to it to be clear; but he would regard it as an act of consummate folly, to stake our claim on a trial of strength at this time. The territory is now held by joint occupancy, under the treaty of Ghent; which either party may terminate by giving to the other six months' notice. If we were to attempt to assert our exclusive right of occupancy at present, the certain loss of the territory must be the result; for the plain reason, that Great Britain could concentrate there a much larger force, naval and military, in a much shorter time, and at far less expense, than we could. That will not be denied; but it will not always be the case. Our population is steadily—he might say rapidly—advancing across the continent, to the borders of the Pacific ocean. Judging from past experience, the tide of population will sweep across the Rocky mountains, with resistless force, at no distant period; when what we claim will quietly fall into our hands, without expense or bloodshed. Time is acting for us. Wait patiently, and all we claim will be ours; but if we attempt to seize it by force, it will be sure to elude our grasp.

Having now stated his reasons for voting to ratify the articles in the treaty relating to the boundary, he would next proceed to assign those that would govern his vote on the two relating to the African slave-trade. And here he would premise, that there are several circumstances, which caused no small repugnance on his part to any stipulations whatever with Great Britain on the subject of those articles; and he would add, that he would have been gratified if they, and all other stipulations on the subject, could have been entirely omitted; but he must, at the same time, say he did not see how it was possible to avoid entering into some arrangement on the subject. To understand the difficulty, it will be necessary to advert to the course heretofore taken by our Government in reference to the subject, and the circumstances under which the negotiations that resulted in this treaty commenced.

Congress at an early day—as soon, in fact, as it could legislate on the subject under the Constitution—passed laws enacting severe penalties against the African slave-trade. That was followed by the treaty of Ghent, which declared it to be irreconcilable with the principles of humanity and justice, and stipulated that both of the parties—the United States and Great Britain—should use their best endeavors to effect its abolition. Shortly after, an act of Congress was passed declaring it to be piracy; and a resolution was adopted by Congress, requesting the President to enter into arrangements with other powers for its suppression. Great Britain, actuated by the same feelings, succeeded in making treaties with the European maritime powers for its suppression; and, not long before the commencement of this negotiation, had entered into joint stipulations with the five great powers to back her on the question of search. She had thus acquired a general supervision of the trade along the African coast; so that vessels carrying the flag of every other country, except ours, were subject on that coast to the inspection of her cruisers, and to be captured, if suspected of being engaged in the slave-trade. In consequence, ours became almost the only flag used by those engaged in the trade, whether our own people or foreigners; although our laws inhibited the traffic under the severest penalties. In this state of things, Great Britain put forward the claim of the right of search as indispensable to suppress a trade prohibited by the laws of the civilized world, and to the execution of the laws and treaties of the nations associated with her by mutual engagements for its suppression. At this stage, a correspondence took place between our late minister at the Court of St. James and Lord Palmerston on the subject, in which the latter openly and boldly claimed the right of search, and which was promptly and decidedly repelled on our side. We had long since taken our stand against it, and had resisted its abuse, as a belligerent right, at the mouth of the cannon. Neither honor nor policy on our part could tolerate its exercise in time of peace, in any form—whether in that of search, as claimed by Lord Palmerston; or the less offensive and unreasonable one of visitation, as proposed by his successor, Lord Aberdeen. And yet we were placed in such circumstances as to require that something should be done. It was in such a state of things that the negotiation commenced—and commenced, in part, in reference to this subject, which was tending rapidly to bring the two countries into collision. On our side, we were deeply committed against the traffic, both by legislation and treaty. The influence and the efforts of the civilized world were directed against it—and that, too, under our lead at the commencement; and with such success as to compel vessels engaged in it to take shelter, almost exclusively, under the fraudulent use of our flag. To permit such a state of things to continue, could not but deeply impeach our honor, and turn the sympathy of the world against us. On the other side, Great Britain had acquired, by treaties, the right of supervision, including that of search and capturing, over the trade on the coast of Africa, with the view to its suppression, from all the maritime powers except ourgeanes. I also found another map in the Archives, on which the same boundary was traced in a dotted red line with a pen, apparently copied from the other.

"I enclose herewith a map of Maine, on which I have drawn a strong black line, corresponding with the red one above mentioned."

I am far from intimating (said Mr. RIVES) that the documents discovered by Mr. Sparks, curious and well worthy of consideration as they undoubtedly are, are of weight sufficient to shake the title of the United States, founded on the positive language of the treaty of peace. But they could not fail, in the event of another reference, to give increased confidence and emphasis to the pretensions of Great Britain, and to exert a corresponding influence upon the mind of the arbiter. It is worth while, in this connexion, to turn to what Lord Ashburton has said, in one of his communications to Mr Webster, when explaining his views of the position of the highlands described in the treaty:

"My inspection of the maps, and my examination of the documents," says his Lordship, "lead me to a very strong conviction that the highlands contemplated by the negotiators of the treaty were the only highlands then known to them—at the head of the Penobscot, Kennebec, and the rivers west of the St. Croix; and that they did not precisely know how the north line from the St. Croix would strike them; and if it were not my wish to shorten this discussion, I believe a very good argument might be drawn from the words of the treaty in proof of this. In the negotiations with Mr. Livingston, and afterwards with Mr. McLane, this view seemed to prevail; and, as you are aware, there were proposals to search for these highlands to the west, where alone, I believe, they will be found to answer perfectly the description of the treaty. If this question should unfortunately go to a further reference, I should by no means despair of finding some confirmation of this view of the case."

It is for the Senate to consider (added Mr. RIVES) whether there would not be much risk of introducing new complications and embarrassments in this controversy, by leaving it open for another litigated reference; and if the British Government—strongly prepossessed, as its minister tell us it is, with the justice of its claims - would not find what it would naturally consider a persuasive "confirmation of its view of the case" in documents such as those encountered by Mr. Sparks in his historical researches in the archives of France.

A map has been vauntingly paraded here, from Mr. Jefferson's collection, in the zeal of opposition, (without taking time to see what it was,) to confront and invalidate the map found by Mr. Sparks in the Foreign Office at Paris; but, the moment it is examined, it is found to sustain, by the most precise and remarkable correspondence in every feature, the map communicated by Mr. Sparks. The Senator who produced it, could see nothing but the microscopic dotted line running off in a northeasterly direction; but the moment other eyes were applied to it, there was found, in bold relief, a strong red line, indicating the limits of the United States according to the treaty of peace, and coinciding, minutely and exactly, with the boundary traced on the map of Mr. Sparks. That this red line, and not the hardly visible dotted line, was intended to represent the limits of the United States according to the treaty of peace, is conclusively shown by the circumstance that the red line is drawn on the map all around the exterior boundary of the United States;—through the middle of the Northern Lakes, thence through the Long Lake and the Rainy Lake to the Lake of the Woods; and from the western extremity of the Lake of the Woods to the river Mississippi; and along that river, to the point where the boundary of the United States, according to the treaty of peace, leaves it; and thence, by its easterly course, to the mouth of the St. Mary's, on the Atlantic.

selves. Thus situated, he must say that he saw no alternative for us but the one adopted—to take the supervision of our own trade on that coast into our own hands, and to prevent, by our own cruisers, the fraudulent use of our flag. The only question, in the actual state of things, as it appeared to him, was, whether it should be done by a formal or informal arrangement? He would have preferred the latter; but the difference between them was not, in his opinion, such as would justify, on that account, the rejection of the treaty. They would, in substance, be the same, and have differed but little, probably, in the expense of execution. Either was better than the other alternatives—to do nothing; to leave things in the dangerous state they stood; or to yield to the right of search or visitation.

It is objected that the arrangement entered into is virtually an acknowledgment of the right of search. He did not so regard it. On the contrary, he considered it, under all the circumstances, as a surrender of that claim on the part of Great Britain; a conclusion, which a review of the whole transaction, in his opinion, would justify. Lord Palmerston, in the first place, claimed the unqualified right of search, in which it is understood he was backed by the five great powers. Lord Aberdeen, with more wisdom and moderation, explained it to mean the right of visitation simply; and, finally, the negotiation is closed without reference to either, simply with a stipulation between the parties to keep up for five years a squadron of not less than eighty guns on the coast of Africa, to enforce separately and respectively the laws and obligations of each of the countries for the suppression of the slave-trade. It is carefully worded, to make it mutual, but at the same time separate and independent; each looking to the execution of its own laws and obligations, and carefully excluding the supervision of either over the over, and thereby directly rebutting the object of search or visitation.

The other article, in reference to the same subject, stipulates that the parties will unite in all becoming representation and remonstrance, with any powers within whose dominions markets are permitted for imported African slaves. If he were to permit his feelings to govern him exclusively he would object to this more strongly than any other provision in the treaty;—not that he was opposed to the object or the policy of closing the market to imported negroes; on the contrary, he thought it both right and expedient in every view. Brazil and the Spanish colonies were the only markets, he believed, still remaining open, and to which this provision would apply. They were already abundantly supplied with slaves, and he had no doubt that sound policy on their part required that their markets should be finally and effectually closed. He would go farther, and say, that it was our interest they should be. It would free us from the necessity of keeping cruisers on the African coast, to prevent the illegal and fraudulent use of our flag, or for any other purpose but to protect our commerce in that quarter—a thing of itself much to be desired. We would have a still stronger interest, if we were governed by selfish considerations. We are rivals in the production of several articles, and more especially the greatest of all the agricultural staples—cotton. Next to our own country, Brazil possesses the greatest advantages for its production, and is already a large grower of the article; towards the production of which, the continuance of the market for imported slaves from Africa would contribute much. But he would not permit such considerations to influence him in voting on the treaty. He had no objection to see Brazil develop her resources to the full; but he did believe that higher considerations, connected with her safety, and that of the Spanish colonies, made it their interest that their market should be closed against the traffic.

But it may be asked, why, with these impressions, should he have any objection to this provision of the treaty? It was, because he was averse to interfering with other powers, when it could be avoided. It extends even to cases like the present, where there was a common interest in reference to the subject of advice or remonstrance; but it would be carrying his aversion to fastidiousness, were he to permit it to overrule his vote in the adjustment of questions of such magnitude as are involved on the present occasion.

But the treaty is opposed, not only for what it contains, but also for what it does not; and, among other objections of the kind, because it has no provision in reference to the case of the Creole, and other similar ones. He admitted that it is an objection; and that it was very desirable that the treaty should have guarded, by specific and efficient provisions, against the recurrence of such outrages on the rights of our citizens, and indignity to our honor and independence. If any one has a right to speak warmly on this subject, he was the individual; but he could not forget that the question for us to decide is, Shall we ratify or reject the treaty? It is not whether all has been done which it was desirable should be done, but whether we shall confirm or reject what has actually been done; not whether we have gained all we could desire, but whether we shall retain what we have gained. To decide that as it ought to be, it is our duty to weigh, calmly and fairly, the reasons for and against the ratification, and to decide in favor of the side which preponderates.

It does not follow that nothing has been done in relation to the cases under consideration, because the treaty contains no provisions in reference to them. The fact is otherwise. Much, very much, has been done;—in his opinion, little short, in its effect, of a positive stipulation by the treaty to guard against the recurrence of such cases hereafter. To understand how much has been done, and what has been gained by us, it is necessary to have a correct conception of the state of the case in reference to them, before the negotiation commenced, and since it terminated.

These cases are not of recent origin. The first of the kind was that of the brig Comet, which was stranded on the false keys of the Bahamas, as far back as 1830, with slaves on board. She was taken into Nassau, New Providence, by the wreckers, and the slaves liberated by the colonial authorities. The next was the Encomium, which occurred in 1834, and which, in all the material circumstances, was every way similar to that of the Comet. The case of the Enterprise followed. It took place in 1835, and differed in no material circumstance from the others, as was acknowledged by the British Government, except that it occurred after the act of Parliament abolishing slavery in the colonies had gone into operation, and the others prior to that period.

After a long correspondence of nearly ten years, the British Government agreed to pay for the slaves on board of the two first, on the ground that they were liberated before the act abolishing slavery had gone into operation; but refused to pay for those belonging to the Enterprise, because they were liberated after it had. To justify this distinction, Lord Palmerston had to assume the ground, virtually, that the law of nations was opposed to slavery—an assumption that placed the property of a third of the Union without the pale of its protection. On that ground, he peremptorily refused compensation for the slaves on board the Enterprise. Our Executive, under this refusal, accepted the compensation for those on board the Comet and Encomium, and closed the correspondence, without even bringing the subject before Congress. With such perfect indifference was the whole affair treated, that, during the long period the negotiation was pending, the subject was never once mentioned, as far as he recollected, in any Executive message; while those of far less magnitude—the debt of a few millions due from France, and this very boundary question—were constantly brought before Congress, and had nearly involved the country in war with two of the leading powers of Europe. Those who are now so shocked that the boundary question should be settled, without a settlement also of this, stood by in silence, year after year, during this long period, not only without attempting to unite the settlement of this with that of the boundary, but without ever once naming or alluding to it as an item in the list of the dispute between the two powers. It was regarded as beneath notice. He rejoiced to witness the great change that has taken place in relation to it; and to find that those who were then silent and indifferent, now exhibit so much zeal and vehemence about it. He took credit to himself for having contributed to bring this change about. It was he who revived our claim when it lay dead and buried among the archives of the State Department—who called for the correspondence—who moved resolutions affirming the principles of the law of nations in reference to these cases, and repelling the presumptuous and insulting assumption on which it was denied by the British negotiator. Such was the force of truth, and so solid the foundation on which he rested our claim, that his resolutions received the unanimous vote of this body; but he received no support—no, not a cheering word—from the quarter which now professes so much zeal on the subject. His utmost hope at the time was to keep alive our right, till some propitious moment should arrive to assert it successfully. In the mean time, the case of the Creole occurred, which, as shocking and outrageous as it is, was but the legitimate consequence of the principle maintained by Lord Palmerston, and on which he closed the correspondence in the case of the Enterprise.

Such was the state of the facts when the negotiation commenced in reference to these cases; and it remains now to be shown in what state it has left them. In the first place, the broad principles of the law of nations, on which he placed our right in his resolutions, have been clearly stated and conclusively vindicated in the very able letter of the Secretary of State, which has strengthened our cause not a little, as well from its intrinsic merit as the quarter from which it comes. In the next place, we have an explicit recognition of the principles for which we contend, in the answer of Lord Ashburton, who expressly says that, "on the great general principles affecting this case," (the Creole,) "they do not differ;" and that is followed by "an engagement that instructions shall be given to the Governors of her Majesty's colonies on the southern borders of the United States, to execute their own laws with careful attention to the wishes of their Government to maintain good neighborhood; and that there shall be no officious interference with American vessels driven by accident or violence into their ports. The laws and duties of hospitality shall be executed." This pledge was accepted by our Executive, accompanied by the express declaration of the President, through the Secretary of State, that he places his reliance on those principles of public law which had been stated in the note of the Secretary of State. To all this it may be added, that strong assurances are given, by the British negotiator, of his belief that a final arrangement may be made of the subject by positive stipulations in London. Such is the state in which the negotiation has left the subject.

Here, again, he would repeat, that such stipulations in the treaty itself would have been preferable. But who can deny, when he compares the state of the facts, as they stood before and since the close of this negotiation, that we have gained—largely gained—in reference to this important subject? Is there no difference, he would ask, between a stern and peremptory denial of our right, on the broad and insulting ground assumed by Lord Palmerston, and its explicit recognition by Lord Ashburton?—none in the pledge that instructions should be given to guard against the recurrence of such cases; to a positive denial that we had suffered wrong or insult, and had any right to complain?—none between a final closing of all negotiation, and a strong assurance of a final adjustment of the subject by satisfactory arrangement by treaty? And would it be wise or prudent on our part to reject what has been gained, because all has not been? As to himself, he must say, that, at the time he moved his resolutions, he little hoped, in the short space of two years, to obtain what has already been gained; and that he regarded the prospect of a final and satisfactory adjustment, at no distant day, of this subject, so vital in its principles to his constituents and the whole South, as far more probable than he then did this explicit recognition of the principles for which he contended. In the mean time, he felt assured the engagement given by the British negotiator would be fulfilled in good faith; and that the hazard of collision between the countries, and the disturbance of their peace and friendship, has passed away, as far as it depends on this dangerous subject. But if in this he should unfortunately be mistaken, we should stand on much more solid ground in defence of our rights, in consequence of what has been gained; as there would then be superadded broken faith to the violation of the laws of nations.

Having now said what he intended on the more important points, he would pass over, without dwelling on the provision of the treaty for delivering up to justice persons charged with certain crimes; the affair of the Caroline; and the correspondence in reference to impressment. The first is substantially the same as that contained in Jay's treaty on the same subject. On the next, he had nothing to add to what has already been said. As to the last, he did not doubt that the strong ground taken in the correspondence against the impressment of seamen on board of our merchant vessels, in time of war, would have a good effect. It will contribute to convince Great Britain that the practice cannot be renewed, in the event of another European war, without a certain and immediate conflict between the two countries.

I (said Mr. CALHOUN) have now stated my opinion fully and impartially on the treaty, with the connected subjects. On reviewing the whole, and weighing the reasons for and against its ratification, I cannot doubt that the former greatly preponderate. If we have not gained all that could be desired, we have gained much that is desirable; and, if all has not been settled, much has been—and that, not of little importance. It is not of little importance to have the Northeastern boundary settled—and that, too, with the consent of the States immediately interested: a subject which has been in dispute almost from the origin of the Government, and which had become more and more entangled, and adverse to our claim, on every attempt heretofore made to settle it. Nor is it of little importance to have the whole line of boundary between us and the British dominions, from the source of the St. Croix to the Rocky mountains, settled—a line of more than three thousand miles, with many disputed points of long standing, the settlement of which had baffled all previous attempts. Nor is it of little importance to have adjusted the embarrassments relating to the African slave-trade, by adopting the least objectionable of the alternatives. Nor to have the principles of the law of nations for which we contended, in reference to the Creole and other cases of the kind, recognised by Great Britain; nor to have a solemn pledge against their recurrence, with a reasonable assurance of satisfactory stipulations by treaty. Nor is it of little importance to have, by the settlement of these inveterate and difficult questions, the relation of the two countries settled down in amity and peace—permanent amity and peace, as it may be hoped—in the place of that doubtful, unsettled condition, between peace and war, which has for so many years characterized it, and which is so hostile to the interest and prosperity of both countries.

Peace (said Mr. C.) is the first of our wants, in the present condition of our country. We wanted peace, to reform our own Government, and to relieve the country from its great embarrassments. Our Government is deeply disordered; its credit is impaired; its debt increasing; its expenditures extravagant and wasteful; its disbursements without efficient accountability; and its taxes (for duties are but taxes) enormous, unequal, and oppressive to the great producing classes of the country. Peace, settled and undisturbed, is indispensable to a thorough reform, and such a reform to the duration of the Government. But, so long as the relation between the two countries continues in a state of doubt between peace and war, all attempts at such reform will prove abortive. The first step in any such, to be successful, must be to reduce the expenditures to the legitimate and economical wants of the Government. Without that, there can be nothing worthy of the name; but in an unsettled state of the relations of the two countries, all attempts at reduction will be baffled by the cry of war, accompanied by insinuations against the patriotism of those who may be so hardy as to make them. Should the treaty be ratified, an end will be put to that, and no excuse or pretext be left to delay the great and indispensable work of reform. This may not be desirable to those who see, or fancy they see, benefits in high duties and wasteful expenditures; but, by the great producing and tax-paying portions of the community, it will be regarded as one of the greatest of blessings. These are not the only reasons for wanting peace. We want it, to enable the people and the States to extricate themselves from their embarrassments. They are both borne down by heavy debts, contracted in a period of fallacious prosperity, from which there is no other honest and honorable extrication but the payment of what is due. To enable both States and individuals to pay their debts, they must be left in full possession of all their means, with as little exactions or restrictions on their industry as possible on the part of this Government. To this, a settled state of peace, and an open and free commerce, are indispensable. With these, and the increasing habits of economy and industry now everywhere pervading the country, the period of embarrassment will soon pass away, to be succeeded by one of permanent and healthy prosperity.

Peace is, indeed, our policy. A kind Providence has cast our lot on a portion of the globe sufficiently vast to satisfy the most grasping ambition, and abounding in resources beyond all others, which only require to be fully developed to make us the greatest and most prosperous people on earth. To the full development of the vast resources of our country, we have political institutions most happily constituted. Indeed, it would be difficult to imagine a system more so than our Federal Republic—a system of State and General Governments, so blended as to constitute one sublime whole; the latter having charge of the interests common to all, and the former those local and peculiar to each State. With a system so happily constituted, let a durable and firm peace be established, and this Government be confined rigidly to the few great objects for which it was instituted; leaving the States to contend in generous rivalry, to develop, by the arts of peace, their respective resources, and a scene of prosperity and happiness would follow, heretofore unequalled on the globe. I trust (said Mr. C.) that this treaty may prove the first step towards such a peace. Once established with Great Britain, it would not be difficult, with moderation and prudence, to establish permanent peace with the rest of the world, when our most sanguine hopes of prosperity may be realized.

BRITISH TREATY.

SECRET SESSION.

REMARKS OF MR. WILLIAMS,

OF MAINE.

In Senate, August 19, 1842.—On the treaty of Washington.

Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I can truly say that "this is not the entertainment to which my State was invited." Soon after the arrival in this country of the special minister from England, the Governor of Maine was notified of that fact, and informed that this minister was charged with full powers from his sovereign to negotiate and settle the different matters in discussion between the two Governments; and had officially announced to this Government that, in regard to the boundary question, he had authority to treat for a conventional line, or line by agreement, on such terms and conditions, and with such mutual considerations and equivalents, as might be thought just and equitable: that he was ready to enter upon a negotiation for such conventional line, as soon as this Government should say it was authorized and ready, on its part, to commence such negotiation. And a strong appeal was made by this Government to the Governor of Maine to convene the Legislature, in order that authority might be communicated to this Government to settle the controversy, by agreeing upon a new line of boundary. It was known that Maine had heretofore declined to give her assent to a conventional line, and insisted upon the line as described in the treaty of 1783; and, to induce her to yield her assent, it was announced, in the letter of the Secretary of State to the Governor of Maine, that the President felt it to be his duty, unless some new course should be proposed, to cause the negotiation (for another arbitration) to be resumed, and pressed to its conclusion.

The Governor of Maine did not hesitate, upon such an invitation, and upon such announcements, to convene the Legislature, in a busy season of the year, and at great expense to the State; and to submit to its serious consideration the communication made to him from this Government.

That Legislature—"declaring its solemn conviction that the boundary of Maine, on its northern and northeastern frontiers, as designated in the treaty of 1783, can be laid down and fixed according to the terms of that treaty; and that such line embraces all the territory over which Maine claims property, sovereignty, and jurisdiction; and that the Executive and Congress of the United States had recognised the validity of that claim, in its full extent"—was yet willing to regard the recommendation and request of the President with all the respect due to the high source from which they came; and to look carefully at the suggestions made by him, as the head of the Government of the Union, upon a subject so interesting to Maine, as well as to her sister States of the Confederacy. Thus, looking at the communication from this Government to the Governor of Maine, it was seen that, "without the concurrence of the two States of Massachusetts and Maine, (whose rights are more immediately concerned—both having an interest in the soil, and one of them in the jurisdiction and government,) the duty of the General Government will be to adopt no new course; but, in compliance with treaty stipulations, and in furtherance of what has already been done, to hasten the pending negotiations as fast as possible;" that "the President thinks it a highly desirable object to prevent the delays necessarily incident to any settlement of the question by these means," (negotiation and arbitration;) that "it had been found that the exploration and examination of the several lines constitute a work of three years;" that "the existing commission for making such exploration, under the authority of the United States, has been occupied two summers; and a very considerable portion of the work remains to be done;" that "if a joint commission should be appointed, and go through the same work, and the commissioners should disagree, (as is very possible,) and an arbitration on that account become indispensable, the arbitrators might find it necessary to make an exploration and survey themselves, or cause the same to be done by others of their own appointment;" that "if to these causes, operating to postpone the final decision, be added the time necessary to appoint arbitrators, and for their preparation to leave Europe for the service, and the various retarding incidents always attending such operations, seven or eight years constitute, perhaps, the shortest period within which we can look for a final result;" that, "in the mean time, great expenses have been incurred, and further expenses cannot be avoided;" that "it is well known that the controversy has brought heavy charges upon Maine herself, to the remuneration or proper settlement of which she cannot be expected to be indifferent;" that "the exploration by the Government of the United States has already cost one hundred thousand dollars; and the charge of another summer's work is in prospect;" that "these facts may be sufficient to form a probable estimate of the whole expense likely to be incurred before the controversy can be settled by arbitration; and our experience admonishes us that another arbitration might fail;" that "the opinion of this Government upon the justice and validity of the American claim has been expressed so many times, that a repetition of that opinion is not necessary;" that "the subject is a subject in dispute;" that "the Government has agreed to make it a subject of reference and arbitration; and it must fulfil that agreement, unless another mode for settling the controversy should be resorted to, with a hope of speedier decision;" that "the President proposes that the Governments of Maine and Massachusetts should severally appoint commissioners empowered to confer with the authorities of this Government upon a conventional line, or line by agreement, with its terms, considerations, and equivalents, with an understanding that no such line be agreed upon without the assent of such commissioners;" that "this mode of proceeding, or some other which shall express assent beforehand, seems indispensable, if any negotiation for a conventional line is to be had; since, if happily a treaty should be the result of a negotiation, it can only be submitted to the Senate of the United States for ratification," and that "these considerations, in addition to the importance of the subject, and a firm conviction in the mind of the President that the interests of both countries, as well as the interests of the two States more immediately concerned, require a prompt effort to bring this dispute to an end, constrain him to express an earnest hope that your Excellency will convene the Legislature of Maine, and submit the subject to its grave and candid deliberation."

It cannot be unknown to the Senate and to the country, that Maine, ever since she became a State, has insisted upon her absolute and perfect right to all the territory claimed by her; and that such is her right, has been admitted and proclaimed by all departments of the General Government. Maine has uniformly protested against her right being brought into jeopardy by any submission of it to arbitration; and the protest of the lamented Governor Lincoln, now in the archives of the Department of State, and published by order of Congress, prior to the submission to the King of the Netherlands, will long be cherished by the citizens of Maine as a noble and masterly effort of a patriot and statesman to arrest the downward course which diplomacy and treaties had given to our once certain and undisputed title, and should have prevented the submission of the territorial rights of a sovereign State to the arbitrament of any foreign power. But, unfortunately for Maine, and I think for the nation, the reference was made; and we all know the result of it—precisely what was foretold; the arbiter split the difference, recommending a line which he thought more convenient, and giving to Great Britain that portion of the territory claimed by Maine which was necessary to the direct communication between the British provinces of Canada and New Brunswick. That award or recommendation was not ratified by this Government; and further efforts have been made on our part to obtain a settlement of the line, according to the treaty of 1783; but the British Government would not treat further upon that basis, unless our Government would first agree to certain preliminaries, which would weaken, if not destroy, our claim. And now, ten years after the award of the King of the Netherlands was rejected, Maine is told by this General Government, to which she has a right to look for the protection and preservation of her rights, and which is bound by the Constitution to defend her in the enjoyment of her whole territory, that, unless she will authorize a conventional line, her rights must again be subjected to the judgment and final disposition and arbitrament of foreigners!—that seven or eight years is the least time in which we may expect a decision; and then it may fail, as did the former attempt to settle the question by arbitration!!

Mr. President, the people of Maine, as well as their Legislature, have a perfect horror of seeing their rights, or the rights of any sovereign State of this Union, submitted again to the arbitrament and disposal of any foreign sovereign whatever. Our controversy is with Great Britain—between a republic on one side, and a monarchy on the other; and this controversy relates to the line dividing our States and her provinces; to what belongs to us by the terms of the treaty which acknowledged our independence, and to what is claimed to be necessary to the safety and convenience of her provinces. Was it safe or prudent to submit our rights in such a case to any arbitration? and more especially is it safe again to submit them to such an arbitration as that held out to Maine as the only alternative, (if she will not consent to a conventional line,) to consist of arbitrators to be appointed by some of the sovereigns of Europe?

Mr. President, Great Britain is an old, powerful, and intriguing Government. Her influence and diplomacy pervade all European Governments; and what could Maine expect from arbitrators chosen by those Governments? We have not forgotten the result of one arbitration; and who can expect us to run the risk of another, to be constituted as proposed by the President? No, sir. Maine does not wish her rights submitted to the will or judgment of foreigners, or to arbitrators appointed by foreigners.

This was well understood here, before the President made his appeal to the Governor of Maine to convene the Legislature, and submit the subject to its grave and candid consideration; and it was also known here, as well as in Maine, that while the people of Maine, and all departments of her Government, had the most unshaken confidence in her perfect right by the treaty of 1783 to all the disputed territory; yet that there was a general willingness on her part to modify the line of the treaty, so that a new line might be established more convenient to both parties than that described in the treaty;—such, for instance, as giving to Great Britain all north and east of the St. John, and to Maine all west and south of that river; or to give to Great Britain the line recommended by the Dutch king, and to Maine the strip of land north of Eel river and west of the St. John, with the right of navigation, and other equivalents; or of yielding to Great Britain a permanent right of way over our territory, to convene her provinces, for a permanent right of navigation of that part of the St. John within her limits, to convene the citizens of Maine settled upon the St. John and its tributaries.

In this condition of things it was that the President announced to the Governor of Maine the arrival at the seat of Government of a minister plenipotentiary and special, with full powers from his sovereign to negotiate and settle all matters in discussion between the two Governments, and that that minister had announced that he was authorized to treat for a conventional line, or line by agreement, on such terms and conditions, and with such mutual considerations and equivalents, as may be thought just and reasonable.

The Legislature was assembled, and the President's views, as contained in the letter of the Secretary of State, were submitted to it; and the result was the following, among other preamble and resolutions, viz:

"Whereas the Government of the United States, not possessing the constitutional power to conclude any such negotiation without the assent of Maine, has invited the Government of this State to co-operate to a certain extent and in a certain form, in an endeavor to terminate a controversy of so long duration. Now, considering the premises, and believing that the people of the United States, after having already manifested a forbearance honorable to their character, under long-continued violations of their rights by a foreign nation; and though not disposed to yield to unfounded pretensions, are still willing, in regard to the proposal now made by the General Government, to give additional evidence to their fellow-citizens throughout the United States of their desire to preserve the peace of this Union, by taking measures to discuss and conclude, if possible, the subject in controversy in a manner that will secure the honor and interest of the State, this Legislature adopts the following resolutions—with the understanding, however, that, in the event of a failure of such endeavor toward an arrangement, no proceedings thereunder shall be so construed as to prejudice in any manner the rights of the State as they have been herein asserted to exist.

"Resolved, That there shall be chosen, by ballot, in convention of both branches of the Legislature four persons who are hereby appointed commissioners on the part of this State to repair to the seat of Government of the United States, and to confer with the authorities of that Government touching a conventional line, or line by agreement, between the State of Maine and the British provinces, having regard to the line designated by the treaty of 1783, as uniformly claimed by this State, and to the declarations and views expressed in the foregoing preamble; and to give the assent of this State to any such conventional line, with such terms, conditions, considerations, and equivalents, as they shall deem consistent with the honor and interests of the State: with the understanding that no such line be agreed upon without the unanimous assent of such commissioners.

"Resolved, That this State cannot regard the relinquishment by the British Government of any claim heretofore advanced by it to territory included within the limits of the line of this State as designated by the treaty of 1783, and uniformly claimed by Maine, as a consideration or equivalent within the meaning of these resolutions."

The commissioners, thus appointed and thus authorized, came here in the fond hope of aiding the General Government in settling the long-pending and irritating question of the Northeastern boundary, in a manner honorable to both nations, consistent with the rights of Maine, and promoting the convenience of the citizens and subjects of both countries. And how were these fond hopes blasted! The first official communication in reference to our boundary is that of Lord Ashburton, of 21st June, wherein he shadows forth the line of boundary and equivalents which he came all the way from England, as the special minister of her Majesty, to offer to us as "a line by agreement, on such terms and conditions, and with such mutual considerations and equivalents, as may be thought just and reasonable." And what is it? To understand what it is, we must take the answer of the commissioners of Maine, of 29th June, in connexion with his Lordship's letter; and it will be seen that this is the amount of it:—the river St. John, from the place where the due-north line from the monument at the source of the St. Croix strikes it, to some one of its sources, (meaning the source near the head waters of the Penobscot and Kennebec,) with a strip on the south side of the St. John, to include the Madawaska settlement, and to extend from the Aroostook to Fish river, shall be the boundary; and that all lumber and produce of the forest of the tributary waters of the St. John shall be received freely, without duty, and dealt with in every respect like the same articles in the province of New Brunswick, is the equivalent!! In other words, his Lordship proposes to take from Maine about five millions of acres of her territory, and to compensate her therefor by allowing the timber of the forest of the tributary waters of the St. John to be received freely and without duty at the city of St. John's—their market—and dealt with in every respect like their produce; thereby securing a trade quite as important and beneficial to their provinces as to Maine! Mr. President, I was glad to see that this proposition, so unjust in itself, and so insulting to the people of Maine, was promptly rejected by our commissioners; and my regret is, that they did not content themselves with simply announcing that fact. I feel confident that they would have been justified in so doing, not only by the Legislature and people of Maine, but by the nation. More especially so, when it is disclosed in that same communication of June 29th, "that they have been assured that Lord Ashburton is restrained by his instructions from yielding the island of Grand Menan, or any other of the islands in Passamaquoddy bay, or even any portion of the narrow strip of territory which lies between the due-north line from the source of the St. Croix and the St. John's river, above Eel river, (so called,) as an equivalent for any portion of the territory claimed by Maine as within her boundaries!" Restrained by his instructions! Why, sir, was not the Governor of Maine assured by the President that Lord Ashburton, a minister plenipotentiary and special, had arrived, charged with full powers from his sovereign to negotiate and settle all matters in controversy? And that he, (Lord Ashburton,) had officially announced to this Government, that, in regard to the boundary question, he had authority to treat for a conventional line, with such mutual considerations and equivalents as might be thought just and equitable? Further, sir; is it not true, as has been stated by many, that the Legislature of Maine were restrained from limiting the powers of their commissioners, by representations, from here that Lord Ashburton, having full powers, might object to treating at all with commissioners not possessing equally full powers?

If the commissioners on the part of Maine, upon learning the boundary and equivalents proposed by Lord Ashburton—and more especially upon finding that he was restrained by instructions—had contented themselves with rejecting the proposition of Lord Ashburton, (as they very properly did,) we would not have had such a treaty as that now under consideration to act upon. Lord Ashburton must have been relieved from the restraint imposed upon him by instructions, or have suffered the negotiation to terminate upon his proposition; which the nation would applaud the commissioners of Maine for rejecting. But it was not so. The commissioners were unwilling to forego any reasonable chance of adjusting a controversy so long pending, and so vexatious to the people of Maine; they knew that the General Government, the State Governments, the nation itself, were all desirous that the question should be settled; and, if not settled, through any fault or obstinacy on their part, that Maine would stand worse than ever upon this all-interesting question, at home and abroad; hence their counter-proposition to Lord Ashburton, more liberal, and yielding more for peace and good neighborhood than could have been anticipated by the people or by the Legislature of Maine: that was rejected; and there the subject would have rested, but for the renewed efforts by the General Government itself, whereby the line and equivalents mentioned in the treaty now under consideration, were presented to the commissioners with the following remarks:

"The line suggested, with the compensations and equivalents which have been stated, is now submitted for your consideration. That it is all which might have been hoped for, looking to the strength of the American claim, can hardly be said. But, as the settlement of a controversy of such duration is a matter of high importance; as equivalents of undoubted value are offered; as longer postponement and delay would lead to further inconvenience, and to the incurring of farther expenses; and as no better occasion—or, perhaps, any other occasion—for settling the boundary by agreement, or on the principle of equivalents, is ever likely to present itself, the Government of the United States hopes that the commissioners of the two States will find it to be consistent with their duty to assent to the line proposed, and to the terms and conditions attending the proposition.

"The President has felt the deepest anxiety for the amicable settlement of the question, in a manner honorable to the country, and such as should preserve the rights and interests of the States concerned. From the moment of the announcement of Lord Ashburton's mission, he has sedulously endeavored to pursue a course the most respectful towards the States, and the most useful to their interests, as well as most becoming to the dignity and character of the Government. He will be happy if the result shall be such as shall satisfy Maine and Massachusetts, as well as the rest of the country. With these sentiments on the part of the President, and with the conviction that no more advantageous arrangement can be made, the subject is now referred to the grave deliberation of the commissioners."

Ah! no better occasion, and perhaps any other occasion for settling the boundary by agreement is ever likely to present itself, and with the conviction that no more advantageous arrangement can be made, the subject is referred to the grave deliberation of the commissioners. By whom? By the President, and that Government which is bound by the Constitution to protect Maine in all her rights, and without whose protection it is vain for any State to contend with a foreign Government, however just and well founded be her claim. Thus abandoned and thus admonished by the only power to which Maine could look for the maintenance and establishment of her just rights, it is said that she has assented to the line; and hence, that we are called upon merely to ratify and confirm what has been agreed upon by the parties immediately interested in the controversy. Not exactly so. Massachusetts, owning a moiety of the acres surrendered, is satisfied with the price to be paid for those acres; but the commissioners of Maine, now abandoned by her co-proprietor of the soil, and by the General Government, which is bound to protect her rights, are left to the grave consideration of the terms proposed by our own Government, under the assurance that no better, and, perhaps, no other occasion for settling the boundary by agreement is ever likely to present itself; and with the conviction that no more advantageous arrangement can be made. In this condition of things, I pray you to hear these commissioners.

The Maine Commissioners to Mr. Webster.

WASHINGTON, July 22, 1842.

SIR: The undersigned, commissioners of the State of Maine on the subject of the Northeastern boundary, have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note, addressed to them, under date of the 15th instant, with enclosures therein referred to. The proposition first submitted by the special minister of Great Britain, on the subject of the boundary, having been disagreed to; and the proposition made on the part of the United States, with the assent of the commissioners of Maine and Massachusetts, having been rejected as inadmissible, coupled with an expression of surprise that it should have been made; and Lord Ashburton, in the same communication, having intimated a preference for conference rather than correspondance, and having omitted in his note to make any new proposition, except a qualified withdrawal of a part of his former one,—we learn from your note that you "have had full and frequent conferences with him respecting the Northeastern boundary," and that you "believe you understand what is practicable to be done on that subject, so far as he (Lord Ashburton) is concerned." We also learn that, "in these conferences, he has made no positive or binding proposition—thinking, perhaps, it would be more desirable, under present circumstances, that such a proposition should proceed from the side of the United States;" but that you have reason to believe that he would agree to a line of boundary such as is described in the paper accompanying your note, (marked B;) and, also, that you entertain the conviction "that no more advantageous arrangement can be made;" and, with this conviction, you refer the subject to the grave deliberation of the commissioners.

Regarding this as substantially a proposition on the part of the United States, with the knowledge and assent of Great Britain, and as the one most favorable to us which, under any circumstances, the latter Government would either offer or accept, the undersigned have not failed to bestow upon it the grave deliberation and consideration which its nature and importance, and their own responsible position, demand. If the result of that deliberation should not fully justify the expressed hopes, or meet the expectations and views of the Government of the United States, we beg you to be assured that such failure will be the result of their firm convictions of duty to the State they represent, and will not arise from any want of an anxious desire, on their part, to bring the controversy to an amicable, just, and honorable termination. In coming to this consideration, they have not been unmindful that the State of Maine, with the firmest conviction of her absolute right to the whole territory drawn into controversy; and sustained, as she has been, by the unanimous concurrence of her sister States, and of the Government of the Union, repeatedly expressed and cordially given, and without a wavering doubt as to the perfect practicability of marking the treaty line upon the face of the earth, according to her claim,—has yet, at all times, manifested a spirit of forbearance and patience under what she could not but deem unfounded pretensions, and unwarrantable delays, and irritating encroachments. In the midst of all the provocations to resistance, and to the assertion and maintenance of her extreme rights, she has never forgotten that she is a member of the Union; and she has endeavored to deserve the respect, sympathy, and co operation of her sister States, by pursuing a course equally removed from pusillanimity and rashness, and by maintaining her difficult position in a spirit that would forbear much for peace, but would yield nothing through fear. At all times, and under all circumstances, she has been ready and anxious to bring the controversy to a close upon terms honorable and equitable, and to unite in any proper scheme to effect that object. In this spirit, and with these convictions, Maine instantly and cheerfully acceded to the proposal of the General Government, made through you, to appoint commissioners

That no obstacle might be interposed to the successful issue of this negotiation, her Legislature gave to her commissioners ample and unlimited powers, which, but for the presumed necessity of the case, her people would be slow to yield to any functionaries. Her commissioners, thus appointed and thus empowered, assumed the duties imposed upon them in the spirit and with the views of the Government and people of Maine. They came to the negotiation with a firm conviction of her rights, but with a disposition and determination to meet a conventional line in a similar spirit, and to yield, for any reasonable equivalent, all that they presumed would be asked or desired by the other party. They, with the other citizens of Maine, were not unapprized of the fact so often alluded to in our former communications—that England had long been anxious to obtain the undisputed possession of that portion of the territory which would enable her to maintain a direct and uninterrupted communication between her provinces. So far as they could learn from any source, this was the only professed object she had in view, and the only one which had been regarded as in contemplation.

With this understanding, the undersigned at once decided to yield, upon the most liberal terms, this long sought convenience; and they indulged the confident expectation that such a concession would at once meet all the wants and wishes of the English Government, and bring the mission to a speedy and satisfactory close. When, therefore, we were met at the outset by a proposition which required the cession on our part of all the territory north of the St. John river, and enough of the territory on the south side to include the Madawaska settlement, extending at least fifty miles up that river, with no other equivalents to us than the limited right to float timber down that river, and to the United States the small tracts adjacent to the 45th parallel of latitude in other States, we could not but express our regret to be thus, as it were, repelled. But, regarding this rather as the extreme limit of a claim, subject, notwithstanding the strong language of Lord Ashburton, to be restrained and limited, we deemed it proper, in our communication of the 16th instant, after declining to accede to the proposition, in conjunction with the commissioners of Massachusetts, to point out and offer a conventional line of boundary as therein specified. In fixing on this line, we were mainly anxious to select such a one as should at once and pre-eminently give to Great Britain all that was necessary for her understood object, and to preserve to Maine the remainder of her territory. To accomplish this object, we departed from the river, to secure the unobstructed use of the accustomed way from Quebec to Halifax. We are not aware that any objection has been made from any quarter to this line, as not giving up to Great Britain all that she needed, or could reasonably ask, for the above purpose. And although Lord Ashburton did not deem it necessary to "examine the line (proposed) in its precise details," or to look at a map on which it could most readily be traced; and although he has seen fit to say that he was "quite at a loss to account for such a proposal," yet he has not intimated that the line suggested fails, in any respect, to meet the object we had in view, and which we frankly and readily avowed.

It is well known to you, sir, that we had determined upon no such inflexible adherence to that exact demarcation as would have prevented us from changing it, upon any reasonable evidence that it did not, in every respect, meet the requirements of the abovestated proposition in relation to a perfect line of communication. But believing then, as we do now, that it did thus meet all these requirements; and although it was, as we feel bound to say, the general and confident expectation of the people of Maine, that any relinquishment on our part of jurisdiction and territory would be, in part at least, compensated from that strip of contiguous territory on the west bank of the St. John; yet, when we were solemnly assured that no such cession could be made under his Lordship's instructions, we forebore to press for this reasonable and just exchange, and contented ourselves with accepting the limited right of navigation of the river, as the only equivalent from Great Britain for the territory and jurisdiction we offered to surrender; and, as you will remark, we offered not merely a right of way on land, for a similar easement on the water, but the entire and absolute title to the land and jurisdiction of the large tract north and east of the line specified. It cannot be denied that it preserves to us a frontier in a forest almost impenetrable on the north, which would defend itself by its own natural character; and that, if anything should be deducted from the agricultural value of that portion beyond the Madawaska settlements, on account of its ruggedness and its want of attraction to settlers, much may justly be added to its value as a boundary between the two nations.

The value of this tract to Great Britain, both in a civil and military point of view, cannot be overlooked. It gives her the much-coveted route for the movement of troops in war, and her mails and passengers in peace; and is most particularly important in case of renewed outbreaks in her North American colonies. The assumption of jurisdiction in the Madawaska settlement, and the pertinacity with which it has been maintained, are practical evidence of the value attached to the tract by the Government of her Britannic Majesty.

We have alluded to these views of the value and importance of this territory, not with any design of expressing our regret that we have thus offered it; but to show that we are fully aware of all these views and circumstances affecting the question, and that we duly appreciate the far-seeing sagacity and prudence of those British statesmen who so early attempted to secure it as a cession, by negotiation, and the suggestion of equivalents.

The answer of Lord Ashburton to your note of the 8th instant, contained a distinct rejection of our offer, with a substantial withdrawal of his claim to any territory south of the river St. John; but not modifying the claim for the relinquishment, on the part of Maine and the United States, of all north of that river. Our views in reference to many of the topics in his Lordship's reply, we have had the honor heretofore to communicate to you, in our note of the 16th instant; and to that answer we would now refer, as forming an important part of this negotiation, and as containing our refusal of the line indicated. We are now called upon to consider the final proposition made by or through the Government of the United States, for our consideration and acceptance. The line indicated may be shortly defined as the line recommended by the King of the Netherlands, and an addition thereto of a strip of land at the base of the highlands, running to the source of the southwest branch of the St. John. The examination and consideration of all other lines, which might better meet our views and objects, have been precluded by the declaration, and other plenary evidence we have, that the line specified in your communication is the most advantageous that can be offered to us; and that no one of less extent, or yielding in fact less to the other party, can be deemed admissible. We are, therefore, brought to the single and simple consideration of the question, whether we can, consistently with our views of our duty to the State we represent, accept the proposition submitted by you.

So far as any claim is interposed, based upon a supposed equity arising from the recommendation of the King of the Netherlands, we have only to refer to our former note for our views on that topic. We have now only to add, that we came to this conference untrammelled and free; to see if, in a spirit of amity and equity, we could not find and agree upon some new line, which, while it yielded all that was needed by one party, might fairly be the motive and groundwork for equivalent territory or rights granted to the other; and that we cannot make any admission, or consent to any proposition, which would not revive, but put vitality and power into that which, up to this time, has never possessed either. We base our whole action on grounds entirely independent of that advice of the arbiter.

It may possibly be intimated in this connexion, as it has more than once been heretofore, that the commissioners of Maine, and the people of that State, are disposed to regard the whole territory as clearly falling within their rightful limits; and are not willing to consider the question as one in doubt and dispute, and, therefore, one to be settled as if each party had nearly or quite equal claims. Certainly, sir, the people and Government of Maine do not deny that the question has been drawn into dispute. They have had too many and too recent painful evidences of that fact, to allow such a doubt, however much at a loss they may be to perceive any just or tenable grounds on which the adversary claim is based. For years they have borne and forborne, and struggled to maintain their rights, in a peaceable, and yet unflinching spirit, against what appeared to them injustice from abroad, and neglect at home.

But they have yet to learn that the mere fact that an adverse claim is made and persisted in, and maintained by ingenuity and ability for a series of years, increasing in extent, and varying its grounds as years roll on, is to be regarded as a reason why courtesy should require, in opposition to the fact, a relinquishment of the plain, explicit, and sincere language of perfect conviction and unwavering confidence; or that a continued, adverse, and resisted claim, may yet, by mere lapse of time and reiteration, ripen into a right. But we desire it to be distinctly remembered that, in this attempt to negotiate for a conventional line, Maine has not insisted, or even requested, that any formal or virtual admission of her title to the whole territory should be a condition preliminary to a settlement. We hold, and we claim, the right to express, at all times, and in all suitable places, our opinion of the perfect right of Maine to the whole territory; but we have never assumed it as a point of honor, that our adversary should acknowledge it. Indeed, we have endeavored to view the subject rather in reference to a settlement, on even hard terms for us, than to dwell on the strong aspect of the case, when we look at the naked question of our right and title under the treaty. It could hardly be expected, however, that we should silently, and thus virtually, acquiesce in any assumption that our claim was unsustained, and that "the treaty line was not executable." On this point we expressed ourselves fully in a former note.

In returning to the direct consideration of the last proposition, and the terms and conditions attending it, in justice to ourselves and our State, we feel bound to declare—and we confidently appeal to you, sir, in confirmation of the declaration—that this negotiation has been conducted, on our part, with no mercenary views, and with no design to extort unreasonable equivalents or extravagant compensation. The State of Maine has always felt an insuperable repugnance to parting with any portion even of her disputed territory, for mere pecuniary recompense from adverse claimants. She comes here for no mere bargain for the sale of acres, in the spirit or with the arts of traffic. Her commissioners have been much less anxious to secure benefit and recompense, than to preserve the State from unnecessary curtailment and dismemberment. The proposition we made is evidence of the fact. We have heretofore expressed some opinions of the mutual character of the benefits to each party from the free navigation of the St. John. Without entering, however, upon the particular consideration of the terms and conditions, which we have not thought it necessary to do, we distinctly state that our great repugnance to the line is based upon the extent of territory required to be yielded. We may, however, in passing, remark that all the pecuniary offers contained in your note, most liberally construed, would scarcely recompense and repay to Maine the amount of money and interest which she has actually expended in defending and protecting the territory from wrongs arising and threatened by reason of its condition and disputed ground.

Considering, then, this proposition as involving the surrender of more territory than the avowed objects of England require; as removing our landmarks from the well-known and well-defined boundary of the treaty of 1783—the crest of the highlands; beside insisting upon the line of the arbiter in its full extent; we feel bound to say, after the most careful and anxious consideration, that we cannot bring our minds to the conviction that the proposal is such as Maine had a right to expect.

But we are not unaware of the expectations which have been, and still are, entertained of a favorable issue to this negotiation by the Government and people of this country, and the great disappointment which would be felt and expressed at its failure. Nor are we unmindful of the future, warned as we have been by the past, that any attempts to determine the line by arbitration, may be either fruitless, or with a result more to be deplored.

We are now given to understand that the Executive of the United States, representing the sovereignty of the Union, assents to the proposal; and that this department of the Government, at least, is anxious for its acceptance, as, in its view, most expedient for the general good.

The commissioners of Massachusetts have already given their assent, on behalf of that Commonwealth. Thus situated, the commissioners of Maine, invoking the spirit of attachment and patriotic devotion of their State to the Union; and being willing to yield to the deliberate convictions of her sister States as to the path of duty; and to interpose no obstacles to an adjustment which the general judgment of the nation shall pronounce as honorable and expedient—even if that judgment shall lead to a surrender of a portion of the birthright of the people of their State, and prized by them because it is their birthright,—have determined to overcome their objections to the proposal, so far as to say, that if, upon mature consideration, the Senate of the United States shall advise and consent to the ratification of a treaty corresponding in its terms with your proposal, and with the conditions in our memorandum accompanying this note, (marked A,) and identified by our signatures, they, by virtue of the power vested in them by the resolves of the Legislature of Maine, give the assent of that State to such conventional line, with the terms, conditions, and equivalents herein mentioned.

We have the honor to be, sir, with high respect, your obedient servants,

EDWARD KAVANAGH, EDWARD KENT,
JOHN OTIS,
WILLIAM P. PREBLE.

Hon DANIEL WEBSTER, &c., &c., &c.

This is the assent (if assent it may be called) which is to authorize and induce the Senate to ratify the treaty. What is it? A clear, strong, and convincing argument against submitting to the terms proposed; and concluding that, if the deliberate conviction of her sister States shall pronounce the proposed boundary and equivalents as honorable and expedient, even if that judgment shall lead to a surrender of a portion of the birthright of the people of Maine, the commissioners have determined to overcome their objections to the proposal, so far as to say that if, upon mature consideration, the Senate of the United States shall advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty upon those terms and conditions, they give he assent of Maine thereto. Now, sir, I am not we lp.eased with this mode of doing business. I would have preferred that our commissioners had agreed or disagreed to the line and terms proposed. The Legislature intrusted them with that power; and we have no reason to suppose that the Legislature would have authorized them to refer to the Senate of the United States the power to make a new line of boundary and to fix the equivalents. We know the Legislature did not so authorize them; but, on the contrary, required the unanimous consent of all the commissioners to any line which should be agreed upon; and expressly declared that it could not regard the relinquishment by the British Government of any claim heretofore advanced by it to any territory within the limits of Maine according to the treaty of 1783 as uniformly claimed by Maine, as a consideration or equivalent.

How, then, stands the question of assent on the part of Maine? If the Senate, upon mature consideration, shall advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty upon the terms and conditions therein contained;—in other words, if the Senate shall pronounce it honorable and expedient that Maine shall surrender a portion of her birthright upon the terms and conditions named—then, and then only, you have the assent of Maine to the sacrifice, for the public good. For one, I cannot do it. My own convictions of the perfect right of Maine to all the disputed territory, forbid it. I would go far, very far, to compromise this dispute upon honorable terms; and I would not be particular as to the value of equivalents. But I hold that Great Britain has contiguous territory, convenient to us, which she might and ought to give in exchange for the territory belonging to us, which she so much needs, and ought to have, for a just equivalent. This treaty does not accomplish, fairly, either object—it gives to Great Britain more than is necessary, and withholds from Maine what she ought to acquire.

But, Mr. President, I am not insensible that this question of our Northeastern boundary has been suffered, most unnecessarily, to be brought into dispute and controversy. By the treaty of 1783, and the subsequent determination of what river was intended as the St. Croix, our line of boundary was plain, practicable, and perfect; it was identical with the established lines of the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia—fixed and determined by the proclamation of 1763, and by act of Parliament in 1774. On a former occasion I had the honor to submit to the Senate my views upon this question; others did the same; and I will now only refer to the able exposition and vindication of the right of Maine to the whole of the territory claimed by her, contained in the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and to one of the resolutions adopted unanimously by the Senate on that occasion, in the following words:

"Resolved, That, after careful examination and deliberate consideration of the whole controversy between the United States and Great Britain, relating to the Northeastern boundary of the former, the Senate does not entertain a doubt of the entire practicability of running and marking that boundary in strict conformity with the stipulations of the definitive treaty of peace of 1783; and it entertains a perfect conviction of the justice and validity of the title of the United States to the full extent of all the territory in dispute between the two powers."

My regret is, that Congress did not then authorize and direct the running and marking that line according to the terms of the treaty of 1783, as proposed by the bill which I then presented. If that had then been done, we would have escaped the expense and hazard of the Aroostook war, the disgrace of having a portion of our territory seized and occupied by the military power of Great Britain, and the unwelcome task of deciding upon the present treaty—which sanctions the unjust pretensions of the British Government to a portion of the fruits of our glorious struggle for independence.

I will not tax the patience of the Senate with a recapitulation of the merits of our claim to the whole of the disputed territory. Suffice it to say, that the treaty which asserts our independence as a nation, gives it to us; and that the nation recognises it. Still, it has been suffered to be brought into controversy, and is now disputed by a great and powerful nation. Unfortunately for us, at the treaty of Ghent, in 1814, a request on the part of the British negotiators to modify or vary the line described in the treaty of 1783, so as to give to Great Britain a convenient and direct communication between the provinces of Canada and New Brunswick, was suffered to ripen into an article of that treaty, which provided for the running and marking that line; and, in case the commissioners to be appointed to that service should disagree, they were to report the grounds of such disagreement to their respective Governments; and thereupon the question should be submitted to an arbiter, to determine upon the points of disagreement. A very simple and innocent article in appearance, but a most fatal one in its consequences! From this sprang the submission to the King of the Netherlands, his award, and its rejection—subsequent attempts at negotiation—and the treaty now under consideration; and, if this treaty be rejected, another reference to arbitrators, to be selected by foreign powers, is to follow.

Thus a title, clear and perfect by the treaty of 1783, has been suffered, by diplomacy and treaties, to be brought into doubt and controversy, and has been agreed to be made the subject of arbitration! This is the embarrassment which has stood, and yet remains, in the way of all our efforts to obtain possession of our entire territory; to expel a foreign power from its military possession of part of it; to assert and maintain the rights and honor of the nation; and is now held up to us as the only alternative, if we reject this treaty. What is to be done, under such circumstances, I admit, is a question of difficulty. If there be no way of escaping the obligation of again submitting the question to a foreign arbiter, the result of the former submission should admonish us to avoid the repetition of that mode of obtaining our just rights; and the present arrangement may be better than to hazard the loss, by another reference, of the whole disputed territory. In common with my constituents, I deprecate another reference to foreigners, or arbitrators appointed by foreign powers, and protest against it. We have already fulfilled the stipulation of the treaty of Ghent, by referring the question to an arbiter. It failed to settle the controversy. The British Government have insisted that another reference would be unavailing. I am willing to take them at their word; and would submit to the Senate whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the honor and duty of the nation will not be better maintained by falling back upon our original clear and certain right under the treaty of 1783, than by ratifying the present treaty, or sanctioning another reference, as indicated by the President's declaration to the Governor of Maine.

I cannot agree to the ratification of the present treaty. It is unjust to Maine, and, in my judgment, dishonorable to the nation. I do not desire another arbitration, which may be more ruinous to Maine than the present arrangement. I have no confidence in further negotiation. What we have had, has greatly weakened our once perfect title; and I see no other way of getting our right as a nation, and performing our high obligation to one of the States of the Union, than by taking possession of what belongs to us, and holding it. In such a course, we will have right and justice on our side. If others interfere with us, it must be in their own wrong. With these views, I send to the Chair the following resolution, and ask the yeas and nays upon its adoption:

Resolved, That the treaty and documents now under consideration, be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with instructions to report a resolution directing the President of the United States to take immediate possession of the disputed territory, and to report such contingent measures as, in their opinion, may be necessary to maintain the just right of the nation.

BRITISH TREATY.

[SECRET SESSION.]

SPEECH OF MR. CONRAD,

OF LOUISIANA.

In Senate, August 18, 1842.—On the ratification of the treaty with Great Britain.

Mr. CONRAD rose and said—

It was not my intention, Mr. President, to take any part in the debate on this treaty; but as I have come to the determination to vote against it, I feel bound to assign my reasons for that vote.

The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. CHOATE,] have vied with each other in eulogising this treaty as a chef d'œuvre of diplomatic skill. I cannot perceive, however, in what respect it is so advantageous to the country.

It contains three principal stipulations: 1st. The first and most important is, that which fixes our Northeastern boundary. 2d. It obliges us to maintain a naval armament on the coast of Africa, to aid in the suppression of the slave-trade; and, lastly, it provides for the mutual surrender, in certain cases, of fugitives from justice.

In regard to the first of these provisions, I believe it is admitted, on all hands, that the line agreed upon falls far short of our pretensions, and is rather a compromise of the question than a settlement of it, according to our interpretation of the treaty of 1783. There probably never was a period, since the commencement of the controversy, when a compromise could not have been effected on as favorable terms.

The second stipulation, although in form a reciprocal engagement, is, in point of fact, a concession on our part. Great Britain already maintains, and would, in the absence of any such stipulation, continue to maintain on the coast of Africa, a much larger naval force than she binds herself to do by this treaty. Permit me to observe, too, Mr. President, that, however willing I may be, by every proper means, to prevent the prostitution of our flag to this odious traffic, I would much have preferred that whatever we did on this subject should be our own spontaneous act, instead of appearing to have been extorted from us by Great Britain—by that country which, after having long usurped the police of the seas, has recently wheedled, or intimidated one-half of Europe into an acknowledgment of this preposterous claim. I should have preferred to see our country maintain the proud attitude which France, encouraged by the firmness of our minister, has taken on this subject, and conceded nothing where nothing could rightfully be demanded.

The third provision is, that which provides for the surrender of criminals in certain cases; in regard to which I shall only observe, that it is a provision at least as advantageous to Great Britain as to us, and cannot, therefore, be viewed as a stipulation in our favor.

This is the substance of the treaty. I cannot perceive in it those advantages that some gentlemen have professed to do. My objections to it, however, are not so much on account of what it does, as of what it does not contain.

Mr. President, there were three subjects of difference between this country and Great Britain, the prompt adjustment of which was deemed peculiarly urgent, as they all threatened hourly to disturb the harmony of the two countries. These were—the settlement of our Northeastern boundary; the controversy growing out of the destruction of the Caroline; and, lastly, that arising out of the seizure and liberation of slaves belonging to citizens of the United States. When it was known that a special minister was to be deputed to this country, for the purpose of restoring and maintaining the harmony of the two countries, no one doubted that his mission embraced the settlement of all these questions, if none others. I confess, therefore, that when the treaty was read at your table, and I discovered that one, and not the least important of these questions, (I mean that relative to the seizure of our slaves,) was left precisely where it stood before the arrival of the British ambassador, I was equally surprised and disappointed. No less than five cases have already occurred, in which vessels bound from one port in the Union to another, by having slaves on board, have been driven, either by stress of weather, or, by the violence of the slaves themselves, into some one of the small islands in the Bahama channel; and, in every instance, the slaves have been violently taken from the possession of their owners, and set at liberty by the colonial authorities. In the two first cases, the British Government, after a protracted negotiation, indemnified the owners. The third case was that of the schooner "Enterprise," which occurred some six or seven years ago. Application was again made for indemnity; and what was the answer of the British Government? In substance, that this confiscation of American property was justified by a recent act of Parliament abolishing slavery in their West India possessions, and that thenceforward no indemnity was due our citizens for slaves thrown by unavoidable accidents upon their shores.

As soon as this decision of the British Government was made known to ours, the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] introduced the following resolutions; which, on the 15th April, 1840, were unanimously adopted by this body:

"Resolved, That a ship or vessel on the high seas, in time of peace, engaged in a lawful voyage, is, according to the laws of nations, under the exclusive jurisdiction of the State to which her flag belongs; as much so, as if constituting a part of its own domain.

"Resolved, That if such ship or vessel should be forced by stress of weather, or other unavoidable cause, into the ports and under the jurisdiction of a friendly power, she and her cargo, and persons on board, with their property, and all the rights belonging to their personal relations, as established by the laws of the State to which they belong, would be placed under the protection which the laws of nations extend to the unfortunate under such circumstances.

"Resolved, That the brig Enterprise, which was forced unavoidably, by stress of weather, into Port Hamilton, Bermuda Island, while on a lawful voyage on the high seas, from one port of the Union to another, comes within the principles embraced in the foregoing resolutions; and that the seizure and detention of the negroes on board, by the local authority of the island, was an act in violation of the laws of nations, and highly unjust to our citizens to whom they belong."

I well recollect the satisfaction with which the adoption of these resolutions was hailed by the Southern portion of this Union. The promptitude and unanimity with which they were adopted, proved that the "still small voice" of patriotism could yet make itself heard amid the din of party strife with which these halls perpetually resound. We flattered ourselves that Great Britain would now pause in her course of insolence and aggression; and that the petty functionaries of an insignificant island, almost in sight of our coast, would no longer beard the majesty of this republic.

More than two years ago, therefore, this body solemnly resolved, in substance, that the seizure and detention of slaves, under the circumstances of those on board the Enterprise, was an act of injustice to our citizens, a violation of the law of nations, and equivalent to an invasion of our territory. This resolution was adopted, after a protracted negotiation for redress had eventuated in a rejection of the demand. Two nations could not be brought nearer to a state of hostility by any act short of a positive declaration of war, than Great Britain and this country were by the adoption of these resolutions. In fact, this left but one alternative—redress or war. Foreign nations had, therefore, a right to conclude (and I well recollect they did conclude) that the wrongs complained of would be redressed, or war would ensue. But what effect did these resolutions produce in the country against which they were fulminated? Scarcely had their thunder died away on the distant shores of Great Britain, when, as if in defiance of our threats, another outrage, precisely similar in character to the one complained of, is committed. The schooner Hermosa, bound on a voyage from Norfolk to New Orleans, with a number of slaves on board, is wrecked on one of the reefs in the Bahama channel. All the persons on board, including the slaves, are taken from the wreck by an English "wrecker," and carried to Nassau. As soon as they arrive there, a file of soldiers, wearing the British uniform, commanded by a British officer, march on board the wrecker, order the slaves ashore, and carry them before some petty magistrate; by whose supreme authority, and in spite of the remonstrances of the American consul, they are set at liberty. These facts being established by incontestable evidence, application for indemnity was made to the British Government. Before any answer had been given to this application, the case of the "Creole" occurred.

So far as the claim to indemnity is concerned, the circumstances of this case were not as strong as those in the cases of the "Enterprise" and the "Hermosa;" for, in this case, the liberation of the slaves was not the act of the British Government, nor did it even occur within their jurisdiction. It occurred on the high seas, and was effected by the slaves themselves. The atrocities, however, with which it was attended, and the aid and protection afforded to the authors of them, justly excited public indignation, and momentarily roused our Government from its lethargy. An urgent demand for redress was made, enforced by a letter from the Secretary of State, containing an able exposition of the law of nations applicable to the question, and a complete refutation of the arguments by which the British ministry had, in the case of the "Enterprise," already referred to, attempted to justify the seizure of American property by a British statute. I appeal to you, Mr. President, whether, at that juncture, any one of the questions pending between this country and Great Britain was deemed more important, or more urgent in its character, than that growing out of these repeated outrages? So far as my own State is concerned, I can venture to say it stood foremost in the catalogue of grievances of which we had a right to complain. The Legislatures of many of the States (and that of Louisiana among the rest) passed strong resolutions expressive of their sense of these outrages, and of their readiness to vindicate, by a resort to arms, the insulted honor of the country. The swelling tide of public indignation was only arrested by the announcement of the fact that Great Britain had deputed a special envoy to this country, charged with the settlement of this and all other differences between the two countries; and now we are called upon to ratify a treaty in which this subject is entirely pretermitted! Why is this, sir? I do not think I exaggerate the magnitude of this question, when I affirm that, in whatever light we view it—whether we consider the mere pecuniary considerations connected with it, the interest felt by a large portion of the country in its decision, its exciting and irritating character, and, above all, the principles involved in it—it is by far more important than any of those embraced in the treaty.

The Northeastern boundary question—about which so much is said—is, after all, a mere question of property, involving no principle, establishing no precedent; and is just such a controversy as two individuals would settle by a law-suit—not by an appeal to arms. The Caroline affair was of a different character; but it is past, and cannot be recalled: there is no danger of its repetition; and the question was narrowed down to one of etiquette, or point of honor. Far different is the question arising out of the seizure of our slaves. National honor, national interests, national safety even, were all included in it. The wrongs complained of were not the unpremeditated act of an excited soldiery, but were the deliberate proceedings of the civil authorities—sanctioned, authorized, encouraged, if not commanded, by the British Government. It was not a single act, but a series of acts, following each other in rapid succession, in the very face of our remonstrances—I may almost say, in defiance of our threats. If the property seized had been of any other character; if, instead of slaves, an equal number of bales of merchandise, or hogsheads of tobacco, had been seized and appropriated by the British Government,—all would at once perceive the enormity of the pretensions. But, because it is a description of property not known to English law, although known to ours, we suffer our demand for redress to be put off by cavils that would disgrace a nisi prius attorney. For my own part, Mr. President, I would prefer that ten times the amount in property of any other description had been seized and confiscated, without a color of pretext, by the British Government. I consider the mere pecuniary interest involved in the question as trifling, in comparison with the principles involved. These principles are no less than the inviolability of our flag, and the right to regulate our domestic institutions as we see fit. I have never entertained a doubt that more was concealed under these acts than appeared on their surface. England, after having endeavored in vain to assail us by open force, is resorting to the more dangerous method of an insidious policy. Abolition of slavery, which is treason and madness with us, is wisdom and profound policy with her. It is the sole engine by which she can hope to prostrate her only commercial rival. Hence her peculiar sensibility to the wrongs of the African race, while she is reducing all Asia under the yoke of the most galling servitude. Hence her disinterested philanthropy, in abolishing slavery in the West, while she is only transplanting it in the East. Hence her exertions to extend the culture of cotton and sugar in her East India possessions. Hence the declamations of her orators against negro slavery; the exaggerated accounts by her writers of the sufferings of our slaves, while they are deaf to the cries of the starving millions of their countrymen at home. A community of language and religion—her literature universally diffused throughout this country—a social and commercial intercourse continually increasing—a respect and reverence for English opinions more frequently felt than acknowledged,—afford her too many facilities for the accomplishment of this Machiavelian policy. Do we not see anti-slavery societies, composed of our own citizens, affiliated with similar associations, encouraged, if not established, by the British Government? Do we not see their hireling orators, their prostituted preachers, their pensioned presses, using every artifice to agitate the country, and array one portion of it against the other? England is already considered as the mainspring of the "great anti-slavery movement," as it is termed, which is now making throughout Europe and America; and these repeated aggressions on slave property are only one among many indications of her desire to be so considered. There is no doubt that the slaves on board the Creole were prompted to the crimes which they committed by the knowledge they had acquired before their embarcation, that if they could succeed in reaching any of the British possessions, their crimes would not only go unpunished, but be rewarded by their freedom.

Am I not correct, then, Mr. President, when I affirm that principles vital to the institutions and safety of this country are involved in this question? and that it ought not to have been overlooked in a treaty, the very object of which is to remove the causes of discord between the two countries? And what is the reason assigned for this extraordinary omission? Why, that Lord Ashburton's powers did not embrace the settlement of this question. But why did they not embrace it? Has it not been pending for years? It is true, as Lord Ashburton says, that the case of the Creole was only known in England a few days before his departure for this country; but that of the Enterprise occurred many years ago; and the resolutions of this body, declaring it a violation of the law of nations, and equivalent to an invasion of our territory, were adopted more than two years prior to his departure. Besides, nothing would have been easier than to have enlarged his powers, had they been found insufficient. No, sir; the true reason for this casus omissus in the treaty is to be found in Lord Ashburton's letter. He there says: "There are certain great principles too deeply rooted in the consciences and sympathies of the people of Great Britain for any minister to be able to overlook; and any engagement I might make in opposition to them would be instantly disavowed." In other words, the sympathies of British abolitionists must not be shocked by having any restraint put upon their humane efforts to excite our slaves to insurrection and bloodshed! Gentlemen refer us to this letter, as containing all that was necessary on this subject. It is true, Mr. President, that, as nothing was intended to be done, it was thought necessary, at least, to say something. But if it was intended to enter into any binding engagements on this subject, why was it done in the form of a letter? Why was it not inserted in the treaty? I have looked in vain, however, in this letter, for anything which could be construed either into an apology for the past, or a pledge for the future. So far from admitting the truth of the unanswerable propositions contained in Mr. Webster's letter to him, Lord A. pronounces them to be startling; and so far from making any specific pledges, he expressly declares that, if he were to make any, they would be "instantly disavowed by his Government." It is true, he talks of transferring the negotiation on this point to London; but, at the very time when this correspondence was penned, Lord Ashburton and Mr. Webster both were well aware that a negotiation had already taken place at London, and that the British Government had adhered to their former decision.

I have already stated that application was made by our Government for indemnity for slaves captured on board the schooner Hermosa. I hold in my hand copies of the correspondence which took place on this subject between Mr. Everett, our minister at London, and Lord Aberdeen, the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Great Britain. As this correspondence has never been published, nor, I believe, ever seen by a single member of this body, I beg leave to read it to the Senate.

Mr. C. here read a letter from Mr. Everett to Lord Aberdeen, dated 3d May, 1842, and the following answer of Lord Aberdeen, dated May 22, 1842:

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES, May 3, 1842.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has been directed to bring to the knowledge of Lord Aberdeen, her Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, the particulars of the case of the Hermosa, a vessel bound from Richmond to New Orleans, with an assorted cargo, and having on board, also, thirty-eight slaves. This vessel was, on the 19th of October, 1840, wrecked upon a reef of rocks, which proved to be Spanish Key, near Abaco. Her cargo and slaves were taken possession of by a company of licensed wreckers; and being brought into Nassau, in the Island of New Providence, the slaves were set at liberty by the civil and military authorities of that island. For the facts of the case in detail, reference is made to a copy of two protests of John S. Chattin, the master of the vessel, herewith transmitted to the Earl of Aberdeen; and the undersigned is instructed to inform Lord Aberdeen, that, inasmuch as the vessel, in the pursuit of a lawful voyage, was driven, by stress of weather, within her Majesty's colonial dominions, and the slaves on board her, belonging to citizens of the United States, were set at liberty by the direct interference of her Majesty's colonial authorities, the Government of the United States, on behalf of the parties thus deprived of their property, looks to the Government of her Majesty for a just indemnification.

The principles on which this claim is founded having been heretofore frequently urged upon the consideration of her Majesty's Government, and particularly in the note of the undersigned of the 1st March, relative to the case of the Creole, he deems it unnecessary, on this occasion, to renew the discussion. He will confine himself to restating, briefly, a portion of the argument contained in that note.

Her Majesty's Government is understood to hold that, in consequence of the abolition of slavery in a portion of her Majesty's dominions, by the act of Parliament of 3d and 4th William IV., c. 73, her Majesty's authorities are prevented from recognising the relation of slavery, or any of its incidents, even on board the vessels belonging to friendly States in which slavery legally exists. It has been already observed by the undersigned, in the note referred to, that the Government of the United States cannot admit that the vessels of a friendly power, driven by stress of weather, or by mutiny, into her Majesty's ports, can, in consequence of a change in the municipal law of England, be rightfully deprived of any aid and assistance to which they are entitled by the law and comity of nations. But, granting this, for argument's sake, to be an erroneous view; and that the principle above stated is correctly assumed by her Majesty's Government: It can only follow that her Majesty's authorities, in the cases supposed, are justified in refusing to perform acts not now authorized by British law, in reference to slavery; as, for instance, to employ their officers in arresting fugitive slaves. It cannot follow that when, by stress of weather, or mutiny, a foreign vessel, having slaves lawfully on board, is driven into a British port, the British civil and military authorities may forcibly interfere to liberate them; because this cannot be done without violently infringing that authority of the captain of the vessel over the ship's company, which is recognised as well by the laws of England as of all other civilized States. If the law of England converts slaves into passengers, in exempting them from one kind of control, which her laws do not recognise, it subjects them to another, which her laws do recognise.

It is not exclusively in reference to cases like those which have so often been the subject of the reclamations of the United States, that these principles apply. A species of servitude not materially different from that abolished by the 3d and 4th William IV., c. 73, once prevailing throughout Europe, still exists in some of the northern portions of the continent. If a vessel from that quarter should be driven into a port in her Majesty's dominions, navigated in whole or in part by persons held in a servitude like that alluded to, the undersigned presumes it would be deemed a great violation of the comity of nations, if the vessel should be boarded by her Majesty's civil officers, supported by a military force, and proclaiming to the ship's company that, as servitude no longer existed in England, they were free to quit the vessel, and go where they pleased; and the undersigned cannot doubt that if pecuniary loss accrued in consequence of this interference, it would be held to warrant a demand on her Majesty's Government for indemnification.

But, in reference immediately to the case in hand: if it should be granted that, by unavoidable force of British law, the statute of 28th August, 1833, so entirely requires the liberation of all slaves, however brought into her Majesty's dominions, as to authorize every species of civil and military agency by which such liberation is effected, (an extension of the principle which her Majesty's Government has never, it is believed, maintained,) then, the least that a foreign and friendly power can demand, is, that effect should be given to the act as a whole. It would seem peculiarly unjust, in applying the statute to the citizens of a friendly State, to call into action only so much of its provisions as is necessary to divest them of their property, without giving them the benefit of the other enactments, by which compensation is made for the property of which they are thus deprived. The abolition of slavery is nowhere, it is believed, defined in the statute as a simple technical idea, importing nothing but a change of condition from servitude to freedom. But it is a complex act, consisting of several parts, all of which are equally essential, and equally established by the statute. The undersigned had the honor to observe, in his note of the 1st of March, that, in the same act which liberated the slaves in her Majesty's colonies, (and in virtue of which alone it is now held that slaves in foreign vessels, driven by stress of weather into her Majesty's dominions, must be liberated,) it is declared to be "just and expedient that a reasonable compensation should be made to the persons hitherto entitled to the services of such slaves, for the loss which they will incur by being deprived of their right to such services." If, then, in the understanding of Parliament, in enacting the statute of 3d and 4th William IV., c. 73, it would have been unjust to liberate the slaves of her Majesty's subjects without compensating the master, it would seem impossible to derive from that act any warrant to liberate the slaves of the citizens of a foreign State, driven by stress of weather into a British port, without similar compensation. If such a liberation would have been unjust toward British subjects much more would it be unjust toward the citizens of a friendly and foreign State. It is only by inference that the act is considered by her Majesty's Government to apply at all to foreign citizens driven by stress of weather into a British port. To enforce against such foreign citizens liberation without compensation, as an inference from a statute declaring that justice demands compensation to British subjects whose slaves are liberated, would seem as much at variance with the rules of reasoning as with the dictates of justice.

The undersigned has the honor to renew to the Earl of Aberdeen the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

EDWARD EVERETT.

FOREIGN OFFICE, May 20, 1842.

The undersigned, her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Mr. Everett's note of the 3d instant, in which Mr. Everett states that he has been directed by his Government to bring to the knowledge of the undersigned the particulars of the case of the "Hermosa," an American vessel, bound from Richmond to New Orleans, and carrying an assorted cargo and forty-eight slaves, which was wrecked on the Spanish Key reef, near Abaco—the slaves and cargo being saved by licensed wreckers, and carried by them into Nassau.

Mr. Everett complains that, by the direct interference of the British authorities at Nassau, the slaves were set at liberty; and Mr. Everett claims compensation for the loss therein suffered by the former proprietors of the slaves.

For the facts of the case in detail, Mr. Everett refers to two declarations made by the master of the Hermosa, before a magistrate of the United States, and enclosed in the note of Mr. Everett. There is some discrepancy in the account given by Mr. Chattin from that which her Majesty's Government have received from the Governor of the Bahamas. The former alleges that the stipendiary magistrate of Nassau was seen to send the slaves on shore from the wreckers' vessel; and that the Governor of the Bahamas, being then in Nassau, knew of everything which was done relative to the slaves. The account given by the Governor, though it does not enter so minutely into particulars, distinctly states that, upon reference being made to him, he declined any interference with the slaves; but that, under instructions formerly sent from England, they were permitted to land in Nassau. It can hardly be supposed that Col. Cockburn would have so expressed himself if he had been aware that a magistrate of the colony had been actively employed in sending the slaves on shore.

But, although the undersigned thinks it right to point out the discrepancy to Mr. Everett, he does not consider it as in any way affecting the point at issue; for, admitting that the magistrate did interfere actively, and that, in the absence of the master of the "Hermosa," he visited the negroes, and, by his own authority, sent them on shore,--it must be remembered that the vessel in which the negroes entered Nassau was not an American, but a British vessel; consequently, that the magistrate was called upon to deal with her and her crew strictly according to British law; and that, if he had reason to suppose that any illegal constraint was put upon the liberties or inclinations of those whom she had rescued, it was his bounden duty to see their freedom vindicated, and the persons exercising authority on board the vessel duly punished. For this reason, the undersigned cannot admit that the forcible interference on the part of the British officer, which the account furnished to Mr. Everett states to have taken place, would have formed any just cause of complaint from the late owners of the slaves; still less, that it would have been a violent infringement of the authority of the American captain.

In the latter part of Mr. Everett's note, it is suggested, that if, by the act of the 28th August, 1833, British law requires the liberation of the slaves in question, effect should be given to that act as a whole; and that, as it has provided compensation for British slave-owners, it should do the same for citizens of a foreign State, and whose slaves may be liberated by being driven within its jurisdiction.

The question which is here raised has been so fully discussed, and so deliberately decided upon a former occasion, that it is scarcely necessary to do more than refer Mr. Everett to what then passed between Mr. Stevenson and her Majesty's Government. In the notes addressed by Lord Palmerston to Mr. Stevenson on the 7th of January and the 11th of December, 1837, upon the case of the "Enterprise," Mr. Everett will find stated at length the reasons which forbid her Majesty's Government henceforward to entertain the question of compensation for slaves who may have acquired their liberty by passing under the jurisdiction of British law.

The undersigned cannot hold out to Mr. Everett any expectation that her Majesty's Government will recede from the determination then taken.

The sole points of difference between the case of the "Enterprise" and that of the "Hermosa" appear to be—first, that the slaves from the latter vessel entered the port of their liberation under the British, and not under the American flag; and, secondly, that the time of their liberation was subsequent to the complete emancipation of the slaves in the British colonies, when even the apprenticeship of the negroes had ceased to exist.

The undersigned feels assured that Mr. Everett will see in these two points of difference no cause for any deviation from the course taken by her Majesty's Government on the former occasion, when it was decided by them, "that slavery, being now abolished throughout the British empire, there can be no well founded claim on the part of any foreigner for compensation in respect to slaves, who, under any circumstances whatever, may come into the British colonies, any more than there would be in respect to slaves who might come into the United Kingdom."

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to Mr. Everett the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

ABERDEEN.

Here, then, we find (continued Mr. C.,) that, as late as the 20th May last, when Lord Ashburton was writing diplomatic notes about adjourning the settlement of this question to London, where "access could be had to all the authorities," the British Government had solemnly decided that "they would not, henceforward, entertain the question of compensation for slaves who may have acquired their liberty by passing under the jurisdiction of British laws;" and "that, slavery being now abolished throughout the British empire, there can be no well-founded claim on the part of any foreigner for compensation in respect to slaves who, under any circumstances whatever, may come into the British colonies." No, not even when the vessels containing them are driven there by tempest, like the Enterprise; by shipwreck, like the Hermosa; or by mutiny and murder, like the Creole. And this inhuman doctrine—this barbarous interpolation of the code of international law, which imposes a penalty on misfortune, and holds out a premium to insurrection and murder, is promulgated at the very moment when the bloody tragedy recently enacted on board the Creole had demonstrated the fatal consequences to which it would inevitably lead.

[Mr. RIVES here interrupted Mr. C. and observed that the letter of Lord Aberdeen was a mere reference to a prior decision given in the case of the Enterprise.]

It does refer (continued Mr. C.) to that decision; but it expressly adopts and confirms it; and the reference to a case which this body had already pronounced to have been a violation of our flag and of national law, only renders their rejection of our demand as offensive in form, as it was unjust in substance. Why, let me ask, was this letter, rejecting our demand, withheld from the public, when Mr. Webster's letter to Mr. Everett, instructing him to make that demand and demonstrating its injustice, was paraded in every newspaper in the country, even before it had reached its destination? Why was the smooth, plausible diplomatic note of Lord Ashburton, who was not authorized to negotiate on this subject, sent to this body along with this treaty; when not a word was said about the plain, unequivocal, peremptory answer of the British minister, about the extent of whose power there could be no dispute? How is it that, until yesterday, the very existence of such a correspondence was unknown to this body? Was it because it was feared that such a letter might prove an obstacle to the ratification of this treaty, and might revive anew those feelings of indignation which these outrages had excited, and which had only slumbered since this negotiation had been set on foot?

Mr. President, the moment that this answer of Lord Ashburton was known here, our Government should have made the settlement of this question a sine qua non; and, in case of refusal, have broken off the negotiation at once. Had this course been pursued, depend upon it, the powers of Lord Ashburton would have been found broad enough to cover the case, or have been speedily enlarged. Gentlemen tell us that, in that event, war would have been inevitable; and one would almost fancy that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs already heard the distant roar of British artillery. For my own part, I entertain no such fears. Embarrassed as she is in her finances, and encumbered with two Asiatic wars, England is not more anxious or better prepared for war than we are. She would never go to war for the sake of maintaining a principle which is only important to her as a means of annoying us, and which the voice of the civilized world would pronounce to be erroneous. Her boasted philanthropy is wonderfully sagacious, and always coincides with and subserves her interests. But, even did I believe that war would be the inevitable consequence of a rejection of this treaty, I would not permit this belief to influence my decision. True, our finances are deranged, our treasury exhausted, and the administration of our affairs confided to hands that neither possess nor deserve the confidence of the country; but I would prefer to encounter war, under all these disadvantages, than to purchase an ignominious peace by the surrender of a principle of such vital importance. I would not permit any temporary difficulties to create permanent misfortunes. I would treat with Great Britain as I would treat with the weakest power in Christendom; I would treat with her now, as I would when our affairs are most prosperous. I would treat with her, with Tyler for our President, as I would with Washington or Jackson at the helm of Government. And, after all, if we ratify this treaty, will not there still remain sufficient cause for war? Did not this body, two years ago, solemnly declare that there was, when they pronounced the seizure of the slaves on board the Enterprise a violation of law and of the rights of our citizens, and equivalent to an invasion of our domain? Since those resolutions, the outrages of the Hermosa and the Creole have been superadded to that of the Enterprise. If there was cause for war then, is there not much greater cause now? If these resolutions be erroneous, repeal them. If the principles they contain be correct, preserve your consistency, and maintain them at whatever sacrifice. But do not ratify this treaty, and leave them in full force—a recorded sentence of self-condemnation.

We have been told that the 10th article of the treaty would apply to cases like the Creole; and that henceforward Great Britain, although she might still continue to liberate our slaves when they came within her grasp, would be bound to surrender them when they had committed murder. I hope, for the sake of humanity and the honor of this country, it may be so; but there is a clause in that article which I do not like, and which, if not inserted for the purpose of preventing its application to cases of this description, will, I am confident, be used as a pretext for that purpose: I refer to that clause which provides that "the evidence of criminality shall be according to the laws of the place where the fugitive, or person charged, shall be found." Suppose, sir, that a slave, in attempting to recover his liberty, murders him who holds him in custody: would not an English judge (upon whom the decision would devolve) decide that, according to the laws of England, there was no criminality? That the restraint on the person of the slave was an unlawful duress—a violent assault, which justified or excused the killing of him who committed it? I do not say, sir, that such ought to be the decision. I do not say that it would be a fair and honest interpretation of the article. But I do say, there is enough in it to cavil about—enough to afford the English Government a plausible pretext for doing that which they are now doing without a pretext.*

*The following account, given by the notorious Tappan, of a conference which took place between Lord Ashburton and a committee of the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, shortly after the ratification of the treaty, appeared in the New York Courier and Enquirer of the 12th September last. If we can credit this statement (I admit of doubtful authenticity) we have already a commentary on this article of the treaty by the minister who negotiated it, declaring, not only that it does not apply to cases like the Creole, but that, in framing the treaty, great care had been taken to prevent any such application. I refer to this publication here, not only as furnishing some indication of his Lordship's views on this subject, but especially as an evidence of the connexion which exists between the Abolitionists of this country and the Government of Great Britain. How diseased must be the state of public opinion in a community which can tolerate, within its bosom, foreign societies formed for the avowed purpose of warring against the fundamental institutions of the country, and does not cover with universal opprobrium American citizens who publicly apply to the ambassador of a foreign nation to protect them against the acts of their own Government.

"ABOLITION MORALITY.—We find in the Journal of Commerce the following gross attack upon the honor and honesty of Lord Ashburton:

"We have heretofore alluded to the fact, that the Abolitionists have openly recommended slaves to steal from their masters whenever it would aid them in effecting their escape; and now Lewis Tappan would have the world believe that Lord Ashburton approves of such advice!

"In law, the receiver of stolen goods is as criminal as the thief; and in morals, all must agree that the person who can deliberately advise a human being to set at naught the laws of God and man, and justify—nay, urge—his stealing, would himself be guilty of theft when an opportunity offered. 'Thou shalt not steal' is one of God's commandments; and he who advises his fellow-being to violate it, would undoubtedly violate it himself if secure from punishment.

"And yet, because Mr. Lewis Tappan and some of his associates are willing to advise others to steal, these honest and pious gentlemen infer that Lord Ashburton would give similar advice! In other words, they in fact publish his Lordship as a THIEF.

"Let the reader peruse the following, and form his own opinion of Mr. Tappan and his honest and religious associates."—Ed. Cour. and Enq.

INTERVIEW WITH LORD ASHBURTON.

The Executive Committee of the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, apprehending that the tenth article of the treaty lately concluded between the British minister and our Government, might be used to the injury of fugitive slaves escaping into Canada, appointed a deputation to solicit an interview with Lord Ashburton just before his departure for England, to lay before him facts in relation to the subject, which might be communicated to his Government. He very readily complied with the request, and appointed 10 o'clock a. m. September 3d, for the interview, at his lodgings at the Astor House. The committee consisted of Messrs. S. S. Jocelyn, Leonard Gibbs, Le Roy Sunderland, and Lewis Tappan. Mr. Gerrit Smith being present, was invited to accompany the delegation. The delegation was courteously received by Mr. Maldmay, secretary of the special mission of her Britannic Majesty, and by him presented to Lord Ashburton, who invited them to be seated, expressed much satisfaction at seeing them, and entered into a frank and full conversation on the subject for which the interview was requested. The delegation, after congratulating the British envoy on the successful termination of his mission, informed him of the particulars of the case of Nelson Hackett, a slave who fled from Arkansas to Canada, where his pursuers overtook him, had him arrested on a charge of stealing a coat, gold-watch, and horse of his master. Hackett was imprisoned, and meantime a grand jury in Arkansas indicted him. A demand was forwarded from the Governor of Arkansas to the Governor General of Canada, for his surrender. Sir Charles Bagot complied, and Hackett was taken back to Arkansas. The delegation stated to Lord Ashburton their apprehensions that such a course occurring without any treaty stipulation, there was great cause of apprehension that, under the tenth article of the treaty, which provides for the mutual surrender of all persons charged with certain specified crimes, no fugitive slave would be safe in Canada, when it is notorious that slaveholders allege crimes against fugitive slaves as one expedient for their reclamation.

Lord Ashburton went into an explanation of the 10th article, and mentioned several particulars of the discussion that took place, both on that topic and others relating to slaves. He said that it was very desirable to have an article in the treaty to meet cases similar to that of Holmes, who fled from Canada into Vermont, and the cases that would frequently arise, considering the extent of the bordering lines, and the temptation for criminals to flee across the lines in hope of securing themselves from arrest and punishment. The Governor of Canada was anxious that deserters should be included; but as Lord A. learned that a claim would be put in for the delivering up of fugitive slaves, he abandoned the question of deserters from her Britannic Majesty's possessions. He was also very desirous to secure the delivery of mutineers; but did not press it, lest it should involve, on the part of his Government, the delivery of slaves situated as were those on board the Creole. With regard to the case of the slave Hackett, he did not know all the facts. Sir Charles Bagot was known to him, and he did not believe he would do anything intentionally wrong. But he had just entered upon his duties, and was probably desirous, at that juncture, of promoting good feeling with his great neighbor. The fact that the slave had taken his master's watch, was a circumstance that probably went against him. "Had he only taken the horse," said Lord A., (looking at Gerrit Smith, significantly, though he could not be supposed ever to have read the advice of that gentleman to fugitive slaves,) "he would not probably have been surrendered; for you know the horse was necessary for his escape." Lord A. said that, in framing the 10th article, great care had been taken that inferior magistrates in Canada should have no authority to surrender fugitives, as had been urged by the other party; and that only the Governor himself could perform an act of so great importance. Great care would be taken, he had no doubt, to protect the innocent; and that the taking of any article necessary to effect an escape would not be considered felonious. If, said he, the operation of the 10th article prove injurious, he had no doubt the British Government would put an end to it, agreeably to another provision of the treaty, viz: "The 10th article shall continue in force until one or the other party shall signify its wish to terminate it, and no longer."

Lord Ashburton said that, when the delegation came to read his correspondence with Mr. Webster, they would see that he had taken all possible care to prevent any injury being done to the people of color; that, if he had even been willing to introduce an article including cases similar to that of the Creole, his Government would never have ratified it, as they will adhere to the great principles they have so long avowed and maintained; and that the friends of the slave in England would be very watchful to see that no wrong practice took place under the tenth article.

The delegation now rose, and, after thanking Lord Ashburton for the candid and satisfactory manner in which he had received their communications, and answered their inquiries—wishing the divine blessing for the part he had taken in perpetuating peace between the respective countries, and protecting the rights of the oppressed, and a safe and speedy return to his native land—took their leave, highly gratified with the courtesy, frankness, intelligence, and philanthropy of this distinguished nobleman. Believing the above statement will be interesting to your readers, especially to those who labor and pray for the slave—for the poor fugitive, particularly—that it will tend to quiet the fears of the twelve thousand colored inhabitants of Canada, most of whom have fled from Southern slavery, and their numerous friends on both sides of the line; and that there will be found an additional occasion for the thankfulness to God, that he has, through the instrumentality of the American and British ministers, brought about a peace that will, it is hoped, be lasting. I remain, very respectfully, yours,

LEWIS TAPPAN.

BRITISH TREATY.

SECRET SESSION.

SPEECH OF MR. RIVES,

OF VIRGINIA.

In Senate, August 17 and 19, 1842—On the treaty with Great Britain.

Mr. RIVES said that the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which the treaty had been referred, not having been able, from the shortness of the time allowed by the now advanced stage of the session, and the consequent necessity of early action on the subject, to make a formal and written report, it devolved on him, as the organ of the committee, to state the views and considerations by which the committee had been influenced, in recommending to the Senate to give the constitutional sanction of their "advice and consent" to its ratification. He begged leave to say, in the outset, that, in forming their judgment on the grave question submitted to them, the committee had felt themselves bound, by the most solemn of all obligations, to discard from their minds every consideration but such as appertained to the true interest and honor of their country. They had felt that it would be to betray the trust reposed in them by the Senate, and to show themselves unworthy of the confidence of the country, if they could, for a moment, permit themselves, in pursuit of party objects, or under the influence of personal or political prejudices, to turn aside from the national question, to inquire by whom the treaty had been negotiated, or whose name stood subscribed to it. They have looked to the treaty in itself, isolated from every invidious reference to persons or parties; and have pronounced upon its acceptance or rejection as, in their best judgment, the interests and honor of the nation demand.

The stipulations of the treaty embrace three distinct objects: an exact and permanent definition of the boundaries, where they had been the subject of doubt or dispute, between the territories of the United States and the adjacent provinces of Great Britain; a plan of co-operation for the more effectual suppression of the African slave-trade; and an agreement for the mutual surrender, in certain cases, of criminals fugitive from justice. The first of these objects, from its intimate connexion with the tranquillity of the frontier, and the peace of the two countries—on several recent occasions exposed to imminent hazard of interruption, from intrusions on the disputed territory, and the conflicting jurisdictions exercised over it—naturally occupies the foreground of the treaty.

The merits of the controversy respecting our Northeastern boundary, and the respective claims and arguments of the two parties in regard to it, are too well known to the Senate, (said Mr. R.,) to require any recapitulation of them at my hands. A brief retrospect of the history of the controversy, however, may be necessary to enable the Senate to comprehend the position of the question at the moment when the negotiations which terminated in this treaty were entered upon.

The second article of the definitive treaty of peace of 1783, describes the Northeastern boundary of the United States as follows: "Beginning at the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, to wit: that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the source of the St. Croix river to the highlands; along the said highlands, which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean, to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river;" and then, pursuing the description of the boundaries of the United States around their whole territory, on the north, the west, and the south, it returns to the eastern boundary of Maine in the following words: "East by a line to be drawn along the middle of the river St. Croix, from its mouth, in the Bay of Fundy, to its source; and from its source, directly north to the aforesaid highlands, which divide the rivers that fall into the Atlantic ocean from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence."

Nothing could afford a more striking evidence of the extremely defective knowledge of the geography of the country in question, which existed at the time of the signature of the treaty of peace, than the fact, that, in the very first year succeeding the conclusion of the treaty, a serious controversy arose between the high contracting parties as to which was this river St. Croix, here called for as a natural boundary between their adjacent possessions. There were three rivers emptying themselves into Passamaquoddy bay, a part of the Bay of Fundy, (as it was subsequently formally declared to be,*) each one of which, it seemed, had, some time or other, passed under the name of the St. Croix. This territorial comedy of errors, like all other questions of disputed boundary, was, on several occasions, near producing tragical results, by embroiling the authorities and population adjacent to the controverted limits. The most eastern river was claimed by the United States as the true St. Croix—the western by Great Britain. Finally, after lowering over the peace of the frontiers for ten years, this controversy was put in a train of amicable adjustment by the treaty of 1794, (commonly called Jay's treaty,) which provided for the appointment of joint commissioners to determine which was the river truly intended under the name of the St. Croix, in the treaty of peace. The commissioners met, and in 1798 closed their deliberations, by declaring an intermediate river, called the Scoodiac, to be the true St. Croix of the treaty; which has been, accordingly, ever since recognised and observed as the actual boundary of the United States in that quarter, and to that extent.

In a very short time after this portion of the Northeastern boundary was ascertained and established, new difficulties and uncertainties arose in following it out, according to the terms of the treaty of peace. The decision of the commissioners, under the treaty of 1794, in identifying the true river St.

Croix, and in fixing its source, had established the terminus a quo, from which the boundary in question was to be run. But the terminus ad quem, to which it was to be continued—to wit: the highlands dividing the tributary waters of the St. Lawrence and the Atlantic, which lay due north from the source of the St. Croix—remained to be ascertained; and when they were ascertained, the northwesternmost head of the Connecticut river, (another terminus to which the boundary along the said highlands was to be continued,) was also to be identified and established. Both of these termini were supposed to be involved in doubt by the actual geography and physical conformation of the country. The highlands described in the treaty were said to have no definite existence in nature; and the various sources of the Connecticut river, and their relative position, produced confusion in determining which was the true northwesternmost source referred to by the treaty of peace. For the "adjustment of these uncertainties," by the agency of a joint commission formed on the model of that of Jay's treaty in regard to the St. Croix river, a convention was concluded by Mr. Rufus King with Lord Hawkesbury, in May, 1803, under the instructions of Mr. Madison, then Secretary of State. This convention received the unanimous advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification, with the exception of its fifth article, relating to the northwestern boundary between the Lake of the Woods and the Mississippi river, which, it was apprehended, might conflict with the territorial claims of the United States under the treaty for the purchase of Louisiana from France; which had been concluded twelve days previous to the convention with Lord Hawkesbury, but which fact was not known to either of the negotiators at the signature of the latter. The change thus made by the Senate not being acceded to by the British Government, the convention failed to take effect.

Thus stood the question in regard to the Northeastern boundary, without any new arrangement to obviate or adjust the uncertainties which had arisen, until the treaty of Ghent. By the fifth article of that treaty, it was agreed that two commissioners should be appointed—one by each party—to ascertain and determine where is the point of intersection, or angle called the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, formed by a line drawn due north from the source of the St. Croix to the highlands, as described in the treaty of peace; and also the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river; and to cause the entire boundary, from the source of the St. Croix to the river St. Lawrence, to be surveyed and marked, according to the provisions of the said treaty of peace; and if these commissioners should differ in opinion on the matters referred to them, then their differences were to be referred to some friendly sovereign or State, to be named for the purpose, whose decision should be final and conclusive on all the matters so referred. The commissioners appointed under the treaty of Ghent having radically differed in their views of the true boundary, a convention was entered into between the two Governments, in September, 1827, for carrying into effect the stipulated reference to some friendly sovereign; agreeing to proceed, in concert, to the choice of such friendly sovereign, and regulating various details connected with the arbitration. The King of the Netherlands was, by the concurrent act of the two Governments, subsequently chosen as the arbiter; and, in January, 1831, he pronounced his award—declaring, in effect, that neither the line claimed by the United States, to the north of the river St. John, nor that claimed by Great Britain, to the south of that river, fulfilled the description of the boundary contained in the treaty of peace; that the stipulations of the treaty were too vague and indeterminate to admit of satisfactory execution, when applied to the actual topography of the country; and that, therefore, "it will be suitable (il conviendra) to adopt as the boundary of the two States" a line which drawn from the source of the St. Croix till it intersect the river St. John, shall continue along that river to the mouth of the St. Francis; thence along the St. Francis, to its southwesternmost head; and thence, by a due-west course, to the line claimed by the United States.

This award of the King of the Netherlands, in proposing the adoption of a new boundary, was considered as a departure from the question submitted for his decision by the terms of the reference, and was held, therefore, not to be obligatory on the parties. The Senate of the United States, before whom the award was laid by the President for their advice on the subject, expressed an opinion unfavorable to its acceptance; and from that time down to the special mission of Lord Ashburton, a series of halting and abortive negotiations has been going on between the two Governments, terminating in nothing, and leaving this disturbing controversy as far as ever from settlement; the peace of the two countries, in the mean time, exposed to perpetual danger of interruption, by collisions on the debatable frontier.

Mr. R. said he had thus briefly retraced the history of this controversy, and exhibited the mutual proceedings of the two Governments in regard to it—not with any purpose of weakening or impugning the just title of the United States to the territory claimed by them as being within the limits established by the treaty of peace; on the contrary, he felt in his own mind a clear conviction of the justice and validity of the American claim as resting on the terms of the treaty. He believed that the boundary claimed by the United States fulfilled the literal description contained in the treaty, and that it was the only boundary which did fulfil that description. He had, therefore, heartily concurred in the resolution unanimously passed in this body, four years ago, affirming our conviction of the right of the United States under the treaty of peace; and such, he was authorized to say, was still the opinion entertained by every member of the committee. But, while this was the opinion of the committee and of the Senate, and, without doubt, of a large majority of the citizens of the United States who have investigated the subject, it is impossible for us, looking at the public and solemn acts of the nation through its recognised organs, now to stand uncompromisingly on the ground of right. We have admitted, over and over again, that the question is one open to doubt and controversy; and, as such, we have agreed to make it a subject of arbitration; and the opinion of the arbiter, however wanting in legal obligation, has yet been pronounced before the world against our claim.

The Senate has seen, from the review just presented, that, not only by the treaty of Ghent, and the subsequent convention of 1827, had we abandoned the ground of clear and incontestable right; but that, at a long antecedent period, by the convention of 1803 between Mr. King and Lord Hawkesbury, (an arrangement unanimously confirmed by the Senate, so far as the Northeastern boundary was concerned,) we had agreed to bring our claims into litigation before a mixed tribunal of arbitrament, to be specially constituted for the purpose. The President of the United States, [Mr. Jefferson,] in communicating the conclusion of that arrangement to Congress, accompanied it with the following pregnant remarks:

"A further knowledge of the ground in the northeastern and northwestern angles of the United States has evinced that the boundaries established by the treaty of Paris, between the British territories and ours in those parts, were too imperfectly described to be susceptible of execution. It has, therefore, been thought worthy of attention, for preserving and cherishing the harmony and useful intercourse subsisting between the two nations, to remove, by timely arrangements, what unfavorable incidents might otherwise render a ground of future misunderstanding. A convention has, therefore, been entered into, which provides for a practicable demarcation of those limits, to the satisfaction of both parties."

Mr. Madison, in the instructions given by him to Mr. King for the negotiation of the convention, used language of similar, and not less significant import:

"In fixing," said he, "the point at which the line is to terminate, and which is referred to as the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, the difficulty arises from a reference of the treaty of 1783 to 'the highlands,' which it is now found have no definite existence. To remove this difficulty, no better expedient occurs than to provide for the appointment of a third commissioner, as in article five of the treaty of 1794; and to authorize the three to determine on a point to be substituted for the description in the second article of the treaty of 1783, having due regard to the general idea that the line ought to terminate on the elevated ground dividing the rivers falling into the Atlantic, from those emptying themselves into the St. Lawrence. The commissioners may also be authorized to substitute for the description of the boundary between the point so fixed and the northwesternmost head of the Connecticut river—namely, a line 'along the said highlands;"—such a reference to intermediate sources of rivers, or other ascertained or ascertainable points, to be connected by straight lines, as will admit of easy and accurate execution hereafter, and as will best comport with the apparent intention of the treaty of 1783."

Here we have an instruction from one of the most cautious, as well as able and enlightened statesmen, that ever presided over the department of our foreign relations, expressly authorizing the minister of the United States, on the ground of the impracticability of finding the limits described in the treaty of 1783, to enter into an arrangement to substitute—not, as has been said, a point only, but a continuous and long line of boundary between that point and another, for the lines and angles described in the treaty.

After these various and repeated acts of the national authorities, acknowledging, in one form or another, the doubts and difficulties which stood in the way of the actual demarcation of the boundary in question, according to the provisions of the treaty of 1783, it seems to the committee too late in the day, consistently with a proper regard for the peace of nations and the opinion of the world, to plant ourselves now sternly and inflexibly on the ground of a clear, manifest, and incontrovertible right to the precise line of boundary we claim. If the honor of the country, as is now asserted, demanded that the summum jus of our claims, in regard to the disputed boundary, should have been rigorously insisted on in the late negotiation, then that honor has been long since irretrievably prostrated in the dust. It was sacrificed by the treaty of 1794, by the convention of 1803, by the Ghent negotiations in 1814, by the arbitration arrangement of 1827; it was betrayed by Washington, Jefferson, and Madison; and trampled under foot by every successive administration that has been charged with the foreign relations of the country, from the peace of 1783 to the present day. How would even our hero President, the venerable Jackson—at whose lofty tone in the foreign intercourse of the nation the world stood surprised—how would even he stand, if tried by this new standard of diplomatic chivalry? During the period of his administration, repeated entries were made on the disputed territory by agents of the neighboring British provincial authorities, who arrested our citizens, seized their property, and transported both one and the other into a foreign jurisdiction. Did he summon the nation to arms for this hostile invasion of our territory?—as it assuredly was, if the principle now so cheaply put forward, of the incontrovertible justice and validity of our title to the boundary we claimed, be correct. No, sir; he knew that, however strong might be our conviction of the justice of our claim, there were two sides to the question—the adversary claim resting on grounds which we had, by the most solemn national acts, recognised to be fair topics of discussion; and that we could not justify ourselves to the moral sense of mankind, in rashly taking the decision of the question into our own hands.

The truth is, that no administration has ever shown a greater disposition to settle this question with Great Britain, on principles of compromise and concession, than did that of General Jackson. It is well known that his opinions and inclinations were decidedly in favor of the acceptance of the award of the King of the Netherlands; and that the objections of the State of Maine, and the action of the Senate on the subject, alone prevented his acceding to the new conventional line proposed by that award. When, from these causes, the adjustment under the mediation of the King of the Netherlands failed, President Jackson immediately sought, by a provisional arrangement with the State of Maine, for an indemnity to be paid her by the United States in other lands, to arm himself with the necessary sanction of her assent, to agree with Great Britain upon a new boundary line, in place of that of the treaty of 1783. An arrangement to that effect was actually entered into by three distinguished public functionaries duly authorized by the President, with three other gentlemen as agents of the State of Maine; but not being ratified by the Legislature of the State, when submitted to them, the negotiation, upon that basis, was necessarily abandoned. Being thus forced back upon new efforts to settle and ascertain the boundary as it existed under the treaty of peace, General Jackson authorized a proposition of extreme liberality to be submitted to the British minister. Hitherto, in all the discussions upon thes subject, as well as in the explorations and surveys made to determine the boundary, one thing had been assumed as certain and fixed—to wit: that, from the source of the St. Croix, the boundary, in the express language of the treaty, should be run directly north to the highlands, &c.; and this had been invariably considered a main pillar of the argument in support of the American claim. General Jackson, in his earnest desire to bring this long-pending controversy to an amicable termination, and with an accommodating and liberal spirit which was emphatically acknowledged by the British Government, now proposed, hrough Mr. Livingston and Mr. McLane, successively Secretaries of State, that the commissioners hould be no longer restricted by the due-north line n determining the true boundary; but, discarding hat line, if they thought proper, they should be at liberty to seek the highlands described in the treaty, to he west of the meridian of the source of the St. Croix, and in any part of the disputed territory north r south of the river St. John. What seemed mainly o produce the hesitation of the British Government n acceding to this proposition, was, the doubt entertained by it whether the assent of the State of Maine which had not, and probably could not, be obtained) would not be as necessary to give effect to an arangement on this basis, as on that of an avowed onventional line.

It appears to the committee, therefore, in looking ack to the public and solemn acts of the Government, and of its successive administrations, that he time has passed, if it ever existed, when we ould be justified in making the precise line of oundary claimed by us the subject of a sine qua on of negotiation, or of the ultima ratio of an ssertion by force. Did a second arbitration, then, fford the prospect of a more satisfactory result? his expedient seemed to be equally rejected by ll parties—by the United States, by Great Britain, nd by the State of Maine. If such an alternative hould be contemplated by any one as preferable o the arrangement which has been made, it is fit o bear in mind the risk and uncertainty, as well s the inevitable delay and expense, incident to that node of decision. We have already seen, in the nstance of the arbitration by the King of the Netherlands, how much weight a tribunal of that ort is inclined to give to the argument of convenience, and a supposed intention on the part of the egotiators of the treaty of 1783, against the literal nd positive terms employed by the instrument in s description of limits. Is there no danger, in the vent of another arbitration, that a farther research nto the public archives of Europe might bring to ight some embarrassing (even though apocryphal) ocument, to throw a new shade of plausible doubt n the clearness of our title, in the view of a sovlgn arbiter? Such a document has already been ommunicated to the committee; and I feel it (said Mr. R.) to be my duty to lay it before the Senate, hat they may fully appreciate its bearings, and determine for themselves the weight and importance hich belong to it. It is due to the learned and istinguished gentleman, (Mr. Jared Sparks of Boston,) by whom the document referred to was discovered in the archives of France, while pursuing is laborious and intelligent researches connected ith the history of our own country, that the account of it should be given in his own words, as ontained in a communication addressed by him to he Department of State. I proceed, therefore, to ead from that communication:

"While pursuing my researches among the voluminous papers relating to the American Revolution in the Archives des Affaires Etrangeres in Paris, I found in one of the bound volumes an original letter from Dr. Franklin to Count de Vergennes, of which the following is an exact transcript:

"PASSY, December 6, 1782.

"SIR: I have the honor of returning herewith the map your Excellency sent me yesterday. I have marked with a strong red line, according to your desire, the limits of the United States, as settled in the preliminaries between the British and American plenipotentiaries.

"With great respect, I am, &c.,
"B. FRANKLIN."

"This letter was written six days after the preliminaries were signed; and if we could procure the identical map mentioned by Franklin, it would seem to afford conclusive evidence as to the meaning affixed by the commissioners to the language of the treaty on the subject of the boundaries. You may well suppose that I lost no time in making inquiry for the map, not doubting that it would confirm all my previous opinions respecting the validity of our claim. In the geographical department of the Archives are sixty thousand maps and charts; but so well arranged with catalogues and indexes, that any one of them may be easily found. After a little research in the American division, with the aid of the keeper, I came upon a map of North America, by D'Anville, dated 1746, in size about eighteen inches square, on which was drawn a strong red line throughout the entire boundary of the United States, answering precisely to Franklin's description. The line is bold and distinct in every part, made with red ink, and apparently drawn with a hair-pencil, or a pen with a blunt point. There is no other coloring on any part of the map.

"Imagine my surprise on discovering that this line runs wholly south of the St. John's, and between the head waters of that river and those of the Penobscot and Kennebec. In short, it is exactly the line now contended for by Great Britain, except that it concedes more than is claimed. The north line, after departing from the source of the St. Croix, instead of proceeding to Mars Hill, stops far short of that point and turns off to the west, so as to leave on the British side all the streams which flow into the St. John's, between the source of the St. Croix and Mars Hill. It is evident that the line, from the St. Croix to the Canadian highlands, is intended to exclude all the waters running into the St. John's.

"There is no positive proof that this map is actually the one marked by Franklin; yet, upon any other supposition, it would be difficult to explain the circumstances of its agreeing so perfectly with his description, and of its being preserved in the place where it would naturally be deposited by Count de Vergennes. I also found another map in the Archives, on which the same boundary was traced in a dotted red line with a pen, apparently copied from the other.

"I enclose herewith a map of Maine, on which I have drawn a strong black line, corresponding with the red one above mentioned."

I am far from intimating (said Mr. RIVES) that the documents discovered by Mr. Sparks, curious and well worthy of consideration as they undoubtedly are, are of weight sufficient to shake the title of the United States, founded on the positive language of the treaty of peace. But they could not fail, in the event of another reference, to give increased confidence and emphasis to the pretensions of Great Britain, and to exert a corresponding influence upon the mind of the arbiter. It is worth while, in this connexion, to turn to what Lord Ashburton has said, in one of his communications to Mr. Webster, when explaining his views of the position of the highlands described in the treaty:

"My inspection of the maps, and my examination of the documents," says his Lordship, "lead me to a very strong conviction that the highlands contemplated by the negotiators of the treaty were the only highlands then known to them—at the head of the Penobscot, Kennebec, and the rivers west of the St. Croix; and that they did not precisely know how the north line from the St. Croix would strike them; and if it were not my wish to shorten this discussion, I believe a very good argument might be drawn from the words of the treaty in proof of this. In the negotiations with Mr. Livingston, and afterwards with Mr. McLane, this view seemed to prevail; and, as you are aware, there were proposals to search for these highlands to the west, where alone, I believe, they will be found to answer perfectly the description of the treaty. If this question should unfortunately go to a further reference, I should by no means despair of finding some confirmation of this view of the case."

It is for the Senate to consider (added Mr. RIVES) whether there would not be much risk of introducing new complications and embarrassments in this controversy, by leaving it open for another litigated reference; and if the British Government—strongly prepossessed, as its minister tells us it is, with the justice of its claims—would not find what it would naturally consider a persuasive "confirmation of its view of the case" in documents, such as those encountered by Mr. Sparks in his historical researches in the archives of France.

A map has been vauntingly paraded here, from Mr. Jefferson's collection, in the zeal of opposition, (without taking time to see what it was,) to confront and invalidate the map found by Mr. Sparks in the Foreign Office at Paris; but, the moment it is examined, it is found to sustain, by the most precise and remarkable correspondence in every feature, the map communicated by Mr. Sparks. The Senator who produced it, could see nothing but the microscopic dotted line running off in a northeasterly direction; but the moment other eyes were applied to it, there was found, in bold relief, a strong red line, indicating the limits of the United States according to the treaty of peace, and coinciding, minutely and exactly, with the boundary traced on the map of Mr. Sparks. That this red line, and not the hardly visible dotted line, was intended to represent the limits of the United States according to the treaty of peace, is conclusively shown by the circumstance, that the red line is drawn on the map all around the exterior boundary of the United States;—through the middle of the Northern Lakes, thence through the Long Lake and the Rainy Lake to the Lake of the Woods; and from the western extremity of the Lake of the Woods to the river Mississippi; and along that river, to the point where the boundary of the United States, according to the treaty of peace, leaves it; and thence, by its easterly course, to the mouth of the St. Mary's, on the Atlantic.

Here, then, is a most remarkable and unforeseen confirmation of the map of Mr. Sparks, and by another map of a most imposing character, and bearing every mark of high authenticity. It was printed and published in Paris in 1784, (the year after the conclusion of the peace,) by Lattré, graveur du Roi, (engraver of maps, &c. to the King.) It is formally entitled, on its face, a "map of the United States of America, according to the treaty of peace of 1783.—(Carte des Etats Unis de l'Amérique, suivant le traité de paix de 1783.) It is "dedicated and presented" (dediée et presentée) "to his Excellency Benjamin Franklin, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, near the court of France," and while Dr. Franklin yet remained in Paris; for he did not return to the United States till the spring of the year 1785. Is there not, then, the most plausible ground to argue that this map, professing to be one constructed "according to the treaty of peace of 1783," and being "dedicated and presented" to Dr. Franklin, the leading negotiator who concluded that treaty, and who yet remained in Paris while the map was published, was made out with his knowledge, and by his directions; and that, corresponding as it does identically with the map found by Mr. Sparks in the Archives of the Foreign Affairs in Paris, they both partake of the same presumptions in favor of their authenticity.

Mr. R. said he did not design to dwell farther on these matters. That the knowledge possessed of the country bordering on the northern, and northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States, was exceedingly imperfect at the time the attempt was made to define these boundaries in the treaty of peace of 1783, is admitted by our whole diplomatic history. Exclusive of the early controversies respecting the true river St. Croix, and the extension of our boundary from the northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods to the river Mississippi, (both of which arose from the imperfect or erroneous notions of the geography of the country existing at the conclusion of the treaty of peace,) the remarkable fact, that as many as four boards of commissioners were constituted by the treaty of Ghent, more than thirty years after the definitive treaty of peace, to settle and determine an equal number of disputed boundary lines on the northern frontier of the United States, from Passamaquoddy Bay to the Lake of the Woods, is in itself pregnant evidence of the necessarily imperfect description of limits contained in the treaty of peace. From the want of known and recognised landmarks, or familiar natural monuments, in a country then unpeopled and unexplored, the negotiators of the treaty of peace were compelled to act very much in the dark, and to substitute, for a plain reference to known and familiar objects, a general description of limits, which has given rise to doubts and arguments, more or less plausible, as to the boundaries really intended, or most nearly described under the terms employed in the treaty. So long as the discussion shall continue to be conducted on its original grounds, the same doubts and difficulties which, for now sixty years since the achievement of our national independence, have prevented the definitive adjustment of our limits, will continue to embarrass and defeat a settlement of the question. Some new mode of solving the controversy, therefore, has become imperiously necessary.

A question of disputed boundary between adjacent territories, now rapidly filling up with a hardy and enterprising population, is one attended with constant danger to the peace of the two nations. The acts of ill-advised individuals, of small detachments of troops, of subordinate local authorities, may, at any moment, bring on a conflict, in which the two countries would be committed to the stern issues of war, against their own deliberate policy and will. How near this catastrophe was being brought about three years ago, on the occasion of what was called the Aroostook war, I need not remind the Senate. For terminating this thorny and long-protracted controversy, so fraught with mischiefs and dangers to both countries, the failures of the past prove that the only expedient now left is the conventional establishment of a new and well-defined boundary line. All attempts to effect an arrangement of this kind hitherto have been rendered unavailing, by the impossibility of obtaining the assent of the States of Maine and Massachusetts—one of them claiming the rights of sovereignty and jurisdiction, as well as soil; the other an original and undivested interest in the soil of the disputed territory. Under the principles of our federative system, the national authority has been held incompetent, by means of a convention with a foreign power or otherwise, to change the boundaries, and, in effect, alienate a portion of the territory of one of the members of the Union, without its formal and stipulated assent. This fundamental obstacle, which, through so long a series of abortive negotiations, has continued to keep open an ancient and dangerous controversy with a foreign power, has at length, by a fortunate combination of circumstances, and happy reconciliation of jarring interests, been overcome. Both Maine and Massachusetts, through their several commissioners furnished with full powers for the purpose, have given their final assent to the new boundary line, separating their territory from that of the adjacent British provinces, which is proposed to be established by the treaty before us.

The Committee on Foreign Relations (said Mr. RIVES) is clear in the opinion that an arrangement so sanctioned, after the numberless perplexities and impediments which have heretofore and so long obstructed a satisfactory adjustment of the question, ought not to be lightly disturbed by the action of this body. On looking into the arrangement itself, they see nothing in it incompatible with the character of a fair, just, and reasonable compromise, under all the circumstances of difficulty and embarrassment which surrounded the subject. The new boundary agreed on pursues the line recommended by the King of Netherlands, till it reaches a point on the St. Francis not very distant from its source; and thence, turning off at right angles, in a southwesterly direction, it terminates at a point in the highlands where the respective boundaries heretofore claimed by Great Britain and the United States meet—throwing on the British side of the new line a narrow strip of barren land, along the eastern base of the highlands formerly claimed by the United States, of about one hundred and ten miles in length. In consideration of this narrow strip of land conceded to Great Britain, beyond what was allotted to her by the award of the King of the Netherlands, she grants in perpetuity to the inhabitants of Maine the free navigation of the St. John, from the point where it enters her territory, to the seaport at its mouth—guarantying, in favor of the agricultural produce and lumber of Maine, the same treatment, in all respects, as if they were the productions of her own provinces. She also relinquishes and gives up forever the one hundred thousand acres of valuable land at the sources of the Connecticut, lying within the actual limits of New Hampshire; as well as the strip of land on the northern frontier of Vermont and New York—both of which were determined, by the award of the King of the Netherlands, to belong to Great Britain. And the all-important military position at Rouse's Point, commanding the outlet of Lake Champlain—which, by a special exception in the award of the King of the Netherlands, was reserved to the United States—is also, by this arrangement, forever secured to them. At the same time, in the adjustment of certain disputed boundary lines farther to the west, on which the British and American commissioners under the seventh article of the treaty of Ghent differed, it is agreed that the limits shall be so established as to throw a very large and valuable island in the water communication between Lakes Huron and Superior, called St. George's or Sugar island, (which was claimed by the British commissioner,) on the side of the United States; and also to yield to the United States an extensive district of about four millions of acres, lying on the western side of Lake Superior—of but little intrinsic value, probably, but which was, nevertheless, warmly contended for by the British commissioner under the aforesaid article of the treaty of Ghent. Many of these concessions on the part of Great Britain, enuring to the benefit of the United States in their national capacity, and being principally induced by the assent of the States of Maine and Massachusetts to the establishment of the new boundary line on the Northeastern frontier, the United States finally stipulate to pay to those two States, in equal moieties, the sum of three hundred thousand dollars, on account of their assent to the said line; and to refund the expenses incurred by them, respectively, in protecting and surveying the disputed territory.

In analyzing the details of this arrangement, it appears that seven-twelfths in quantity of the disputed territory have fallen to the share of Maine—in value, a far larger proportion. The lands allotted to Great Britain are, for the most part, barren and unproductive; deriving their chief (if not sole) importance from the more direct and convenient communication they afford between her provinces, and the greater breadth of border they give her on the St. Lawrence. These, indeed, are the essential objects she professed to have in view. On the other hand, the lands reserved to the State of Maine are, many of them, of great fertility, and all of them abound in fine timber. But their actual commercial value must depend, after all, on the facilities of a cheap transportation to convey their agricultural produce, and especially their heavy lumber, to market. Hence the free navigation of the St. John to the ocean is of vital importance to the upper parts of the State of Maine; and the stipulation to receive and treat their productions on a footing of equal favor with the produce of the colonies, enhances still farther the value of this grant. The free navigation of the St. John formed no part of the award of the King of the Netherlands; and in every practical view, therefore, the arrangement now proposed possesses marked advantages for the State of Maine over that of the award, which it is now attempted to exalt so much in the comparison. On this point, we have the highest possible evidence—the decision of the party most deeply interested—of Maine herself. It is apparent, from the correspondence before us, that Lord Ashburton was, at all times, ready to enter into an arrangement on the naked basis of the award of the King of the Netherlands, and that the commissioners of Maine were as steady and unwavering in their repugnance to it; and I am authorized explicitly to state the fact, that the three-fold option was distinctly presented to the commissioners—of the award, the arbitration, and the arrangement now before us. They deliberately elected the last; and most wisely and sagaciously, in my opinion, did they decide.

Looking at the arrangement as a national question, and as the interests of the Union at large are concerned, its advantages, in a sober and candid view of things, appear to the committee equally obvious. Will any gentleman hesitate to say that the important territorial concessions, and the quieting of contested boundaries all along the Northern frontier of the United States, from the head of Connecticut river to the western extremity of Lake Superior, including the surrender of the unquestionable British title to the ownership of by far the most important military position upon our whole frontier, (Rouse's Point,) are not cheaply purchased by the paltry sum to be paid to Maine and Massachusetts for their assent to the new boundary? Have honorable gentlemen, who find so much fault with this arrangement, forgotten that General Jackson was willing, and actually entered into an agreement, to pay to Maine and Massachusetts—not the pittance of three hundred thousand dollars—but an indemnity equivalent to a million and a quarter of dollars, if they would acquiesce in the award of the King of the Netherlands.

But it is said that the arrangement in question, by giving to Great Britain the narrow strip of wild and desolate land on the eastern side of the highlands from the head waters of the St. Francis river to the Metjarmette portage, surrenders a line of military positions, which, at the same time, command Quebec and cover the State of Maine! But for this unlucky treaty, Mr. President, these important discoveries in military topography, I venture to say, would never have been made. We have had able and scientific reports, from time to time, on the defences of our inland frontier, from boards of officers, consisting of the first professional men in America, who are well acquainted with the country in question, and all its military attributes and relations. And yet, in not one of these reports have we had the remotest hint of these commanding military positions—facing, as they do, the St. Lawrence at points below Quebec, where nothing would be gained if you were to reach it, and on the other side looking down on a sterile region and boundless forests, where armies could neither be moved nor subsisted, and would, therefore, never attempt to penetrate! I have two of these reports now before me—one made in 1838, and the other in 1840—and they both concur in the emphatic declaration, that north of the old route leading to Quebec along the Kennebec and the Chaudière—a line which the southern termination of the new boundary conceded to Great Britain does not approach nearer than within some thirty or forty miles—there is no military position along the highlands of any importance either for defence or invasion. One of these reports disposes of the whole question, by briefly declaring that "no general, who understood his profession, would invade Maine by a route destitute of forage, provisions, and the means of transportation;" and the other pithily remarks, that "isolated forts along the frontier, if you had them, would command nothing beyond the range of their own guns."* And yet the Quixotic imagination of gentlemen, by these highland windmills, would command Quebec at the distance of some fifty miles!

No, sir: Great Britain obtains nothing by the new boundary agreed upon, but a more direct and convenient communication between her upper and lower provinces, and a strip of alternate rock and morass, which simply serves to eke out, by additional space, her border along the St. Lawrence. And are these such boons that national honor or safety forbids they should be granted, for fair equivalents, to a neighboring power, in the compromise and adjustment of a disputed boundary, which has been the subject of controversy for half a century? We have always admitted that the boundary claimed by us was a most inconvenient one for Great Britain, by interrupting the communication between her provinces; and we have never been so churlish a neighbor as to insist on holding this advantage against every proposition of compromise and mutual accommodation. I cannot divest myself of the consciousness that we are the stronger power on this continent, and I am not afraid to do what the spirit of good neighborhood and manly intercourse requires, when appealed to by corresponding dispositions; and it does seem to me that, while Great Britain is freely surrendering to us an invaluable military position—her title to which, if she chose to insist on it, is above all question—(I mean Rouse's Point)—a position which is pronounced, by the first military officers in our service, (in communications now before me,) to be the great strategic point on our Northern frontier—the key, in our hands, to the Canadas; in theirs, to the heart of our own country; and, therefore, "above all price," either for attack or defence;—it would be ungracious, indeed, and unworthy alike of our honor and our strength, if we were doggedly to refuse the slightest relaxation from the rigor of our claims, even for an obvious mutual convenience.

But the Roman god Terminus, Mr. President, is invoked to animate us to stand uncompromisingly by our limits as they are, however inconvenient to others or to ourselves. The honorable gentlemen who make this invocation will pardon me for saying that they have not been very consistent worshippers of the Roman deity. Where was their holy reverence for the rites of this revived worship, three years ago, when my honorable friend, one of the Senators from Maine [Mr. WILLIAMS] introduced a bill simply to provide for a peaceable and innocent survey of our boundaries by skilful and scientific men, according to the description of limits in the treaty of peace? They then arrayed themselves in stern opposition even to this peaceable attempt to ascertain our limits, lest it might give umbrage to our neighbor. I beg leave to remind my learned and classical friends who now hold up to us the example of the Romans in the worship of the god Terminus, that the same hardy and restless people worshipped another pagan deity—Janus, the god of war—whose temple, always open in time of war, was shut, we are told, but three times during a period of more than seven hundred years. Do the patriotic gentlemen who call upon us now to imitate the example of the Romans in worshipping the litigious and impracticable divinity that presided over limits, mean to invite us also to follow them in their warlike and bloody career? and do they propose to celebrate the American Terminalia, not by libations of milk and wine, but by the effusion of blood?

To the worship of these pagan deities, Mr. President, has succeeded a purer and better religion, which teaches "peace on earth, and good will to men;" and while, for one, I would never shrink from the maintenance of the rights and honor of my country, at every hazard, when the occasion demanded, I should, from the bottom of my soul, deprecate an appeal to the arbitrament of arms, upon a mere question of disputed boundary. We live in an age when the moral sense of mankind demands that every honorable expedient for the adjustment of national disputes should be honestly tried, before the ultimate appeal is ventured upon; and I feel a strong confidence that the body of our fellow-citizens—the friends of civilization and humanity everywhere—the rest of the nations of the earth all of whom have so deep a stake in the preservation of general peace—will rejoice that, in this instance, they have not been tried in vain.

We come now (said Mr. RIVES) to that portion of the treaty which relates to the suppression of the African slave-trade. There is no nation under the sun which has shown, through her whole history, more anxiety for the extinction of this odious and revolting traffic than the United States; and none have, therefore, a deeper interest, historical and political, in the consummation of the great work in which they led the way. Not to speak of the various and repeated acts of the Legislatures of

*See the report on the defence of the frontier of Maine, communicated to Congress by the Secretary of War, on the 21st December, 1838; and, also, the report of a board of officers, on a system of national defences, communicated the 15th May, 1840.

he several States, while they were yet colonies of Great Britain, to arrest and put an end to this cruel raffic—acts rendered inoperative by what my own State (Virginia) denounced at the time to be "an nhuman use of the royal negative," and which he specially set forth among the wrongs and grievances which impelled her to the establishment f an independent Government;—not to speak of cts of this sort, with which our ante-revolution- ry history abounds,—it is sufficient to say that he Government of the Union, from the mo- nent of its establishment under the existing Con- titution, has steadily devoted itself to the ac- omplishment of the same great object. While he Christian States of Europe still tolerated, nd some of them even encouraged, this revolting ommerce, the United States, first among the na- ions of the earth, pronounced its formal condem- ation by law; and, following up this condemnation, s occasion required, with new penal sanctions, ombined with active measures of surveillance nd repression, they finally gave to the world the triking example of a crowning act of legislative nergy, by which they affixed the brand of piracy o the slave-trade, declaring that any citizen of the Jnited States found engaged in it, whether on oard an American or a foreign vessel, or any oreigner on board an American vessel, so em- loyed, "should be adjudged a pirate, and suffer eath as such."

While the United States thus set the example of heir own early and energetic legislation for the epression of this crime against humanity, it as felt that a general co-operation of the powers f Christendom, and especially of all the maritime owers, would be necessary to ensure its final and omplete extirpation. In pursuance of this policy, he United States and Great Britain, in concluding he treaty of peace at Ghent, entered into the fol- owing stipulation with each other:

"Whereas the traffic in slaves is irreconcilable with the prin- ples of humanity and justice; and whereas, both his Majesty nd the United States are desirous of continuing their efforts promote its entire abolition; it is hereby agreed that both the ntracting parties shall use their best endeavors to accom- lish so desirable an object."

A practical interpretation of the spirit of this en- agement, and a striking proof of the cordial sym- athy of the representatives of the people in the eneral object of it, was afterwards afforded in a esolution, passed by the House of Representatives, n the 10th day of February, 1823, by the nearly nanimous vote of 131 yeas to 9 nays. It was ex- ressed in the following words:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be re- uested to enter upon and prosecute from time to time such egotiations with the maritime powers of Europe and America s he may deem expedient, for the effectual abolition of the frican slave-trade, and its ultimate denunciation as piracy nder the law of nations, by consent of the civilized world."

Both of these solemn acts—the resolution of e House of Representatives in 1823, as well as the ipulation of the treaty of Ghent—clearly recog- sed the propriety and necessity of some system f combined action among the maritime powers of e world, to put an end effectually to the slave- ade. Great Britain early embraced, and has till ow perseveringly adhered to the opinion, that the utual concession of a right of search, to be exer- sed by the armed cruisers of each party over the erchant vessels of the others, is the only effectual eans of putting an end to this infamous traffic. he United States, on the other hand, unable to rget the serious wrongs they had so recently ex- erienced from the abusive exercise of the right of earch; jealous, above all things, of the immunity f their flag, and of the general freedom of the seas— e commonand equal inheritance of all nations— ave been unwilling to compromise these great terests, by entering into an arrangement in- olving so vital an innovation upon the establish- d maritime code; especially as they believed other eans were to be found no less effectual for the ecomplishment of the common object of the sup- ression of the slave-trade. Great Britain, in the ean time, succeeded in making treaties with pain, Portugal, and the Netherlands, for the mu- al right of search. And other European States aving, from time to time, come into the same ar- ngement, the United States are now the only onsiderable maritime power that has continued refuse its accession to a system which they could ot but regard as compromising, in a high degree, e general freedom of the seas. It has thus, oubtless, happened that the American flag has een, in many instances, fraudulently used to cover essels really belonging to States who are parties to the mutual grant of the right of search, from the exercise of that right; and, to prevent this evasion, the Government of Great Britain recently put forth a pretension of alarming extent, and which we have resisted, and must ever resist, as wholly unsustainable upon any just principle of public law; to wit, that her cruisers have the right to board and detain vessels sailing under the American flag, when they shall judge it proper to do so, to ascertain, by an examination of their papers, whether they are truly and bona fide American or not.

This was the state of things existing at the commencement of the present session of Congress, when the President laid before us the correspondence which had taken place on the subject of this new pretension between our Minister at London and Lord Palmerston and Lord Aberdeen, successively her Majesty's Secretaries of State for Foreign Affairs. The message of the President, referring to the same pretension, held the following emphatic and unequivocal language:

"However desirous the United States may be for the suppression of the slave-trade, they cannot consent to interpolations into the maritime code, at the mere will and pleasure of other Governments. We deny the right of any such interpolation to any one or all the nations of the earth, without our consent. We claim to have a voice in all amendments or alterations of that code; and when we are given to understand, as in this instance, by a foreign Government, that its treaties with other nations cannot be executed without the establishment and enforcement of new principles of maritime police, to be applied without our consent, we must employ a language neither of equivocal import, nor susceptible of misconstruction. American citizens, prosecuting a lawful commerce in the African seas, under the flag of their country, are not responsible for the abuse or unlawful use of that flag by others; nor can they rightfully, on account of any such alleged abuses, be interrupted, molested, or detained, while on the ocean."

Here, then, is the answer of the American Government, in the highest and most authoritative form known to its official intercourse, to the pretension advanced on the part of Great Britain, in the discussion with our late Minister at London. It is an unequivocal negation of that pretension, in principle and in practice; and leaves nothing to be done which could announce in more emphatic terms our determined resistance to it.

The vital question of the independence of our flag being thus disposed of, by the prompt, unequivocal, and final answer of the American Government to this new pretension, other considerations of an important character present themselves to view. It is shown, by the correspondence just referred to, and other incontestable proofs that the American flag has been extensively abused to cover this iniquitous traffic—sometimes by American citizens, notwithstanding the severity of our penal enactments; but more frequently by the subjects of other powers—by Spanish, Portuguese, or Brazilian slave-dealers, who assume the American colors to protect them from the right of search, to which they would be subject under their own national flags. The fact of this abuse is admitted by our Government. Mr. Stevenson, in his letter to Lord Aberdeen, says: "That the flag of the United States has been grossly abused, there is too much reason to believe and deplore." The same declaration is repeated by the President, in his message to Congress at the commencement of the present session; and in the correspondence between Lord Palmerston and Mr. Stevenson, which accompanied that message, the mortifying fact is disclosed that, of the four vessels sailing under the American flag, which had been visited and detained by British cruisers on the coast of Africa, (and which it became the duty of our minister to make the subject of representation and complaint to the British Government, on account of the violation of the flag,) every one of them turned out, upon inquiry and investigation, to be slavers, furnished with American captains and American papers; but, in reality, as there is reason to believe, Spanish property.

Seeing, then, that our flag has been shamelessly abused to cover an infamous traffic, which our laws were the first to denounce and pursue with adequate penalties—that it has been made a shelter to screen from the punishment due to their crimes the most profligate of the human race,—does not the national honor demand that we should give to the world an assurance of our determination to cleanse and preserve it from this horrible pollution? We have, upon considerations of the highest state policy, and from a jealous solicitude to maintain the freedom of the seas, refused to concede that mutual right of search which other nations have consented to yield, as an instrument for the suppression of the slave-trade. We have, with still stronger determination, and upon impregnable grounds of public law, declared our resistance to the new pretension of subjecting our flag to visitation and detention, for the alleged purpose of carrying into execution the agreements of other powers, to which we have refused to become a party. Under these circumstances, is it not due to the character of the American people, pledged by all their past history to the great cause of the final suppression of the African slave-trade, that, while rejecting the plans proposed by other Governments for this object, we should come forward with one of our own, which will afford a complete guaranty against the prostitution to which we have seen our flag so vilely exposed, and which will, at the same time, bring the most efficient means to the general extirpation of this odious traffic, without intrenching on the liberty of the seas and the established principles of maritime law?

Considerations and sentiments such as these, doubtless suggested the arrangement contained in the treaty. By that arrangement, it is stipulated that the two powers shall each maintain a squadron of not less than eighty guns on the coast of Africa, to enforce, separately and respectively, the laws and obligations of each country for the suppression of the slave-trade: the two squadrons to be perfectly independent of each other; but, at the same time, to act in concert and co-operation for the attainment of the common object, under such orders as shall, from time to time, be given by their respective Governments. And it is farther stipulated, that the two parties will unite in all becoming representations and remonstrances to any power within whose dominions markets for the purchase of African slaves may be still allowed to exist, to close such markets at once and forever. In virtue of this arrangement, (which is limited to five years, if either party shall wish then to terminate it,) each power will, separately and independently, exercise the necessary supervision and police over all vessels sailing under its own flag; neither being permitted to visit or search the vessels of the other; but the presence of the two squadrons, always on the alert, and acting in friendly concert, will afford, by their vigilant oversight, complete security against the use of the flag of either power to cover the prohibited traffic, and will, at the same time, give protection to the merchant vessels of each, when necessary, from all unlawful interruption or molestation.*

This arrangement is adapted to meet every exigency of the case, and reconciles the most vigorous measures for the suppression of the slave-trade with a sacred regard for the independence and immunity of the national flag. It vindicates from all suspicion the sincerity of the United States; which their persevering and solitary opposition, for a long time, to the mutual concession of the right of search, for the more effective pursuit and detection of the traffic, exposed to injurious doubts and misconstruction. At the same time, it has the merit of a strict fidelity to American principles. It is, indeed, the identical plan which, when Lord Castlereagh was so earnestly insisting on a mutual right of search as the only effectual means for the suppression of the slave-trade, President Monroe caused to be presented, as the American contre-projet—which, however, did not prevent his Lordship from recurring to, and urgently pressing, again and again, his favorite right of search. The proposition referred to was developed in a letter from the Secretary of State

* In the speech of Mr. Benton on the British treaty, recently published, he claims great credit to Mr. Van Buren's administration for having rejected, as contrary to the principles and policy of this Government, an agreement of co-operation for the suppression of the slave-trade, which, he says, was similar to that contained in the treaty. Mr. Benton's allusion, it seems, is to a letter of Mr. Paulding, Secretary of the Navy, to Lieut. Paine, commanding the United States schooner Grampus; in which the Secretary disapproved an arrangement entered into by that officer with the commander of a British cruiser on the coast of Africa, by which "Lieut. Paine delegated to the British commander the right to seize and detain, under certain circumstances, vessels sailing under American colors." Now, it was this "delegation of power to seize and detain vessels under American colors," which Mr. Paulding declared was "unauthorized by instructions, and contrary to the established and well-known principles and policy of the American Government." But Mr. Benton surely will not say that the arrangement made in the treaty delegates to British cruisers the right to seize and detain vessels sailing under American colors. It is precisely the contrary; for the treaty expressly declares that the two squadrons are to enforce, separately and respectively, the laws of each country for the suppression of the slave-trade, and that they are to be independent of each other. The same letter of Mr. Paulding, however, enjoins "a friendly co operation with the British cruisers in the suppression of the slave-trade;" and expressly authorizes Lieut. Paine "to cruise in company and co operation with any British vessel of war employed on the slave coast"—which is precisely what is done (neither less nor more) by the treaty arrangement so much denounced by Mr. Benton!

to the Hon. Stratford Canning, dated the 30th of December, 1820:

"But, while regretting that the character of the organized means of co-operation for the suppression of the African slave-trade, proposed by Great Britain, did not admit of our concurrence in the adoption of them, the President has been far from the disposition to reject or discountenance the general proposition of concerted co-operation with Great Britain, to the accomplishment of the common end—the suppression of the trade. For this purpose, armed cruisers of the United States have been for some time kept stationed on the coast which is the scene of this odious traffic—a measure which it is in the contemplation of this Government to continue, without intermission. As there are armed British vessels, charged with the same duty, constantly kept cruising on the same coast, I am directed by the President to propose that instructions, to be concerted between the two Governments, with a view to mutual assistance, should be given to the commanders of the vessels respectively assigned to that service; that they may be ordered, whenever the occasion may render it convenient, to cruise in company together, to communicate mutually to each other all information obtained by the one, and which may be useful to the execution of the duties of the other; and to give each other every assistance which may be compatible with the performance of their own service, and adapted to the end which is the common aim of both parties."*

An apprehension has been expressed, Mr. President, that this arrangement will carry with it disappointment to our ancient ally and friend, France—who, by withholding her ratification from the quintuple treaty, has placed herself upon common ground with us, in regard to the great question of the freedom of the sea; and that it may tend to weaken the position so gallantly assumed, on the same occasion, by our able and patriotic minister at Paris. Neither consequence, I am persuaded, can possibly arise. France will see with satisfaction, on the one hand, that Great Britain has acceded to a scheme of maritime co-operation for the suppression of the slave-trade, involving no right of search; and, on the other, that the United States, while maintaining intact the independence of their flag, have agreed to devote an efficient portion of their naval power to the common cause of extirpating a traffic which has become the horror of the civilized world. She will see, in the principles on which this arrangement is founded, the very doctrines heretofore asserted by her most distinguished statesmen—by Talleyrand, in 1814; by the Duc de Richelieu, in 1818; and by Chateaubriand, in 1822: and in the arrangement itself she will see an exact reflection of the contre-projet which she caused to be presented to the Congress of Aix la Chapelle, as a substitute for the British proposition of a reciprocal right of search. In regard to our distinguished representative at the court of France, the conclusion of this arrangement will serve only to crown his useful and efficient services; and the ratification of the quintuple treaty—which, by his timely and well-directed efforts, he has contributed thus far to avert—must henceforward be considered as definitively withheld. No person honors more than I do the true-hearted instincts of American patriotism, as well as the sagacious views and lofty spirit, which have directed our able minister, at so important a juncture. He has entitled himself to, and will undoubtedly receive, the warmest thanks of his country.

The incidental advantages attending this arrangement, in the support and protection which the presence of an American squadron will give to our growing commerce on the coast of Africa—a commerce susceptible of the most beneficial developments, through the civilized colonial settlements already established there—constitute an important additional recommendation of it. This consideration early attracted the attention of the proper department; and we see, from the report of the Secretary of the Navy at the commencement of the session, that he proposed to enlarge materially the number of vessels employed on the African station, as well in reference to this object, as for the suppression of the slave-trade. The extent of the squadron stipulated to be maintained there, is probably not greater than the Secretary would have deemed expedient in any event; and the expense will be amply repaid in resulting benefits to the commerce of the country.

The last stipulation in the treaty which remains to be noticed, is that by which the parties agree mutually to surrender fugitives from justice, in certain cases. An arrangement of this sort between neighboring States, whose territories border on each other through an extended boundary—presenting to offenders great facilities of escape from one jurisdiction into the other—seems to be urgently demanded by the interests of peace, law, and social order. So just and proper is it in itself, that some writers of high authority on the law of nations have regarded it as a matter of absolute obligation, independently of treaty stipulations. The modern and better opinion, however, (considering how diversified, and often arbitrary, is the penal legislation of different countries,) is, that there is no obligation to surrender fugitives from the criminal justice of one country taking refuge in another, but in virtue of positive and precise compact. The want of some conventional arrangement of this sort between the United States and Great Britain has been particularly felt in the States of the Union adjacent to the Canadas and other British possessions on the continent, where the prospect of the easy impunity gained by passing from one side to the other of the boundary line has been found to operate as a great temptation and encouragement to crime. Several of those States have manifested an earnest desire for such a reciprocal arrangement between the two Governments. The stipulation in the treaty, it will be seen, is confined exclusively to crimes of an aggravated character against life or property—such as murder, robbery, piracy, and some two or three other enumerated offences, carefully pretermitting all political offences; and lest some unforeseen abuse or inconvenience should arise in the practical administration of the agreement, the right is reserved to either party to terminate it at will.

This article closes the circle of matters embraced by the treaty. There are other questions, of much interest to both countries, which have formed the subject of an important correspondence between the Secretary of State and the special minister of Great Britain. This correspondence has been laid before the Senate with the treaty, and must necessarily enter into their consideration in disposing of the treaty itself. It has, therefore, attracted the careful attention of the committee; and they have seen, with pleasure, that there has been an amicable and honorable understanding, or an important advance to such an understanding ultimately, on each of the questions which formed the topic of that correspondence.

The first of those questions that present themselves to view, is the affair of the steamboat Caroline, captured and destroyed, some years ago, within the territorial limits of the United States, and forming part of the arrears of an unsettled diplomatic account which the present Administration inherited from the last. It is no part of my purpose (said Mr. R.) to cast censure unnecessarily anywhere, or to enter into a partisan discussion of any of the questions which now come before us for a grave and calm deliberation. But, as gentlemen have seen fit to indulge in very unsparing denunciations of the course pursued by those now in power, in regard to this affair, and have given the reins to their imaginations in the most boundless and gratuitous praises of the course of the late Administration on the same subject, it becomes indispensable to a just understanding of the question, to restate facts in the nakedness of their historical truth.

The seizure and destruction of the Caroline occurred at Schlosser, on the Niagara frontier, in December, 183-; being the first year of Mr. Van Buren's administration. It led to a brief correspondence between Mr. Forsyth and Mr. Fox, at Washington; and Mr. Stevenson, our minister at London, was instructed to make a formal representation to the British Government on the subject, and to demand redress. This representation was made by Mr. Stevenson, in a note to Lord Palmerston dated the 22d of May, 1838. His note remaining without any other answer than a mere acknowledgment of its receipt for more than twelve months, Mr. Stevenson, very properly, wrote to Mr. Forsyth in July, 1839, stating that he "regretted to say no answer had yet been given to his note in the case of the Caroline," and desiring to know "if it was the wish of the Government that he should press the subject again; and, if so, with what degree of urgency." In answer to this communication, Mr. Forsyth, in September, 1839, replied, that no instructions were then required for again bringing forward the question of the Caroline; that he had had frequent conversations with Mr. Fox in regard to the subject—one of very recent date; and "from its tone, the President expects the British Government will answer your [Mr. Stevenson's] application in the case without much farther delay." But, in point of fact, the President's expectation was not fulfilled; the British Government gave no answer to Mr. Stevenson's "application in the case;" and so the matter stood—the formal representation made by Mr. Stevenson remaining wholly unnoticed by the British Government for eighteen months longer, and down to the close of Mr. Van Buren's administration! For three long years Mr. Van Buren patiently acquiesced in this silence, and slept over an outrage which gentlemen—his friends and eulogists on this floor—would persuade us, in the lofty flights of their chivalry and eloquence, they burned to avenge by an instant recourse to arms.

What advantage has been naturally taken of this most extraordinary acquiesence of the last administration, to embarrass any renewed demand for redress, is strikingly shown in the following passage of a note addressed by Lord Palmerston to Mr. Stevenson on the 2d of September last, which is now before me:

"It appears, then, that, for nearly three years, the United States Government acquiesced in the silence of her Majesty's Government on this subject; for though in September, 1839, Mr. Forsyth stated, as a reason for not pressing her Majesty's Government for an answer, that the President had been led by some conversation of Mr. Fox, to expect the British answer without any further delay, yet that reason necessarily ceased with the further lapse of time, and could not be said to have held good as long as till the beginning of 1840. Mr. Stevenson, moreover, specifically states, in his note of the 21st ultimo, that, during the whole interval between the date of his note of May, 1838, and the time when the arrest of McLeod became known in England, in February, 1841, no communication ever took place between himself and the undersigned on the subject of the Caroline. Now, as neither Mr. Stevenson, nor the late President Van Buren, have ever shown themselves deficient in watchful and active attention to all matters in which the just rights of the United States are concerned, the undersigned considers that he has not much erred in supposing, as stated in his former communication, that this long and intentional silence of the United States Government, and of its minister at this court, upon the subject of the Caroline, arose from the considerations to which the undersigned adverted in that note."

The considerations adverted to in his Lordship's former note, as expressed by himself, were, that the President was "perfectly aware" that the British Government considered the destruction of the Caroline a justifiable act of self-defence, done by order of her Majesty's colonial authorities; that both what her Majesty's Government had done, and what they had abstained from doing, "could leave no doubt on the mind of the President" that the British Government intended to decline to comply with the demand contained in Mr. Stevenson's note; and that the presumption, therefore, was, that the President, in not pressing for an answer, was actuated by the consideration that it was better to leave the refusal of the British Government to be inferred from its silence, than to have it formally communicated in answer to an explicit demand of the United States.

However this may be, (and I do not mean, said Mr. R., to enter into the merits of the diplomatic digladiation which took place on the occasion between Lord Palmerston and Mr. Stevenson,) nothing is clearer than that President Van Buren cannot claim the benefit of the plea which is now set up for him—to wit: that, during the period of his administration, the destruction of the Caroline presented itself to him, for aught that appeared to the contrary, as the mere "act of individuals."*

So far is this from being the case, that his own minister plenipotentiary, in the note addressed by him to Lord Palmerston in May, 1838, "in obedience to instructions," expressly presented the outrage for which he was directed to demand redress, as one "committed by British troops from the province of Upper Canada," "forming a portion of the British force at Chippewa," and "planned and executed, with the knowledge and approbation of the Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada." Whatever other reasons, then, Mr. Van Buren may have had for his extraordinary and patient acquiescence in the long-continued omission of the British Government to return any answer to our demand of reparation in the case of the Caroline, he cannot take the benefit of an after-thought, in contradiction with his own deliberate official act.

He may have thought, perhaps, that, in a case where the justification of the British Government rested on a question of fact as to the degree and urgency of that necessity of self-defence under which their authorities professed to have acted, and in relation to which the testimony and statements relied on by the respective Governments were directly at variance, prudence and a proper regard for the peace of the two countries forbade that their relations should be brought to extremity on a point of dubious and debatable evidence, where, amid the conflict of opposing statements, it was difficult to ascertain the truth. But, considering the gravity of the occurrence, and the danger of its being drawn into precedent by a powerful and haughty neighbor, he owed it to the character of the country, adjourning every subordinate question of evidence, to insist at once upon a prompt disavowal of any intentional disrespect of the national sovereignty, accompanied with an explicit acknowledgment of those sacred principles of the public law which guard the inviolability of territory, and upon the scrupulous observance of which the peace and dignity of nations so vitally depend.

Nothing of this sort, however, was done. The question was permitted to slumber in the most profound neglect during the whole period of Mr. Van Buren's presidency; and those now in power have had to assert the national dignity and honor, under all the disadvantages arising from the long acquiescence and virtual dereliction of the last Administration. The correspondence submitted to us shows in what manner, and upon what principles, this controversy, so long the source of mutual irritation and heartburning between the two countries, has been at length honorably terminated. The British minister gives his adhesion, in the most explicit and unequivocal terms, to all the principles of public law, which we have laid down as applicable to the case. He declares, that "respect for the inviolable character of the territory of independent nations is the most essential foundation of civilization;" and that, in addition to a sense of moral responsibility, the most obvious dictates of policy and interest would lead Great Britain to an observance of this duty, "in the case of a long conterminous boundary of some thousand miles, with a country of such great and growing power as the United States of America, inhabited by a kindred race, gifted with all its activity, and all its susceptibility on points of national honor;" that while every consideration leads the British Government to set as high a value as the Government of the United States can possibly do "on this paramount obligation of reciprocal respect for the independent territory of each," it is yet admitted, by all writers on public law, and by the occasional practice of all nations, (our own among the number) that a strong overpowering necessity may arise, when this great principle may and must be momentarily suspended; but "it must be so for the shortest possible period, during the continuance of an admitted overruling necessity, and strictly confined within the narrowest limits imposed by that necessity."

Thus far, there is a perfect and satisfactory accordance between the views of the Government of the United States and those of the British Government, as represented by Lord Ashburton, both as to the general principle, and the narrow and limited exception to it. The exception, within the limits so astringently stated by Lord Ashburton, is admitted both by Mr. Stevenson, in his note to Lord Palmerston in May, 1838, and by Mr. Webster, in his note to Mr. Fox, in April, 1841; and upon it, indeed, rests the vindication of some important transactions in our own military history, which are too deeply engraven on the recollection of the country to make it necessary for me to recall them to the Senate. Mr. Stevenson defines the necessity which is admitted to constitute an exception to the general inviolability of neutral territory, to be "imminent and extreme, and involving impending destruction." Mr. Webster, with no less force, describes it to be "a necessity of self-defence, instant, overwhelming, leaving no choice of means, and no moment for deliberation." Lord Ashburton, distinctly assenting to the limits thus cautiously placed upon the admitted exception, seeks, by a recurrence to the circumstances of the case, to show that the steamboat Caroline, being the means and instrument by which "accessions of men, arms and munitions of war were hourly" brought from the American shore to the position of the hostile and invading force on Navy Island, the necessity for her capture and destruction was of that imperious and overruling character, which brought the act fairly within the limits of the exception, as defined by the Government of the United States.

Still there was in the case, whatever may have been the supposed necessity for it, (as Lord Ashburton remarks, with that just sense of what belongs to the honor and dignity of both Governments, which characterizes all the communications of this able and judicious minister,) the grave fact of "a violation of territory," which he is "instructed by her Majesty's Government to assure the Government of the United States is considered by it as a most serious fact;" and that, "far from thinking an event of this kind should be lightly risked, they would unfeignedly deprecate its recurrence;" that it is to be "regretted that an explanation and apology for the occurrence was not immediately made;" that he can "most solemnly affirm that no disrespect to the sovereign authority of the United States was intended;" and that "he repeats the assurance of regret her Majesty's Government feel that the event should have disturbed the harmony they so anxiously wish to maintain with the American people and Government." After the "explanations and assurances" thus cordially given, he concludes his letter to the Secretary of State, by expressing the hope that "all feelings of resentment and ill-will, resulting from these truly unfortunate events, may be buried in oblivion; and that they may be succeeded by those of harmony and friendship, which it is certainly the interest, and, he also believes, the inclination of all to promote."

If gentlemen can see nothing in frank and honorable explanations such as these, proceeding from the representative of an "old and haughty nation, proud in arms," to satisfy the just sentiment of national pride and dignity, in regard to a transaction long past, over which our own Government had slept with quiet indifference for years, and where there is a perfect concurrence of both Governments in the great conservative principles which must guard and secure the immunity of their respective territories, (differing only as to a debatable question of fact in the particular case,) I can only say, that their moral temperaments are constituted very differently from my own.

The next subject treated in the correspondence between her Britannic Majesty's special minister and the Secretary of State, is one of peculiar delicacy, as well as importance;—the interference of the British colonial authorities with American vessels having slaves on board, the property of American citizens under the laws of their respective States, and driven by stress of weather, or other uncontrollable causes, into the British West Indies, while passing from one port to another of the Union. The first cases of this sort which occurred, were of three vessels whose names have unfortunately become familiar as "household words" in our diplomatic history—the Comet, the Encomium, and the Enterprise. The two first named of these vessels were wrecked on the Bahama islands in 1831 and 1834, and the third was driven by stress of weather into a port of the island of Bermuda in 1835. In each of these cases, the slaves on board were liberated by the interference of the colonial authorities, and were finally lost to their owners. On all these occasions, strong representations were addressed by the Government of the United States to that of Great Britain, complaining of the improper and unlawful interference of the local authorities of the islands, and demanding indemnity to the owners of the liberated slaves. The British Government, in 1837, finally agreed to render compensation to the owners of the slaves in the cases of the Comet and the Encomium, but absolutely refused it in the case of the Enterprise. The ground on which this discrimination was made, was—that, at the time of the disasters to the Comet and the Encomium, the state of slavery still existed in the British colonies, and the rights of American slave-owners might, therefore, be recognised under British law; but, at the period when the Enterprise was driven by stress of weather into Port Hamilton, the act of the British Parliament for the "abolition of slavery throughout the colonies" had taken effect, and thenceforward there could be, lawfully, no property in slaves in any part of the British dominions. Lord Palmerston, in announcing to Mr. Stevenson, by his note of 7th January, 1837, the final decision of the British Government on the case of the Enterprise, added, that "slavery being now abolished throughout the British empire, there can be no well-founded claim on the part of any foreigner, in respect of slaves who, under any circumstances, may come into the British colonies, any more than there would be in respect to slaves who might come into the United Kingdom;" and this declaration he emphatically repeated in a subsequent note to Mr. Stevenson of the 11th December, 1837.

Upon the important question of public law involved in this decision of the British Government, a long and earnest discussion took place between the two Governments; but terminating, as it began, in a wide and irreconcilable difference of principle, the American minister at London was instructed to propose to the British Government a conventional arrangement, by which, in practice, the officious and exciting interference of the local authorities of the British islands with American vessels having slaves on board, when driven into their waters by casualties of the sea, might be prevented. This arrangement was, also, very summarily declined by the British Government, as will be seen by Lord Palmerston's note to Mr. Stevenson, of the 30th of September, 1838. And thus the matter stood down to the close of Mr. Van Buren's administration. The recent cases of the "Creole" and the "Hermosa"—one of them marked by incidents of a most revolting character—have added fresh proofs of the necessity of some understanding between the two Governments on this delicate subject, in order to preserve the relations of peace and good neighborhood; and the correspondence which is laid before us has taken place with a view to effect such an understanding, on the basis of a just interpretation of the law and comity of nations.

The Government of the United States contends that, under the modern practice and comity of civilized states, the merchant-vessels of a nation—considered always as a part of its territory, while on the high seas, and subject exclusively to the laws and sovereignty of their own country on the ocean—retain their national jurisdiction and immunity, to many purposes, in the ports of a foreign power, even when they enter those ports voluntarily. But when they are forced, by stress of weather, or unlawful violence, against the will of the master, into a foreign port, they are to be considered, in justice, as if they were still upon the high seas, and, during the existence of such involuntary emergency, virtually under the jurisdiction of their own country, by whose laws the condition and relations of all persons and things on board are to be governed; and any interference by the local authorities of the foreign port, in such a case, to change that condition, or to disturb those relations, is a proceeding contrary to the law and comity of nations. These principles are enforced and illustrated with great copiousness and ability by the Secretary of State, in his letter to Lord Ashburton; and proceeding to apply them to the case of slaves on board of American vessels forced by stress of weather, or other causes, into British ports, he says:

"The usual mode of stating the rule of English law is, that no sooner does a slave reach the shore of England than he is free. This is true; but it means no more than that, when a slave comes within the exclusive jurisdiction of England, he ceases to be a slave, because the law of England positively and notoriously prohibits and forbids the existence of such a relation between man and man. But it does not mean that English authorities, with this rule of English law in their hands, may enter where the jurisdiction of another nation is acknowledged to exist, and there destroy rights, obligations, and interests, lawfully existing under the authority of such other nation. No such construction, and no such effect, can be rightfully given to the British law."

He then adds:

"If, therefore, vessels of the United States, pursuing lawful voyages from port to port, along their own shore, are driven by stress of weather, or carried by unlawful violence, into English ports, the Government of the United States cannot consent that the local authorities in those ports shall take advantage of such misfortunes, and enter them for the purpose of interfering with the condition of persons or things on board, as established by their own laws. If slaves, the property of citizens of the United States, escape into the British territories, it is not expected that they will be restored. In that case, the territorial jurisdiction of England will have become exclusive over them, and must decide their condition. But slaves on board of American vessels lying in British waters, are not within the exclusive jurisdiction of England, or under the exclusive operation of English law; and this founds the broad distinction between the cases." "In the opinion of the Government of the United States, such vessels, so driven and so detained by necessity in a friendly port, ought to be regarded as still pursuing their original voyage, and turned out of their direct course only by disaster, or by wrongful violence; that they ought to receive all assistance necessary to enable them to resume that direct course; and that interference and molestation by the local authorities, where the whole voyage is lawful, both in fact and intent, is ground for just and grave complaint."

Lord Ashburton, in his answer to Mr. Webster's note, begins by remarking that, "having left England before the case of the Creole had been brought to the notice of his Government by the American minister, he had not been empowered to enter into a formal stipulation" with respect to the class of cases to which it belongs; but that he felt all the importance of the subject, and the desirableness of falling upon some means for the prevention, in future, of such occurrences. "Upon the great general principles affecting the case," he says, "we do not differ." And again he observes: "At the same time that we maintain our own laws within our own territories, we are bound to respect those of our neighbors, and to listen to every possible suggestion of means of averting from them every annoyance and injury. I have great confidence that this may be effectually done in the present instance; but the case to be met and remedied is new, and must not be too hastily dealt with. You may, however, be assured that measures so important for the preservation of friendly intercourse between the two countries shall not be neglected."

"In the mean time," he says, "I can engage that instructions shall be given to the governors of her Majesty's colonies on the southern borders of the United States to execute their own laws with careful attention to the wish of their Government to maintain good neighborhood; and that there shall be no officious interference with American vessels driven by accident or by violence into those ports. The laws and duties of hospitality shall be executed; and these seem neither to require nor to justify any further inquisition into the state of persons or things on board of vessels so situated, than may be indispensable to enforce the observance of the municipal law of the colony, and the proper regulation of its harbors and waters."

These declarations and engagements, in their spirit and obvious import, go far towards giving us the practical security we have so long sought; and wanting only the formality of a treaty stipulation, present, in the plighted faith of an accredited public minister, acting with the approbation and authority of his Government, a guaranty which all great nations regard as no less sacred and obligatory. Who that looks back upon the state of this question, as it was left four years ago by the repeated, peremptory, and unceremonious repulses, which Mr. Van Buren's administration met with from Lord Palmerston on every branch of the subject, can fail to recognise the important advance which a spirit of justice and conciliation, wisely consulting the interests of peace and good neighborhood, has now made towards the ultimate removal of one great cause of irritation and complaint in the relations of the two countries?

The last subject treated of in the correspondence which has been laid before us, is the great and vital question of impressment. Nothing, through a large portion of our history, had exercised so embittering and disturbing an influence on the relations of England and America as the ancient, and, we may trust, now obsolete pretension of impressing British seamen (and, under that name, in very many instances, our own citizens) from on board the merchant vessels of the United States. It was fitting, therefore, in seeking to establish the peace of the two countries on durable foundations, by the adjustment of so many questions of present interest, to anticipate the consequences which would inevitably attend the revival of a pretension so revolting to the national sensibilities, in the event of another European war; and to declare, frankly and beforehand, to the British Government, that it was a practice which would henceforward never be submitted to, but would be promptly resisted at every hazard, if it should be attempted to be renewed. This declaration, at the moment of terminating a negotiation which, it was hoped, would consolidate a permanent good understanding between the two countries, was due to the spirit of frankness and manly dealing, and called for by the true interests of peace. It was to be made, as the Secretary of State remarks in his letter to Lord Ashburton, "not to revive useless recollections, or to stir the embers from fires which have been, in a great degree, smothered by many years of peace; but to extinguish those fires effectually, before new incidents arose to fan them into flame."

The Secretary of State, therefore, addressed a note to Lord Ashburton, in which he reviews and analyses with great clearness the grounds on which the British doctrine of impressment rests; and, after demonstrating with conclusive and irresistible force that it has no foundation whatever in any principle of the common and recognised law of nations, however countenanced by the municipal code of England, he proceeds to declare that the Government of the United States, after the most mature deliberation on the subject, "is prepared to say that the practice of impressing seamen from American vessels cannot hereafter be allowed to take place;" that "it is founded on principles which the United States do not recognise, and is invariably attended by consequences so unjust, so injurious, and of such formidable magnitude, as cannot be submitted to;" that the rule laid down by Mr. Jefferson, when Secretary of State, in the origin of the discussions between the two Governments on this subject —to wit: that "the vessel being American, shall be evidence that the seamen on board are such"—will hereafter be inflexibly maintained by this Government; and that, "in every regularly documented American merchant vessel, the crew who navigate it will find their protection in the flag which is over them." Here, at least, is a declaration worthy the character of a Government conscious both of its rights, and of its power to maintain them, and which will find an echo in every American bosom.

Lord Ashburton, in acknowledging the receipt of Mr. Webster's note, recognises the propriety, in a season of peace, of anticipating and guarding against "even possible causes of future disagreement," especially in relation to "so grave a subject of past irritation" as that of impressment; and although without authority to enter upon its "settlement" during the limited continuance of his mission, he entertains a confident hope that the task may be accomplished, when undertaken with a spirit of candor and conciliation. After adverting to the "opposite principles maintained by the two countries respecting allegiance to the sovereign," he admits that a "serious practical question does arise, or rather has existed, from practices formerly attending the mode of manning the British navy, in times of war;" that those practices were attended "with injuries of an extent and importance so formidable" as to call for a "remedy;" and that he has "much reason to hope that a satisfactory arrangement may be made, so as to set at rest all apprehension and anxiety."

Now, sir, I must say that, considering the marked contrast between the matter as well as the tone of Lord Ashburton's note, and the manner in which every allusion to the subject of impressment has heretofore been invariably met by the British Government, I cannot but regard it as a wise and honorable abandonment of this odious pretension, under the influence of a more calm and enlightened public opinion, and the progress which sounder principles of public law have happily made in the world since the return of general peace.

It is true that Lord Ashburton says that the "laws of Great Britain have maintained, from all time, the doctrine of perpetual allegiance;" and that, in virtue of these laws, "all subjects of the Crown are, in case of necessity, bound to serve their country; and the sea-faring man is natually taken for the naval service." Now, to all this, as matter of English law and English prerogative, we take no exception. But we say that the execution of English law must be confined to English jurisdiction; that, if Great Britain chooses to enforce this alleged obligation of perpetual allegiance against her natural-born subjects, who are sea-faring men, she may do so, for aught we have to say, by impressing them while they are within the limits of English territory, and on board of English ships; but that, if she attempts to do so from on board the ships of other nations, she trespasses beyond her jurisdiction, and violates the law of nations. It is to be remarked that Lord Ashburton, keeping this distinction clearly in view, while asserting the right of the Crown to the services of its natural-born subjects as a doctrine of the English law, nowhere sets upa claim to enforce that service on board the vessels of a foreign power—which is the gist of the whole controversy.

How different was the language of Lord Castlereagh, when, shortly after the commencement of the late war with Great Britain, the Government of the United States, anxious to arrest the farther calamities of the conflict, authorized a proposition to be made, through Mr. Russell, to the British Government, assenting to a suspension of hostilities on the condition of a repeal of the orders in council, and that instructions should be immediately given to discontinue the impressment of persons from American vessels, and to restore the citizens of the United States already impressed; with the understanding that, in that case, a law would be passed by Congress to prohibit the employment of British seamen in the commercial or public service of the United States. Lord Castlereagh, in his answer to the proposition of Mr. Russell, thus nakedly and imperiously asserts the British claim of impressment:

"I cannot refrain from expressing my surprise that, as a condition preliminary even to a suspension of hostilities, the Government of the United States should have thought fit to demand that the British Government should desist from its ancient and accustomed practice of impressing British seamen from the merchan tships of a foreign State, simply on the assurance that a law shall hereafter be passed to prohibit the employment of British seamen in the public or commercial service of that State."

In the same spirit, when the American commissioners at Ghent, in their projet of a treaty, offered an article proposing only a suspension of the practice of impressment for a limited time—accompanied, too, with a stipulation on our part to exclude British seamen from our naval and commercial service, and also to surrender deserters from their ships—the British commissioners dashed their pen through the article, simply writing the word "inadmissible" against it.

When, instead of all this, we see an experienced and able British statesman, charged with the views of his Government, frankly admitting the evils and injuries attending this practice, refraining from any attempt to justify it on grounds of international law, and expressing a confident belief that the subject may be satisfactorily adjusted,—and this in answer to a formal representation from the American Government, remonstrating against the pretension as utterly indefensible in principle, and intolerable in practice, and calling for its total renunciation,—does so marked a change of tone, under such circumstances, admit of any reasonable interpretation, but that the English nation and Government, under the influence of the moral and enlightened code which now controls the intercourse of nations, are prepared to abandon a claim which can find no countenance or support in the principles of that code.*

Whether, then, we look to the character of the treaty stipulations which have been entered into, or to the results of the correspondence between the representatives of the two Governments, every sound view of the interests and honor of the country equally demands the acceptance and ratification of the treaty. It is earnestly objected to the ratification, that there has been no adjustment of our limits west of the Rocky mountains. Most certainly it was greatly to be desired that our important territorial rights in that region should have been definitively established. But, if it was found impracticable to come to an agreement on this subject at present, (as the President informs us it was,) ought that to have been made a reason for declining an adjustment of so many other important interests where an agreement was practicable and on whose immediate adjustment the harmony, and probably the peace, of two great nations was at stake. The question of our Oregon territory, deeply interesting as it undoubtedly is, is not likely to suffer by waiting for a brief season; and, in the meanwhile, the adjustment of other subjects of controversy will enable us to give a more undivided attention to it, and to bring all our vigilance and resources to bear upon it. And here, sir, I must be permitted to protest against this great question being treated as peculiarly a Western interest. It has the broadest possible national relations, addressing itself to the pride and the interests of every portion of the Union; and, for one, I beg leave to say I shall be found as impracticable, if I should have any voice in the matter, in yielding one "jot or tittle" of our just rights in regard to it, as any representative of Western interests on this floor. It is henceforward the sole unsettled point in our immense boundary stretching from sea to sea, which, till now, presented so many distracting

*The following extract from the London Times, an enlightened and influential organ of public opinion in England, and especially of the party now in power, published in October last, (subsequently to the appearance of the correspondence between Mr. Webster and Lord Ashburton,) fully sustains Mr. Rives's in reference from Lord Ashburton's note:

"Mr. Webster is certainly right in contending that the evils of the system of impressment, as practised by this country in former years, are greatly enhanced when it is attempted to enforce its operations beyond the natural limits of the territory and jurisdiction of England and its dependencies. Except as a belligerent right, nothing can be said in defence of it; and even as a belligerent right, it is altogether different from the practice of visiting neutral ships in search of the enemy's property. That right is a part of the law of nations; it is a necessary part of maritime warfare; and, in spite of occasional protests against it, it has been asserted and exercised by all great maritime States, and by none more than by the French themselves, in the best days of their naval renown. But, although a neutral exposes himself to risk by taking the enemy's goods on board, and becomes pro tanto an enemy, the circumstance of the voluntary presence of certain English sailors on board an American merchant ship is a very questionable ground for exercising a quasi-hostile power in that vessel. For, be the municipal law of England what it may, in relation to a neutral vessel, a British officer has no claim to act under any other law than that which is recognised by the world, or conceded by special treaty.

"There is, we believe, a very strong probability that, in the event of a war, no instructions for the impressment of British seamen found in American merchant vessels will be issued to our cruisers. The right is doubtful; the exercise of such a practice certain; nor can it be necessary for the British navy to recruit its forces by such means. It might, therefore, be possible to accede to a declaration to this effect, and to renounce a practice which it is not intended to enforce."

points of controversy; and we shall be the better able, in future, to concentrate the national solicitude and guardianship upon it.

I am sensible, Mr. President, what deep-rooted prejudices there are in some minds, surviving (unconsciously, perhaps) our former national conflicts, which oppose any settlement, however just and honorable, of our difficulties with England. But I appeal to Senators if this is an occasion on which antipathies of that sort should be either indulged or invoked. Whatever cause we may have had, in former periods of our history, to complain of the haughtiness and injustice of England, in the present instance, at least, she has shown nothing but a spirit of conciliation and peace. I profess to be not altogether unread in the history of our eventful relations with that great power; and I take upon myself to say, that never before (with the single exception of the short administration of Mr. Fox, in 1806) has her Government evinced so sincere a desire to establish and cement cordial and friendly relations with this country. Is it either for our interest or our honor to repel such dispositions?

I know the just weight and authority which the opinions of Mr. Jefferson on subjects of national policy have with many gentlemen on this floor. They will pardon me, therefore, if I call their attention to some remarks of his, which, both for their spirit and their wisdom, seem to me full of instructive application to the present occasion. Writing to Mr. Monroe in 1806, (then our minister in London,) and congratulating him on the prospect of a just settlement of our differences with England, which the known dispositions of Mr. Fox, who had just acceded to power, afforded, he says:

"No two countries upon earth have so many points of common interest and friendship; and their rulers must be bunglers indeed, if, with such dispositions, they break them asunder. The only rivalry that can arise is on the ocean. If she is just to us, conciliatory, and encourages the sentiment of family feeling and conduct, it cannot fail to befriend the security of both."

Shall we prove ourselves something worse than the bunglers which Mr. Jefferson describes, by rashly setting aside a delicate and laborious adjustment of long-standing differences, which the just and conciliatory sentiments he invokes alone rendered possible; and thus embroil anew two powers who were but yesterday on the brink of a rupture, which must have involved the peace of the world with their own? Whatever the violence of party feeling may suggest, the sober judgment of mankind will pronounce the arrangement which has, through so many difficulties, been at last effected, a happy and providential event—above a mere achievement of diplomacy; and, hailing it as the pledge of honorable peace, and of all the high interests of civilization and improvement connected with it, will hold to no light responsibility any, on either side of the Atlantic, who, by rudely rejecting it, from passion or caprice, would commit us again to the excitements and the hazards of a renewed and exacerbated controversy.

FINE ON GENERAL JACKSON.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 22, 1842.

The bill introduced by Mr. LINN, to indemnify General Jackson for the fine imposed on him at New Orleans while in the discharge of his official duty, came up for consideration, as in committee of the whole; and there being no motion to amend, it was reported to the Senate.

Mr. LINN remarked that he hoped the bill would be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. If there was to be any discussion on the subject, it could take place upon the third reading. It was his desire that it should be advanced now, and he hoped the Senate would consent to the course he had pointed out.

Mr. CRITTENDEN observed that it seemed to him there was no good reason for exempting it from the ordinary course of bills passing through the Senate—that of referring it to an appropriate committee. Indeed, it seemed the more necessary that this bill should now take this course, in consequence of the extraordinary manner in which the subject had been recommended to the consideration of Congress in the President's message. If it is a subject of such importance to the general welfare, as to call for that recommendation, it must surely be one which it is proper should take the ordinary course of being referred, like the other topics of the message. This is, at all events, a safe course, and one from which he would not exempt this bill. He did not well know—nor, indeed, did he consider it important—what committee it should be referred to; but he would suggest that probably the Committee on the Judiciary was the most appropriate.

Mr. LINN contended that there was nothing unusual in the manner in which he had introduced the bill, or its present position on the calendar. It was the same bill which he had introduced last session, and which was defeated by an amendment that obliged him and his friends to vote against its passage. The subject had been fully discussed then, and he really thought exhausted. It had been referred to the Judiciary Committee, and returned without any additional light. He could, therefore, see no use in such delay now. And as to the Senator's remarks in reference to the President's message, he should say that it was not at all in consequence of the recommendation in it, that he had introduced the bill; for if it never had been mentioned, he should have introduced the bill the first opportunity afforded, in the exact form in which it is now before the Senate, being the very same bill which was defeated last session. The whole subject is compressed into as few words as possible, and requires no elaborate report of a committee. When up last session, it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, contrary to his wishes and remonstrance. He then thought (and was still of the same opinion) that, as the introducer and mover of the bill, he was in courtesy entitled to make choice of a direct vote on its adoption or rejection, in preference to its commitment or modification. He knew that, if referred to a hostile committee, it must receive an adverse report. The Judiciary Committee last session returned it to the Senate for its own decision—perhaps not being able to come to any conclusion as to the nature of the report, which should be made.

The bill was very simple; it required but few words to express its object; that it clearly did, without the slightest reference to any controverted point; and, therefore, he could not see any reasonable objection to letting it be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and if then any gentleman wished to enter into discussion, he would be ready to show why he thought the bill ought to pass. It might, by common consent, now be advanced to that stage, and the discussion might proceed; or, if it was thought more desirable, a day next week might be fixed for debate, and the subject might be so postponed. When he introduced the bill, his only reason for then fixing a day for its consideration as a special order, was to proceed with it in conformity with the course pursued by the Senator from New York [Mr. TALLMADGE] on introducing his exchequer bill, which was made the special order for Tuesday next, without being referred to any committee. He wished this to take the same course, presuming that it required no elaborate report from any committee—and that there could exist no desire to give it unnecessary delay. He would now propose that the bill be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and that the discussion be postponed till it came up on its third reading.

Mr. HUNTINGTON objected, that if the course pointed out by his friend from Missouri were adopted, the bill would be placed beyond the stage of reference and amendment, even should it appear in discussion that either were necessary. There was, he thought, one fact not touched upon, which placed the matter in a light somewhat different from that reflected upon it last session. It was well known to the Senate that, when the subject was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary last session, and when the committee returned the bill without a report, it was because the committee had no evidence before it, either documentary, historical, or otherwise, upon which it could base a report. Now, the case may be quite different. There may be authentic evidence to lay before the committee; it may be in a condition to advise the Senate, which it did not feel authorized to do last session.

Mr. BAYARD observed, that when this matter was submitted to the Senate at the last session, he felt disposed to return the fine—not on the ground that there was any legal claim on the Government of the United States, but as a matter of courtesy—as an additional acknowledgment of services rendered. It seemed, however, that the gentlemen who advocated the bill were not satisfied with this concession, but that, seeking the absolute exculpation of the General, he and his friends insisted that his course on the occasion in which the fine originated, was perfectly justifiable—that the action of the judge was wrong, and that it is the duty of Congress to refund the fine. And this was the very issue which demanded the amendment of the bill which he had submitted at the last session. It certainly, then, did seem very odd that, after a repose of nearly thirty years, Congress should be called upon—after the circumstances had faded from the recollection of the community and of individual members of Congress—to approve of a high-handed violation of the Constitution by one of the military officers of the Government. The alternative was presented of either giving countenance to an implied approval, or expressly disavowing the intention of passing any opinion; and the Senate preferred the latter course.

Through the kindness of the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. CONRAD,] he (Mr. B.) was now enabled to refer to more documentary evidence of the grounds of decision in the matter, than was at his disposal last session. He held in his hand a copy of the record of the court, in the handwriting of the clerk of the court, and made out at the time. He had read it carefully, and had come to the conclusion that justice to the court itself—the permanent interests of the people of the United States—required that the matter should stand as it does; and that it comports better with these interests, and the reputation of the distinguished individual in question, that the affair should rest on its present footing. This was the deliberate conclusion to which he had come. Under these circumstances, he was in favor of referring the bill to the proper committee; and this course was the more necessary, seeing that the avowed object of the bill is to procure a legislative recognition of the legality of the course pursued by General Jackson on that occasion. He himself—his friends who push this measure in its present shape—say he would disdain to accept the restitution of the fine as a gratuity. It is claimed as his right, on the ground that he was perfectly justifiable. And what is the inevitable conclusion? What but that, if he was justifiable, then was the action of the court illegal and unjustifiable. This is the conclusion, and there can be none other. He would ask, could the Senate, with a due sense of its duty, permit such a conclusion? Was it not necessary that care should be taken to avoid this conclusion? and, therefore, the bill ought to be sent to the Committee on the Judiciary, that its report may place before the Senate and the country all the facts in relation to which it is called upon to act.

It is not a light matter for Congress to sanction the idea that the lives of our citizens, their property, and their personal liberty, may, with impunity, be placed at the mercy of a military commander, and a court-martial of his officers, brought together at his summons. He knew very well that there were some very extraordinary notions entertained on the subject of martial law, which would render a court-martial the mere ministers of the arbitrary will of the commanding officer. Now, he thought he was prepared to show that, by the Constitution of the United States, it is not in the power even of the Congress of the United States, much less of an officer acting under a commission derived from the Federal Government, to declare martial law, affecting every class of the community. Congress may, indeed, suspend the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus, but cannot declare martial law to be the law of the United States, or of any part of them. There is a great and glaring error committed in this matter, by confounding these things. Civil law is that law which regulates the rights and duties of citizens generally. Martial law is a code specially applicable to the army and navy, and militia when called into actual service, and is a distinct code for their government. Even in time of war, the private citizen, the non-combatant, cannot be subjected to the code which governs those engaged in warfare, without a manifest violation of his civil rights. A person not enlisted in the service of the United States, either in the army or the navy, or in the militia when in actual service, cannot be subjected to the operation of martial law, because Congress could confer no such power. It is limited in its powers. The Constitution says, Congress shall have power to declare war, to raise armies, to provide a navy, to provide arms and munitions of war, and to make rules for the government of the land and naval forces. On these limited and specific powers, it has been inferred that Congress may declare martial law. To avoid this very conclusion, there is an express provision in the very next section, among the restrictions on the power of Congress, declaring that the remedy of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless in cases of rebellion or invasion.

A state of war, then, authorizes the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, which is the sacred instrument of liberty in the hands of the State authorities; but does not give the right of declaring martial law, as applicable to the community generally, subjecting the citizen to a code which is summary in its proceedings, and arbitrary in its judgments. No citizen, unless with his own consent, is amenable to the military code; and that occurs when he enlists in the army or navy, or is called into action as part of the militia. There is an express provision in the 5th article of the amendments to the Constitution, which guards against such a result, by declaring that "no person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service, in time of war or public danger." The only power Government has to establish a code of martial law, is in relation to those who are enlisted in its land and naval forces, including the militia. It is to be regretted that such erroneous notions, avowed in relation to martial law, should prevail in a country boasting of its civil liberty. All Congress can do, even in the cases of war and invasion, is to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus; and that can be done by Congress only—not by an officer of the Government without its authority. But that suspension of the writ, although it may leave the individual subject to the inconvenience of temporary restraint, does not subject him to be tried and punished by the military code. If an individual, no matter how high in commission, or how much impelled by necessity, usurps the power, he cannot be said to act rightfully, though he may be excused. A high and imperious necessity may exist, which can alone form his excuse; and whenever such a case is presented, he (Mr. B.) would sustain the officer. Whether such was the fact in the case of General Jackson, should be distinctly settled. And the report of the committee, presenting all the facts of the case, would place the matter on the right footing, and prevent any erroneous conclusions in relation to this question of martial law.

He had dwelt on this point, because he conceived these views too important to be overlooked. He had been induced to go thus minutely into the matter, with a view of showing that it contains a grave and most important question, involving not only individual life, liberty, and property, but the liberties of this country, its dearest rights, and its safeguards against the exercise of the most perilous and tyrannous power—a power such as this Government, much less its commissioned officer, has, and can have, no right to assume for a moment. He trusted that he had shown the propriety of the reference, and that it would be made.

Mr. LINN remarked that he should not have said one word more at present—wishing to reserve his remarks for the regular discussion of the measure—had not the Senator from Delaware made use of some extraordinary observations, which demanded immediate notice. That Senator says: "It has been argued by General Jackson's friends that he (General Jackson) acted in conformity with the letter of the Constitution." If there was any individual among the friends of General Jackson who made use of any such argument during the discussion of this bill last session, or at any other time, he had not heard it; and certain he was that he had not himself used one expression to that effect. What he and his friends did say was, that General Jackson, under the circumstances in which he was placed, acted nobly, and merited the approval and gratitude of the whole country, so fully, unequivocally, and repeatedly awarded to him then, and ever since the transaction. He was not the man voluntarily to abandon his duty to his country in such a crisis, and take refuge behind the letter of the Constitution for his excuse, after both country and Constitution were destroyed by an invading enemy. He was not the man for any such line of conduct.

He had not sought to place the bill on any ground different from that on which bills heretofore had been placed for refunding officers in the public service fines incurred, or judgments awarded against them, for official acts done for the benefit of the country. Money paid by them, in compliance with the mandates of the law, had been refunded by Congress; and upon the same ground he placed this bill—that of restoring to the public servant money paid by him for the public good. He had no wish to go any further with the subject than this; and would not, unless compelled by the remarks of others. He had no desire to disturb the question of the constitutionality of the matter. The question was, simply, whether General Jackson shall have the same measure of justice extended to him, which has been extended to other officers of the Government—even to the lowest in grade of your revenue officers. The cases of Generals Brown and Wilkinson, Colonel Purdy, &c., will present themselves at once to the memory of Senators; they being of a high military character. This bill must pass. The American people have willed it. It is not with them a party question. All go for it—Jew and Gentile, Democrat and Whig; and it should be done promptly.

He should repeat, that the friends of this measure had not argued it on the ground of the act for which the fine was incurred being constitutional. He apprehended not one of his friends had taken that position, and that therefore the Senator from Delaware was in error in supposing it was so advocated. The constitutional question was a reserved question. The friends of the bill never urged it on that ground; they never said aught about the Judge being right or wrong. There might have been those who disapproved of the course pursued by the Judge, and so condemned it. But, whether they did so or not, it had nothing to do with the bill now before the Senate, which was disconnected from any question of that kind. And, as to the record referred to by the Senator from Delaware, he knew not what it contained; but he hoped the Senator would move to have it printed. Let it come to light, and not be kept floating about in holes and corners. If there is anything in it of such importance as is supposed, it is right it should be made known—right that the country should see it.

It has been intimated by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CONRAD] that this bill, after so long a delay on the part of General Jackson and his friends, was a popularity-hunting scheme. It may be so; if doing justice to a venerable patriot soldier and statesman would gain him favor with his countrymen, he must confess he desired it, for he coveted the popularity which would spring from doing right; he desired no other.

It would be obvious to the most casual observer, that General Jackson could not, in the plenitude of power, ask that this money should be refunded as a mark of approbation of his conduct; nor Mr. Van Buren and his friends;—as the first was accused of subserviency, and the latter of wearing "collars." No; it is reserved for the Whigs—to his political opponents—to act with justice and magnanimity, and do the deed themselves: the more magnanimous, from the bitter political war that has been waged for so many years.

He frankly confessed that it had escaped his attention. It was first excited by the debates in the Legislatures of the States of New York and Ohio; and of the presentation of instructions to the House of Representatives in favor of this measure from the State of Michigan; in which latter, remarks were uttered by an individual alike injurious to himself and to Gen. Jackson, for he stated (as Mr. L. understood) that the General had not paid the amount of the fine himself—it being paid by others. Could there be a harsher reflection upon the honor and integrity of the man who had perilled all for his country? It was, then, important to the General's fame that all doubt should cease upon that point; that the historical fact of the payment of the amount of the fine out of his own funds should be placed beyond cavil or dispute, whilst he was yet in the land of the living.

Mr. BAYARD did not know that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. LINN] had, in debating the subject last session, put the claim on that ground; but he (Mr. BAYARD) had a distinct recollection that some one on his [Mr. LINN'S] side of the question did, and that the general gist of the argument urged by the friends of the bill, was, that General Jackson was perfectly justified in resisting the Judge's mandate. Now, he was ready to admit that it might have been a case of the strongest necessity. All he wanted was, that this point should be settled. Let a report of the committee be made, putting the matter on its true foundation. Let it be shown that it was a case of high necessity—that, under the circumstances then existing, General Jackson was excusable; and that, therefore, the fine ought to be refunded to him. But let not a bill, which is susceptible of a different construction, be passed, in the face of a construction which all know is intended to be put upon it.

Mr. HUNTINGTON observed that he rose merely to make an explanation. He understood that, when the bill last session was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and it made its report, all the facts were not before it. Now, a different state of facts was presented. In referring the bill to the same committee, it would be accompanied by an authenticated document, affording information to enable the committee to make a satisfactory report. The document he alluded to was that in the hands of the Senator from Delaware. He was of opinion that the bill ought to take the ordinary course of reference.

Mr. BAYARD remarked, that he had been handed the paper to which he had referred by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. CONRAD,] to whom he would restore it.

Mr. WRIGHT hoped the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CONRAD] would present it to the Senate, and ask that it be printed. It is alluded to as a paper containing important facts, and it was therefore desirable that it should be printed.

Mr. CONRAD observed, that, owing to the peculiar position in which he stood in regard to the bill—which had procured him the honor of a controversy partaking somewhat of a personal character with the distinguished individual for whose benefit it is intended—he had determined to take no part in this debate, but, having already fully expressed his views, to give a silent vote. He should not now depart from this resolution, except to reply to an observation which fell from the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. LINN.] That Senator remarked that the copy of the record referred to by the Senator from Delaware was floating about in holes and corners of the Senate. He did not know exactly what meaning to attach to the expression.

Mr. LINN interposed to assure the Senator from Louisiana that he did not intend by it anything offensive or personal to him.

Mr. CONRAD hoped not; but the expression was calculated to convey the idea that there was some mystery or secrecy connected with this document; and, as the Senator from Delaware had received it from him, he would beg leave to inform the Senate how, and for what purpose, he had procured it.

Shortly after the rejection of this bill, last summer, finding it resuscitated in the House, and supposing it would probably be his duty again to vote on it, he determined to procure all the information he could in relation to the facts of the case. He accordingly wrote to the clerk of the court, before which the proceedings had taken place, requesting him to cause an authenticated copy of the record to be made, and forwarded to him. This was done. Meantime, however, a friend in New Orleans had sent him the copy now in the hands of the Senator from Delaware, which he brought to the Senate a few days ago, when this bill was last up, and exhibited it to several members as a document ascertaining the proceedings connected with the imposition of the fine on General Jackson. By a singular chance, it is a copy made out shortly after the proceedings occurred, and is certified by the clerk who officiated in them. It is dated in December, 1815. The gentleman who sent it to him stated (as well as he recollected) that it had been found among the papers of some person deceased, by the notary who made the inventory of his estate, and had been preserved as a curiosity.

So far had it been from his (Mr. CONRAD'S) intention, or that of any other Senator, to suppress this document, that it was determined to lay it before the committee to which the bill should be referred, if it were referred, or to submit it to the Senate if the bill were not referred. In the meantime, it had been shown to many Senators, who had expressed a curiosity to see it; and it was now at the service of the Senator from Missouri, if he desired to examine it. Perhaps, indeed, it would be well to adopt the suggestion of that Senator, and have it printed for the use of the Senate.

On the question now pending before the Senate, he would only say that it was entirely indifferent to him what course the bill might take. It must be recollected, however, that in fact there had been, as yet, no report on the bill—the committee to which the former bill was referred having had no evidence before it upon which it was considered a report could be based. If the object of the Senator from Missouri was really to have this money refunded to General Jackson on terms honorable to him, (and he did not doubt that this was his object,) and not to make political capital out of the question, it appeared to him that the only way in which his object could be attained would be by the reference of the bill. What was the Senator now attempting? To have the bill adopted by the identical body which, after a protracted discussion, rejected it by a large majority, not five months ago. He submitted to that Senator's candor, whether he could expect the Senate to reverse its former decision, except on such evidence as should satisfy the majority they were wrong? On the other hand, if the bill were referred to a committee, the facts might be reported, and some mode might be suggested in its report by which the money could be refunded to General Jackson, without doing any injustice to the character of others, or encouraging the exercise, by future military commanders, of powers not conferred by the Constitution, and dangerous to the lives and liberties of our citizens.

Mr. BUCHANAN had but a few words to say on this subject. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] had been discharging his heavy artillery against nothing. He had not even a target to aim at. It had never been contended on this floor that a military commander possessed the power, under the Constitution of the United States, to declare martial law. No such principle had ever been asserted on this (the Democratic) side of the House. He had been induced to make this disclaimer in consequence of an attack which had been made upon him, in a well-written pamphlet signed "A Kentuckian," for having advocated such a doctrine, in conjunction, strangely enough, with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BERRIEN] and a distinguished member of the other House, [Mr. ADAMS] He did not know who might be the author of this pamphlet; but he must express his surprise how any candid man, who had read his remarks at the last session of Congress on the subject of the remission of General Jackson's fine, could have fallen into such an error. He had then expressly declared (and the published report of the debate, which he had recently examined, would justify him in this assertion) that we did not contend, strictly speaking, that General Jackson had any constitutional right to declare martial law at New Orleans; but that, as this exercise of power was the only means of saving the city from capture by the enemy, he stood amply justified before his country for the act. We placed the argument not upon the ground of strict constitutional right, but of such an overruling necessity as left General Jackson no alternative but the establishment of martial law, or the sacrifice of New Orleans to the rapine and lust of the British soldiery. On this ground Mr B. had planted himself firmly at the last session of Congress; and here he intended to remain.

In the history of every nation at war, cases might occur of such extreme and overpowering necessity, that, in order to save the country, a military commander might be compelled to resort to the establishment of martial law. Emergencies might exist, in which he would be guilty of culpable negligence, if he refused to adopt this expedient. This was eminently the position of General Jackson at New Orleans. If, knowing, as he did, that a traitorous correspondence was carried on with the enemy, and that no other means of arresting it existed, he would justly have exposed himself to the severest censure, had he suffered the city to be sacked, rather than save it by declaring martial law. But, in every such case, the commanding General acted upon his own responsibility, and at his own peril; and must afterwards appeal to his country for his justification. To that country he had made his appeal, and it had nobly justified his conduct. It was an act of the most heroic patriotism—of the sternest duty. Most fortunate had it been for us, that a man commanded in that city who never shrunk from personal responsibility when his country was in danger.

General Jackson's situation at New Orleans presented the case par excellence for such an exercise of power. If we were to search the history of the world for examples—if imagination were permitted to take the widest range, we could not present, or even fancy, a case more strongly justifying, in every particular, the declaration of martial law, than that which existed at New Orleans. All the attendant circumstances are now matters of authentic history. General Jackson was sent to defend our great Western commercial city against the British forces. He was almost destitute of regular soldiers. A few thousand raw militia, suddenly brought together, constituted nearly his whole army. All that he had to rely upon was their native but undisciplined courage. He had to organize them, to discipline them, to infuse into them his own indomitable spirit, and then to lead them to battle and to victory.

And what was the condition and character of the enemy against whom he had to contend? The British General commanded a numerous and well-provided army of regulars, in a perfect state of discipline, and flushed with victory over the conquerors of Europe. Such were the fearful odds against General Jackson! We can all remember that, for a time, despair sat on almost every countenance; and we have been informed that when the news of the victory reached Congress, there was such a burst of enthusiastic joy as had never been witnessed before in these halls. This was the effusion of patriotic hearts upon the delivery of their country from fearful and impending danger.

By what means did the General achieve this great and glorious victory?

Louisiana had been a Spanish province but a few years before. Its ancient inhabitants had not become warmly attached to our Constitution and laws, as they are at present. Besides, there were many discontented foreigners within the city of New Orleans. Whilst a very large majority of the inhabitants displayed their patriotism and their courage on the field of battle, the city harbored within its bosom a number of traitors, who were in correspondence with the enemy. The General's weakness and his plan of defence were in this manner communicated to the British commander, who was thus instructed in the best mode of attack.

General Jackson was thus placed in a position of awful responsibility. On the one hand, he was aware that the letter of the Constitution conferred upon him no authority to declare martial law; whilst, on the other, he knew that the establishment of martial law was the only human means of arresting this traitorous correspondence with the enemy, and saving the city. Before this act was performed, he had consulted the leading inhabitants of New Orleans, who entirely approved the measure.

Suppose General Jackson had refused to establish martial law, and the city had been captured: how could he then have justified his conduct to his country? Could he have said, "I knew there was a band of traitors within the city, who were in correspondence with the enemy; I knew that, in this manner, all my plans for its defence would be defeated; I knew that, by declaring martial law, the city could have been saved: I knew all this, but such was my reverence for the letter of the Constitution, that, rather than violate it, I determined that New Orleans should be surrendered to the possession and pillage of the enemy? I would not, even for a few days, restrain the constitutional liberty of the citizens, even to secure the permanent salvation of the city."

No, sir, no. Excusable is not the word. General Jackson stands justified—amply justified—in the judgment of his whole country, for his conduct. This is no party question; at least, so far as I am acquainted with the feelings of the people. Posterity has already decided the question; because more than a quarter of a century has elapsed since the event. The passage of this bill, therefore, is only important as it will embody public sentiment, and place upon the records of the nation the vindication of their General.

Mr. B. had confidently hoped that, in this era of good feeling, the bill might have been permitted to pass without a word of comment. It was destined to pass; it would pass; it must pass, and that at no distant day. This act of justice towards General Jackson would as certainly be performed as that the American people were grateful to their distinguished benefactor. Then why delay it? Let the healing balm of our approbation go home to him whilst he was yet in the land of the living. Mr. B. strongly appealed to his patriotic and gallant political enemies in the Senate to suffer the bill to pass without further delay.

Mr. ALLEN made some remarks against the reference, and argued in justification of the declaration of martial law by General Jackson at New Orleans. He maintained that its declaration was indispensable to the safety of that city, and that the necessity was a full justification of the act.

Mr. CRITTENDEN followed in reply to Mr. ALLEN.

Mr. BERRIEN observed that his remarks had been misconceived in the report quoted by the author of the pamphlet signed "A Kentuckian." I said (continued Mr. B.) in the debate which took place at the last session, I gave no opinion as to the right of a military commander to establish martial law, unless the expression of my belief, that Judge Hall was bound to issue the writ of habeas corpus, may be considered as a denial of it: for the very obvious reason that that right and this obligation could not co-exist. If martial law was rightfully established in New Orleans, superseding, in the extent which was practically given to it, all civil authority, Judge Hall, thus stripped of authority, could have been under no obligation to issue this writ. When, therefore, I asserted this obligation, (which I did expressly in that debate,) I denied inferentially the right to establish martial law.

I did, however, say on that occasion, and now repeat it, that, if Gen. Jackson believed (and I did not question the sincerity of his belief) that the safety of New Orleans required the confinement or removal of Louallier, and persons similarly situated, he was excusable in disobeying the writ of habeas corpus, relying upon the country to absolve him from a responsibility which he had assumed, by adopting a measure which he deemed necessary for its defence, when the responsibility of making that defence was thrown upon him. I do not recollect that any gentleman asserted in that debate that General Jackson had a right, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, to establish martial law in the military district under his command—that is, to subject its inhabitants to the rules and articles of war. There were those who maintained that he was justifiable in doing so; which I did not. When it was admitted that the Constitution and laws of the United States gave no such authority, the legal question was at an end; because the authority of General Jackson as the military commander of that district was derived, and could be derived, only from that Constitution and laws; and beyond these, he could have no rightful authority. I held, however, that the act of disobedience to the writ of habeas corpus was excusable, if it was done under a belief that it was indispensable to the safety of the city with the defence of which he was intrusted.

Mr PORTER said he would not have detained the Senate a moment at this stage of the discussion, but for the fact that he considered himself as called out by the allusion made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. LINN] to certain resolutions adopted by the Legislature of Michigan a year ago, purporting to instruct the Senators from that State on this floor how to vote on this bill. It is true, that such resolutions were sent to me, and were in my hands pending this bill during the last session. It is also true, that I did not present them to the Senate. I regarded them as a legislative expression of opinion, addressed to myself only, and not to this body. They assumed to control my action here, but not that of anybody else. They related merely to a private claim of small pecuniary amount, and not to any great measure of national policy. It was not necessary they should be presented, in order that their moral effect should be felt here; for the fact that this legislative movement had been made, was sufficiently notorious. Whether the Legislature of Michigan be entitled to the honor, in this instance, of first imparting warmth to national gratitude, which had lain cold for more than a quarter of a century, I am not prepared to say. It would seem, however, from the remarks of the Senator, that the arrival of these resolutions in this city first prompted him to action here. That action was the introduction of a bill, at the last session, precisely like the one now before us. The fate of that bill is well known. An amendment was offered, which directed the refunding of this fine, with costs and interest; with the proviso, "that this act should not be construed as an expression of the opinion of Congress upon any judicial proceeding or legal questions growing out of the declaration of martial law by General Jackson during the defence of New Orleans." I voted for this amendment, and it was adopted by the Senate. On the question which next presented itself, viz: the engrossment of the bill, I voted in the affirmative. But that vote was rendered ineffectual by that of the Senator and his friends. The bill was lost.

It will be seen, from this reference to the history of the case during the last session, that my course has been strictly in conformity with the wishes of the Legislature of Michigan, as expressed in these resolutions. Had I been disposed to regard them as mandatory on me, I could not have acted differently. In saying this, however, I mean not to be understood as admitting myself to have been under any obligation, constitutional or otherwise, to yield the right which they assumed to exercise.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE said: It will not have escaped observation, Mr. President, that I, too, stand in the same relation to this matter with my friend and colleague from Michigan. It is true, sir, that resolutions, such as have been described by the honorable Senator from Missouri, passed the Legislature of Michigan, and were sent duly certified to us here; nor was it at all necessary, I think, that we should thus have been reminded of the fact.

The gentleman from Missouri has been pleased, also, to draw into notice our omission to present those resolutions to the Senate. For the present occasion, at least, I am satisfied, so far as regards myself, with the brief but general exposition made by my colleague, of the motives which may have induced the course we each of us pursued.

It will be observed, sir, that my name, too, is registered among those who, last summer, voted for a bill, the object of which was, without casting reproach upon the distinguished judge who passed the sentence, to remit the pecuniary fine imposed upon General Jackson. Nor am I prepared to say that I have since had occasion to vary the opinions I then entertained in the matter. With regard to the degree of respect in which I should hold the expressed wishes or opinions of the authorities of Michigan, on any subject, as well as with respect to my own estimate of the extent of the obligation which such resolutions as are alluded to may be deemed to impose, I am certainly not without some opinions of my own—and opinions I have no disposition to conceal. And I assure my friend from Missouri that I will feel myself at all times ready, if he desire it, to explain them very fully and frankly to him; or, when a fit occasion shall occur, to expose them in extenso here in the Senate. But now, at this late hour, I do not desire to delay the Senate by entering upon an exposition which would consume so much time. Indeed, after what my colleague has said, I should hardly have risen now, but for his omission—accidental, I presume—to notice the imputations I was very sorry to hear, but which the Senator from Missouri allowed himself to cast upon the gentleman who has the honor, in the other wing of the Capitol, to represent the interests of Michigan. I do not know in what terms that gentleman thought proper to announce the resolutions in question, in the other House; nor do I at all remember to have read the newspaper which, we are informed, contained the account of that procedure.

But, relatively to the animadversions in which the gentleman from Missouri has been pleased to indulge, and waiving all comment upon the competency or propriety of making thus the action of the other House, or of any of its members there, the subject of comment or criticism, much more of censure, here, I ask leave to say that the Representative from Michigan in the other House is, I have no doubt, abundantly competent, and on any proper occasion will be equally willing, fully to justify and defend his course, whatever it might have been in this regard; and I only regret that the gentleman from Missouri should here, in another forum, have permitted himself thus to impugn the conduct of an absent person.

The further consideration of the bill was then, on motion to that effect, postponed to the succeeding Tuesday.

Mr. LINN hoped there would be no objection to the publicity of the document in the possession of the Senator from Louisiana, and that the Senator would consent to lay it before the Senate in the proper manner to warrant that course.

Mr. CONRAD had no objection.

The copy of the record was then presented in form to the Senate; and, on motion of Mr. LINN, ordered to be printed.

The Senate then adjourned.

REMARKS OF MR. WELLER,

OF OHIO.

In the House of Representatives, January 3d, 1843.

The bill to repeal the bankrupt law being under consideration, and the debate having taken a wide range—

Mr. WELLER rose, and said he had not risen with any disposition to discuss the question really before the House. This, indeed, was required by the parliamentary law; but the common usage since he had the honor of a seat here, had been to discuss anything else except the question upon which we were called to vote. In this instance, he found it more convenient to observe the usage than the rules of the House; and he should, after a few remarks upon the question, allude to other topics introduced by other gentlemen in this debate.

Mr. W. said he was opposed to the passage of the bankrupt law at the extra session, because he then believed, as he still does, that such a law was neither sanctioned by the Constitution, nor called for by the voice of the people. After a careful examination of that instrument, he could not find that it authorized Congress to pass a law sanctioning the violation of contracts—he alluded to the retrospective feature in the law. For himself, he was in favor of a strict construction of the Constitution, and he denied to Congress the exercise of any power not expressly delegated, or absolutely necessary to the exercise of a delegated power. But gentlemen infer, because the States are in express terms forbidden to pass any laws violating contracts, and the General Government is not, that therefore Congress may violate contracts! Are we, then; to assume the power, because it is not forbidden by the Constitution? Did not the framers of that instrument intend that this should be a Government of limited, of delegated powers? If the latitudinous construction claimed by gentlemen be given to that Constitution, then the General Government is omnipotent. The States are prohibited from passing laws violating contracts; the Federal Government is not. Why is this? Simply because the States would have had the power, if not prohibited, to pass laws of that character; and because the Federal Government, deriving all its legislative power directly from the Constitution, can do nothing except that which it is expressly authorized to do. If in this he was correct, the only question which remained to be decided, was, whether Congress could exercise the power conferred to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy, without violating contracts. If this could be done, then he held we had not the power to violate contracts. That it can be done, must be obvious to all. A prospective bankrupt law, to operate on contracts made after its passage, would be a uniform law upon the subject of bankruptcy, and no violation of the Constitution. To such a bill, properly guarded against fraud, and so framed as to include your banks and all other incorporations, he might not be disposed to object. Then individuals would make their bargains with a full knowledge of the law. He could easily see that such a measure might operate beneficially upon the country, in checking excessive credit, and, by drawing the banks within its influence, save the people from the immense losses herefore sustained by the frauds of those institutions.

This law, (said Mr. W.,) which we are now called on to repeal, was passed under very peculiar circumstances. At the extra session, after the bill had been laid on the table (where every one supposed it was destined to sleep the sleep of death) by a decisive majority, the Whig members here were entertained that evening at a certain board, where the sparkling champagne flowed pretty freely, and where rumor said an agreement was made to reconsider the vote next morning. Sure enough, when morning came, the identical same men came into this hall, reconsidered the vote of the previous day, and, in the twinkling of an eye, this bill, with all its acknowledged imperfections, was passed. A majority of this House at that very time was opposed to it; but it was passed to secure the enactment of another bill, in which certain Western Whigs felt a deep interest—he meant the land bill; for it is well known that all the laws passed at that session were passed by contract. Not one of them had merits of its own sufficient to secure its passage, if standing alone. It therefore became necessary, in order to carry one bill, to pass several. The land bill has been virtually repealed; and now the friends of that, seeing the contract has been violated, demand the repeal of the bankrupt law. And hence we find the very men who aided by their votes in passing this bill, now clamorous for its repeal! What wonderful stability and harmony there is in Whig legislation!

But why could not the law be repealed? Could it be pretended that the people were in favor of its retention on the statute-book? Would any gentleman rise in his place and tell him that? No, sir, no one has the hardihood to hazard such a declaration. Why not, then, pass this bill instantly! Was it not the duty of this House first to ascertain public sentiment, and then make legislation conform to it? When our masters the people have clearly (as in this case) expressed their will, are we not bound to bow submissively to it? But we have been told that the people in 1840, by electing a majority of Whigs to this House, decided in favor of of a bankrupt law! He denied this in toto. No such issue had been presented—no such decision made. The act was passed by the Whig members here, without consulting with their constituents; or else why is it that you now find some twenty or thirty of the very men who voted for it in favor its repeal? Again: It has been said that the people do not understand this bill—that their hostility to it grows out of their ignorance! It is the practice of a certain class of politicians to denounce the people as ignorant whenever they do not act in conformity with their particular opinions. At one time you will hear them demanding that a law shall be passed, because the people desire it; but when the people are found to be opposed to it, then it is said their opposition grows out of their ignorance! Well, (said Mr. W.) I am inclined to the opinion that the honest farmers in any district, who have lost large amounts by the bankrupt law, know something of its practical operation. They have seen enough of it to satisfy them that it should be repealed. The merits and demerits of the law have since its passage been freely discussed in the newspapers and in the popular assemblies, and the people have almost with one voice demanded its repeal. Why should not their judgment be carried into effect?

Mr. W. admitted that the unconditional repeal of the law might operate hard, and even unjustly, upon many individuals; for he had no doubt some honest men would be compelled to declare themselves bankrupts, in consequence of the discharge of their debtors. Some of them would, perhaps, after having been made bankrupts by the law, be excluded from its benefits. Besides, owing to the decision of one of the States, (Missouri,) that the act was unconstitutional, no one there had been permitted to avail himself of its provisions. He deeply sympathised with the unfortunate debtor, and was willing to exercise all the power conferred on him by the Constitution to alleviate his sufferings, or release him from imprisonment; but, as he held that this law was unconstitutional, he must vote for its repeal. Those who believed with him, that the act was unconstitutional, were compelled to seize the earliest opportunity to repair the breach made in its enactment. It is true, the retroactive part of the law is pretty well spent, and the greatest amount of evil resulting from it has already been felt; but, no matter what benefits might result to the country from its prospective features, he was bound to vote for the repeal of this bill.

Having said this much on the subject before the House, he would notice other questions discussed in extenso by some of the gentlemen who had preceded him. In ranging over the wide field of party debate, he was but following in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessors.

He knew and admitted that the present Executive had had difficulties to encounter, such as never obstructed the path of his predecessor. He came into power upon the top of a popular wave, which dashed from office a party which, for twelve years, had had, to a great extent, the possession of the Government. It could scarcely be expected that we, who had been ejected from power by the influence of his name, in conjunction with that of another distinguished individual—we, who had been so signally defeated at the ballot-box, would cherish any very friendly feelings for him. It was but natural that we should look with distrust—yea, even unkindness—upon the individual who had been one of the active agents in producing our overthrow. We came here, however, (said Mr. W.,) at the extra session, with every disposition to aid in the proper administration of the Government. That generosity and forbearance which brave and chivalric knights always extend to a defeated adversary, was not extended to us. We were taunted with our defeat; and whenever we dared to raise our voices in this hall, were told that the people had condemned us—that we were like criminals in the cart, waiting but for the arrival of the executioner to do his office upon us! You of the Whig party were then in a triumphant majority. Your victorious banner waved over twenty of the States of this Confederacy. So complete, so triumphant a victory, had never before been achieved in the annals of party warfare. He would not stop to inquire by what means this revolution had been effected. It was enough for him to say that they were such as had since been condemned by the sober judgment of the people—such as should cause a blush to mantle the cheek of those who used them—such as he trusted, for the honor of this country, would never again be resorted to. Your distinguished leader, (Mr. Clay,) whom a majority of you have so long delighted to honor, was then in the other end of the Capitol, to shapen legislation so as to secure the succession to himself. That was a happy hour for him; it was the day of his triumph. He then imagined that the difficulties which had heretofore obstructed his path to the Presidency were all removed, and that he would have an easy and rapid march to the goal of his ambition—that goal for the attainment of which he had directed all the mighty energies of his mind for more than twenty years. Already he imagined himself seated in the Presidential chair, and dispensing with a lordly munificence the patronage of the office amongst his friends and followers. But, alas! how short-sighted is man! How soon the destiny of the politician may be changed! To-day, courted and caressed by a crowd of fawning flatterers; to-morrow, when adversity falls upon him, there are "none so poor to do him reverence." Yes, (said Mr. W.,) your chieftain has fallen—fallen "like Lucifer, never to hope again"—blasted, scathed by the lightning of popular indignation, he stands a most melancholy monument of ill-directed ambition. He might philosophize over his present prostrate condition, and repeat as applicable to his own case the lines ascribed by Shakspeare to Cardinal Wolsey in the hour of his misfortune. He would not trouble the House to recite them.

[Several gentlemen around Mr. W. said, "Repeat them—let us hear them—recite them."]

Well, (said Mr. W.) I will quote them for the edification of gentlemen—

"This is the state of man; to-day he puts forth
The tender leaves of hope; to-morrow blossoms,
And bears his blushing honors thick upon him;
The third day comes a frost, a killing frost;
And—when he thinks good easy man, full surely
His greatness is a ripening,—nips his root,
And then he falls as I do. I have ventur'd,
Like little wanton boys that swim on bladders,
This many summers in a sea of glory,
But far beyond my depth; my high blown pride
At length broke under me; and now has left me,
Weary, and old with service, to the mercy
Of a rude stream that must forever hide me."

Yes, sir, there has been a "frost, a killing frost," in Ohio, where your captain went to take charge of his troops in propriâ personâ—in New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Maine—and, in fact, nearly all the States—which has nipped the root of his hopes, and produced an explosion of his "high-blown pride." That banner which waved so proudly in 1840, and under which he believed that his friends could again be rallied to victory, is now tattered, and torn, and trailing in the dust. But he had no disposition to exult over a fallen foe, nor to do violence to the feelings of his gallant friends who had adhered to him through good and through evil report, and who were still willing to do battle under his lead.

It is said, "whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth." If the degree of affection is to be measured by the amount of chastening bestowed, one would suppose that our Whig friends were the especial favorites of Heaven. Surely, no party has ever been so severely whipped. But there are some men who do not profit by experience. There are some whose souls are hardened by adversity; and he doubted very much whether the recent afflictions of the Whigs had softened their hearts, corrected their principles, improved their manners, or disposed them to abandon their heresies. Well, let them go on in their wild and reckless course. They will find that "the way of the transgressor is hard." The people, seeing that their prosperity lies in the defeat of the Whigs, will "laugh at their calamities, and mock when their fear cometh." In their efforts to break down the Executive for the exercise of a constitutional power, they will find they are "kicking against the pricks."

At the extra session, we were (said Mr. W.) in a lean minority—a minority almost hopeless. Our voices were too weak to resist the passage of the unconstitutional and dangerous laws of that session; but we fortunately found a Chief Magistrate sufficiently devoted to the Constitution (in some respects, at least) to save it from the ruthless hands of the spoilers. He vetoed the bank bill, and thus defeated a measure fraught with the most dangerous consequences to the country. He believed, if such an institution had been permitted to go into full operation, with branches extended all over the States of this Union, its corrupting influence upon the ballot-box, and upon the legislation of the country, would have been such as to have required a revolution to put it down. We all know the influence of concentrated, of organized wealth, in the hands of ambitious, designing politicians. The history of the late Bank of the United States furnishes us with abundant evidence on this subject. Well, (said Mr. W.,) the President, in the exercise of his constitutional prerogative, arrested the bill: and is it to be wondered at that we applaud him for the act? Would Whig orators on this floor expect us to denounce, with their fish-market epithets, a man who had thus nobly vindicated our principles? Did they suppose that the same base ingratitude which had, upon more than one occasion, signalized their conduct, would be exhibited by us? But he is denounced as a traitor! What right had they to expect that Mr. Tyler would approve of their bank charters? Had he not repeatedly, when in public life, denied, in the most solemn manner, the constitutional power of Congress to incorporate such an institution? Does any man pretend that he recanted these sentiments, when canvassing for the second office in the Government? Did he not, in his first message to Congress, say that such an institution had been condemned by the people? Could they expect him to disregard the solemn judgment of the people upon this question? Why, then, charge him with treachery? Why, say they, he is a traitor to the "universal Whig party!" During the past administration, Mr. Van Buren was denounced as the President of a party, which they said was dangerous—ay, exceedingly dangerous to the liberties of the people. Yes, said he, these eloquent orators wanted no party President; they wanted a man who would soar above party trammels, and preside with impartiality over the whole republic! Oh, no; there was nothing selfish in their movements; they cared nothing for office! Nothing but the most devoted affection—the most ardent love for that unhappy country which had been ruined, as they said, by the maladministration of a party President—fired their bosoms, or nerved their arms, in the ever-memorable contest of 1840! Well, sir, how stands the case now? Mr. Tyler refuses to be a mere party President; he refuses to permit a legislative caucus of Whig members to prescribe to him the manner in which he shall discharge his executive duties; he refuses to let other men construe for him that instrument which he had sworn to maintain and defend; in the language of the spoils haters of 1840, he soars above party discipline; he refuses to fill the capacious maws of the horde of hungry office-seekers who are constantly besetting him. This is the head and front of his offending; and for this, he is daily denounced on this floor by these same disinterested, no-party patriots of 1840, as a base and an infamous traitor!

Mr. W. said, he repeated that John Tyler had had no ordinary difficulties to encounter. He had been placed in a position requiring the exercise of great firmness and moral courage. He came into office when the tariff had run down to its minimum point, with an accruing revenue wholly inadequate to defray the necessary wants of the Government. The banking system—which, under vicious State legislation, had swollen to an enormous bulk—was exploding, spreading ruin and desolation over all the interests of the country. States, as well as individuals, were deeply involved in debt, and national bankruptcy seemed almost inevitable. In this emergency, he was backed by no party here. Both of the great parties in this hall were arrayed against him. The Whigs would not sustain him, because he refused to obey the mandates of their Captain-General, and because he would not direct his patronage in such a way as to secure him in the succession. The Democrats, it is true, supported some of his measures zealously; but there were others which they were compelled to oppose. Besides, they then saw, as they still see, around him some men in whom they never have had, and never can have, the slightest degree of confidence. That the President has been actuated in the discharge of his official duties, by the highest considerations of patriotism, he had never doubted. That he conscientiously believes that the measures which he has from time to time recommended to our consideration are calculated to advance the interests, and secure the permanent prosperity of the country, he did not question. And he would venture the prediction, that, after the excitement which now prevails should have subsided, and reason was once more permitted to exercise her proper influence over the minds of men, after the brawling partisans who are now denouncing him here have turned their attention to some other object, the purity of his intentions, the integrity of his motives (whatever may be the errors of his administration) will be doubted by none. Cherishing, then, (said Mr. W.,) as he certainly did, the utmost feelings of kindness and respect for the President, he trusted that he should not be charged with a factious spirit in opposing some of his measures. Whatever his personal feeling might be, that could not influence his political sentiments; he never suffered his personal attachments to control his political opinions. He was wedded to Democratic principles; he had sworn upon the altar of his country to devote his life to their maintenance and dissemination; and neither the sunny smiles or the courtly praises of friends, nor the curses or threats of enemies, could change his course.

We should not (said Mr. W.) attempt to stop the wheels of Government merely because the man at the helm may not be the individual of our choice. As unwise would it be in the brave sailor to scuttle his vessel and sink her beneath the waves of the ocean, because the commanding officer did not navigate her in accordance with his preconceived opinions. What do we gain by stopping the Government? Do we inflict chastisement on the President, or do we spread ruin and distress amongst our consituents? This Government belongs to no party—it is the common property of us all—we are joint tenants in the glorious inheritance which has been transmitted to us by our ancestors; and we, who are charged with legislative duties, are under an obligation to see that its blessings are undiminished under our guardianship. The stars and the stripes under which our brave countrymen have so often rallied and so gallantly fought, belong to no party; they are the representatives of the whole American Republic. He humbly conceived that it was the duty of the Democratic party to sustain the Administration, whenever they could do so without abandoning any of the principles upon which they have hitherto acted. Our political creed, being that upon which Jefferson and Jackson acted, is well understood by the country; and whenever the measures of Mr. Tyler are in conformity with that creed, they will receive our cordial support; but when they come to us in questionable shape, containing any of the old leaven of Federalism, we are bound to oppose them; and he trusted we should do so boldly and fearlessly, regardless of the consequences to ourselves. He would make no compromises with any party, which required the sacrifice of a Democratic principle.

If (said Mr. W.) the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] had, as was represented, come into this hall holding up the patronage of the General Government as a prize to be struggled for by the respective parties, he would have told him that the President had not patronage enough (even if he was so disposed) to purchase so humble a member as he was—much less a majority of the Democratic party. No, sir; he would sooner see his own right arm stricken from his body, and his tongue palsied, than sacrifice his principles, or any portion of his independence of character, at the footstool of any President. The mass of the Democratic party were made of sterner stuff than to be seduced from the allegiance they owe to their principles by the hope of office.

If (said Mr. W.) there be an idea in the mind of any one that a party can be organized and sustained on executive gifts, let me say that, in my judgment, it is entirely fallacious. The Administration must rely upon principles; and, if it expects the support of the Democracy, it must take care to make those principles Democratic. Executive patronage may gather around the person of the President the speculating, trading politicians, who regard public virtue as the mere coquetry of political prostitution; but the first cloud of adversity that rests upon him will be the signal for a general desertion of his cause. In the hour of his prosperity, they may load his ears with fulsome praises; but in the hour of need they will abandon him.

Other gentlemen had defined their position in relation to the coming contest. So far as he was concerned, if any gentleman desired to know where he expected to be, he could answer that in a few months he should lay aside his legislative robes and become a private citizen. He expected that a national convention would be held, to reconcile the differences of opinion which now exist among us as to who the candidate shall be. When the result is announced, he should be found as an humble private, supporting that nominee, come he from the North or South, the East or West. He held on to the principles upon which he came into public life, and, sink or swim, he should not abandon them.

REMARKS OF MR. KENNEDY, OF INDIANA,

In the House of Representatives, Dec. 28, 1842—On the bankrupt law.

Mr. EVERETT having called the previous question,

Mr. KENNEDY appealed to him to withdraw it until he, or some other person on his side of the House, could be heard a few moments.

Mr. EVERETT refused to comply.

Mr. KENNEDY said, if he could make no better bargain, he would undertake to renew the motion when he was through with his remarks.

Mr. EVERETT persisted in his motion. [Cries of "Vote it down."] And the question being put on a second to the previous question, the House, by a clamorous majority, refused the second. Whereupon,

Mr. KENNEDY proceeded to address the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker: The question of repealing the bankrupt law has unexpectedly created great excitement in this House, not so much from the debate on the main proposition of repeal, as from some incidental remarks which have fallen from two sides of the triangle on this floor. And as I belong to the other side of this three-cornered fight, I beg to be heard a few moments before the debate closes.

It is known to members here that I voted against the passage of this law. I did not give this vote because I was opposed to a well-regulated system of bankruptcy, but because this bill was not such a one as I believed the Constitution contemplated or the interest of the country demanded. But, however objectionable it was in its original inception, I am free to confess that, in my judgment, it has worked its worst; or, in the language of the gentleman from Vermont, who advocated its passage, and now seeks its repeal, "It has answered the purpose of its passage;" or, as I would express it, "It has answered the purposes of those who passed it." It has given the power to many millionary debtors, who, in equity, should never have had the benefit of its provisions to wipe out their honest debts; and now, when the time has arrived that some honest men, who have been made bankrupts by applying this sponge to debts due them, are about receiving the benefits of the law, it is to be repealed; and repealed, too, on the motion of those who advocated its passage, and who have the effrontery now to declare that they intended originally that it should have but a temporary duration.

I respond, then, to the declaration of the gentleman from Vermont, when he says "It has accomplished its object." And I say to that gentleman, and to the House, that, although I voted against this law in its inception, yet if I had any well grounded hope that a proper system could be ingrafted on this act, I would freely and fearlessly vote against its repeal. But, sir, this thing has gone forth to our constituents in its original deformity, and accumulated against it such a fearful denunciation as calls for its sudden and total repeal.

Under these circumstances, I shall vote for the repeal, hoping that, at some future time, an equitable and constitutional bankrupt law may be enacted. But, whilst I am on this subject, I beg leave to say, that the mode and manner of passing this law has done more to render it so universally odious than even its unjust provisions. In treating of this subject, I hope the House will excuse me if I speak plainly.

What were the circumstances under which this law was passed? I understood at the time of its passage—nay, it was then bold y avowed—that its passage was to secure the passage of another law: I mean the distribution act. But I have been told by a member of this House, (and one, too, who avowed his participation in the act,) that it was passed for the purpose of carrying the elections in the States of New York and Maine. I understood from this gentleman that it was feared, and so represented in Whig caucus by the members from those States, that, unless this law was passed, the Whig party would be defeated there in the then coming elections. What a reason of state for the passage of a law! If you Western Whigs, whose constituents are opposed to the law, will nevertheless pass it, we, on our part, will stipulate and agree to use it as an instrument to carry the elections in our States for the Whig party. Shame on such a prostitution of legislative functions! But it turns out, in the sequel, that although the price was paid for Whig delegates in the 28th Congress from the States of Maine and New York, yet the votes are not forthcoming. There has been a Yankee trick played off on our Western gentlemen. The Whigs have been routed, horse, foot, and dragoons—or rather I should say "raccoons"—in these two States. And I suppose our boys, not to be outdone by their Yankee brethren, are determined to take back the consideration by repealing the law.

Now, sir, I say, on leaving this part of the subject, that if this law was passed by these means, and for such objects, it was an unholy, dishonorable, and damnable combination; and if such practices be tolerated by the people of this country, it will end in the total corruption and overthrow of the legislative functions of this Government. I repeat, then, that the mode and manner of the passage of this law went further in rendering it universally odious than even its unjust provisions. It is objectionable, first, for what it contains; and, secondly, for what it does not contain. The law ought never to have operated retrospectively; for, by destroying existing contracts, it amounts to repudiation. It is a congressional sponge, that wipes out all old scores. This feature rendered it justly odious to a debt-paying people. But further, it ought to have embraced within its provisions all corporations issuing paper to circulate as money. It was odious, then, from this omission. And hence the people demand its repeal; and repealed it must be. So much for the repeal bill.

The debate on this bill was opened by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] with a long and doleful history of the discomfitures and disasters it had occasioned the universal Whig party. Sir, whilst listening to that lamentable recapitulation, I really had my sympathies enlisted. My heart is warm, and rather tender; and although I can war against the Whigs to the knife—ay, and the knife to the hilt—whilst they are before me in the open field; yet when they come to us with such tales of wo as have been repeated on this occasion, I cannot and will not withhold a sympathizing tear.

I think the gentleman likened their cause to that of some miserable criminal, who was condemned to the task of rolling a heavy load up a steep hill, but to be met at the top by a force which would instantly hurl him and his load to the bottom again. Sir, this was a hard case, but an apt and striking illustration. True, the Whigs have been engaged in rolling a heavy load of condemned and exploded measures, and they have rolled them up the steep of public opinion. These measures had been condemned to the garret of "obsolete ideas" for the last quarter of a century. By immense labor, long-continued, they did, at the extra session, by a desperate effort, succeed in reaching the brow of the hill; and here they were met by an indignant constituency, and they and their load hurled to the bottom, leaving them and their measures in a state of total wreck and ruin.

I now enter upon that part of the debate which has been called the desultory, the incidental, or accidental part.

Here let me refer to the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING.] He says that the Whigs as a party have dashed themselves to pieces against the buckler of executive power, which power he has ingeniously denominated a "constitutional fact." Now I can tell the gentleman from Massachusetts that he too is mistaken; and I beg leave to correct him, as it is my intention, as I proceed, to strike to the right as well as the left. The gentleman is wrong, then, in supposing that the Whig party has broken itself into the fragments that it now exhibits, either against executive power, executive vetoes, or what the gentleman calls a "constitutional fact." No, sir; they have dashed themselves to atoms against the "buckler" of public opinion. The secret of this fearful destruction which has so unexpectedly overtaken them, is to be found in that series of public measures which was so hastily, at the extra session, called from the storehouse of "obsolete ideas," and attempted to be forced through Congress as a grand whole; and this, before the people had time to cool after the glorious victory of 1840. Now, those gentlemen who believe in their consciences that those measures are for the public good, deserve great credit for their zeal in their enactment, for there is nothing more to be admired in a public man than a fearless and independent discharge of what he thinks his duty; but, in persuading themselves that the people were in favor of those measures, or that they were for the public weal,—in this consisted their error. In the last Presidential canvass, the Whigs played the game of hide-and-go-seek with the people. They nominated candidates of doubtful politics, so that it could be said in one section of the country that they were in favor of one set of measures, in another of another; for a bank and against a bank; for a tariff and against a tariff; for distribution and against distribution, according to the section in which the assertion was made, or would suit popular feeling. Thus they contrived to rally men of all shades of opinion, and by this means united the entire elements of opposition. By the combined efforts of this motley crew, the solid and well-formed ranks of Democracy were broken, and they came into power flushed with an unexpected victory. But what followed? When they ceased to break down, and undertook to build up—when they ceased to object, and attempted to project—they suddenly found themselves in the fix alluded to in this debate. They soon went to pot; or, as the gentleman from Massachusetts has it, they found themselves dashed to atoms against "a constitutional fact"—against which constitutional fact the gentleman kindly warns us of the Democratic party that we may chance to knock out our brains.

One word now to my friend and colleague, [Mr. THOMPSON] He says that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] has set up the Government at auction, to be knocked down to the highest bidder; that that gentleman has openly proposed a coalition with the Democrats; and that if we say nothing, the old rule of "silence gives consent" will attach. Now, I am aware that what is said by that gentleman on this floor is read with great interest by our people at home; and hence I feel myself called on to make an immediate response. For myself, I did not so understand the gentleman from Massachusetts; I did not understand him to sell out the Administration to the highest bidder, though I confess it squinted a little that way. What I understood the gentleman to say was, that the dominant party in this House had become, by its course towards the President, nothing more nor less than a miserable faction; that they were willing to trample under foot all regard for the Constitution, as well as the best interests of the country, in order to "head Capting Tyler;" and that they manifested a spleen totally unbecoming American Representatives. I certainly did not understand the gentleman to mean any more than that, as John Tyler was the President, and it was his duty to discharge the public functions belonging to that station, and being thus opposed by the majority in Congress, he was bound, and would carry on the Government by the best means within his power. To this, and thus far, then, I respond to the gentleman from Massachusetts; and I take it upon myself to say, that, although it is not material to the people of this country who is President, yet it is, nevertheless, very material that their Government should not be stopped. If John Tyler finds the Whigs constantly blocking up his way, in his honest intentions to do his duty—constantly clinging to the wheels of Government to impede its progress—then I hold it not only to be his right, but his bounden duty, as President, to look beyond that party, and to every part of the country, for that aid which he has a right to expect from those who put him in power.

One word as to the bid that the Democrats will make at this presidential sale, which my colleague says is coming off. I do not speak by authority, but I speak as one of the fifty-three thousand Democrats of the Hoosier State; and as I am the only one of the number who now has the right to speak here, I speak with the more freedom. If I am required to bid, I must first know the terms of sale;—whether the bids are to be made orally or in writing. In the latter case, I should be cautious, as I have always found it to be extremely inconvenient and troublesome for a politician to put his thoughts to paper. They sometimes become extremely hard to explain away.

But, to be serious: I tell my colleague that so far as myself, or those I represent, are concerned, I have no bid to make; no political alliances to form with any man; no threats to fear from any quarter. We have but one set of plain, straightforward principles; and, so far as the Executive is concerned, or anybody with the Executive—so far as the Executive will carry out those principles, so far will we stand by and support him; and not one inch further.

As for the offices of the Government, which, it has been supposed, were offered under disguise by the gentleman from Massachusetts—for myself, and my political friends whom I represent, I must say I want none of them. If one of my political friends should ask me to use my influence (if any I possessed) to get him an office, my reply would be, No, sir. And why? Because I do not believe it right to hold office under this, or any other administration, unless you can give it a full and fair support. I hold that John Tyler has a right—nay, more, that it is his duty—to place in office under him such men only as can and will give to his administration a full and free support, if such can be found. I care not if, on this ground, he removes some, and puts in others. I never complained of President Harrison for doing this. I thought it his right and duty thus to act. What sort of policy is it to have enemies in your camp?—men on the watch to undermine or betray all your measures? What is this but political suicide? This is what I shall demand of nobody.

I believe that President Tyler ought to have his friends in the executive offices—provided, always, they are capable, and faithful to their trusts. So far, then, as offices are concerned, the President has none that I would receive or ask for my political friends; and I may add, that I suspect any man's Democracy who may be found applying for them.

As to the supposed threat, that the veto power, at a subsequent period, will be used against us: I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to say, in substance, that the Whigs passed certain measures through Congress; that the President had vetoed them; that the wild fury of resentment exhibited by that party against the Executive, for thus exercising the veto power, had destroyed them. Now, gentlemen Democrats, as you will have a majority in the next Congress, I warn you not to adhere to your old musty notions of a sub-treasury, &c., but to come in and go with us for the exchequer; for, if you do persist in sticking at the President your ultra measures, why, he'll hit you across the face with a veto too. For myself, I hardly expect to be a member of the next Congress, as I am persuaded that a pretty considerable number of my worthy constituents have serious objections. But, if it should be my good or bad fortune to be here at the next Congress, I will most assuredly vote for such measures as I think right, regardless of consequences. And, should the President veto any or all of them, although I am not prepared to say what I would do, yet I am fully prepared to say what I would not do: I would not turn round and commence a vindictive and personal war against the President, for an honest discharge of what he believes to be his duty; much less would I, because he had thwarted my favorite plans, take advantage of the excitement it might engender, to tear the Constitution of my country to tatters—thus madly destroying this ark of political safety purchased for and handed down to us by our patriotic fathers, at the cost of so much blood and treasure.

If, however, my poor advice should be asked by my Democratic friends as to their future policy, I would say to them, give the Executive no occasion to use the veto power against you. I have no notion of making a greater man of John Tyler than the Almighty intended him to be. Therefore, I would avoid giving him occasion to use this powerfully popular weapon. No, sir: I would force on him no bill but such as I was satisfied he could conscientiously approve. I never desire to get a stroke with such a weapon across my political pate. It makes a most ugly scar. If there is any characteristic in a public man that the people admire, it is a bold and fearless discharge of duty; and I have never yet known the veto power used, that the masses did not rally around and sustain the President in its use. It is instinctive in our people to rally round and support the man who fearlessly "assumes the responsibility." It was imputed as a sin to President Jackson that he said, "I take the responsibility." Never did politicians make a greater mistake than charging this as a sin. Sir, it was the consciousness of having taken this responsibility which nerved the old Roman's arm, until it became as an iron sinew. It was this cry against him of "tyrant," which called the honest yeomanry of the country to his support. They believed his heart was pure, and his purposes patriotic; and when they saw him nerve himself to the conflict, regardless of all consequences, then it was that they rallied around and buoyed him up to a point in popular affection rarely reached by mortal man.

One word in relation to my opinion of President Tyler. I think him a very honest man; but not as great a man as General Jackson, by considerable.

I will tell gentlemen further, that there is little likelihood of all the "storms" that have or can be raised ever "blowing" John Tyler into the presidential chair again. Gentlemen need not count much on that. He will be suffered to retire, at the end of his present term, with a good honest name. To be sure, it will be somewhat bespattered with the spleen and filth of the party who put him in power; but what of that? The world will appreciate the motives of his calumniators. He has already been treated to a round of billingsgate, and denounced as a traitor. A traitor to what?—to his country? No. No man, as yet, has dared such an avowal. But a traitor to his party! And who is it, pray, who thus deals in epithets? It is the self-same men who once denounced Gen. Jackson. And what was he denounced for? These classical epithets were poured with much profusion upon his venerable head because he, forsooth, went with his party. According to the notions of these president-revilers, it was treason for him to go with his party, while it is treason in Tyler to go against his party. Sir, the people have seen these pretended patriots denouncing the President because he did, and the President because he does not, until they are becoming somewhat suspicious of the motives of such rabid politicians. But let no man suppose, from this remark, that I am going to join in the hue-and-cry lately raised against "radical" or ultra politicians. No, sir. I am, myself, "radical" to the root; and my party feelings, like the roots of our forest oaks, strike deep into the soil of my social affections. Yes, sir, I am radical throughout, and a pretty terrible fellow when once going; but I beg leave to remind gentlemen again, that when the people hear us clamor one thing to-day, and another to-morrow—denounce one man for sticking to his party, and another for not sticking to his party—they will be apt to conclude it is done more for the party than for the country.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has intimated that there will be trouble in our own ranks; that there are breakers ahead. He says that the names of our candidates for the presidency are "legion." Now, I will take the liberty of informing that gentleman that he need give himself no uneasiness on that subject. It is true, we have many eminent and worthy sons in our ranks, whose talents and services to our country eminently qualify them for that high station. Most, if not all of them, are striving with a laudable ambition, by worthy means, to reach that summit of human ambition. But, the gentleman from Massachusetts must recollect one other thing; and that is, none of our men ever come before they are called. We have a long established usage in our household upon this subject. We submit all our claims, and the claims of our respective friends, to the decision of a majority of our friends in convention. Such a meeting we are yet to have, when the conscript fathers of our faith will meet in council. When they have thus spoken, their voice will be responded to with one universal shout of approval, from Maine to Arkansas. Before that day arrives, we each have our preferences, and will freely express them. After that day has passed, these personal preferences give place to our zeal for the good of the whole. My colleague [Mr. THOMPSON] likewise indulges in the hope that a division may yet spring up amongst the Democracy. And with a view to foment these supposed differences, he has artfully spoken of geographical divisions. He says he had hoped to meet, in our next fight, the great Southern chief. At the same time he expresses this wish, he insinuates that this fancy of his is not likely to be gratified, judging from the "signs of the times."

Let me tell my colleague that he is not a good observer of the "signs of the times." And further, if he supposes that that chief will be the easiest overcome in the coming conflict, he is mistaken in that too. If the mantle of the people's choice should fall upon the shoulders of that chief, I, for one, will give the hearty response—Amen. Under his lead, or that of any one of our great chiefs, I will go into the battle, with full confidence in being able to scatter the cohorts of Whigery, backed though they may be with the disaffected from all quarters; to which you may add, if you please, the influence of the "constitutional fact." Here let me remark, that, if President Tyler can answer the catechism, and receive the nomination of the Democratic convention, then I stand pledged to go for him—[A voice: "And not otherwise"]—and not otherwise.

We seek this unanimity of action in our entire party, not for the purpose of office or patronage; for, however honorable and desirable it may be to serve our country in the numerous offices of trust or profit attached thereto, yet this with us is a secondary consideration. It is for the purpose of carrying out certain great leading Democratic measures that we seek power. [A voice: "What are they?—name them."] Sir, I have not time now to enumerate them; but, to satisfy the gentleman, I now pledge him, that if, after my political friends shall have nominated their candidate for President, they do not give them to the world in black and white—if they do not write them out in bold relief, so that he who runs may read—or if they should attempt to play the game of "no more disclosures for the public eye"—then, before God, and in the face of the people, I will denounce them, and refuse to act with them. Does this satisfy the gentleman?

Yes, sir, in due time our banner will be unfurled to the breeze. The mouths of our prophets will be open; and, as I said before, if John Tyler can respond to these principles, one and all, and receive the nomination of the Democratic convention, he will be good enough for me, notwithstanding the corruption that surrounds him.

Some of John Tyler's acts I most heartily approve; and I am not going to attempt to close the Democratic temple against him, or any other person who chooses to come. But there are, I confess, some of those surrounding him, who, I think, would make an awkward appearance in our ranks. Only think, for a moment, of an Administration with Daniel Webster and John C. Spencer for its high priests, endeavoring to recommend itself to the Democracy! Sir, you might as well attempt to graft a crab-tree on an orange-stock. Yet, Mr. Webster has said somewhere—at "Patchogue," I believe—that he was a Democrat—a Democrat of the Jefferson school. It may be so; but I was not taught to believe Webster a Democrat. I confess I have strong prejudices against the man; but, notwithstanding I have looked upon him as a political leper, yet I confess that, since he has been so liberally denounced by his old cronies—by those who used to call him the "god-like"—those who ate bread with him—and, above all, those who drank his wine on the night preceding the passage of the bankrupt law,—since these men have denounced him, I have thought that possibly there was something good in him. These denunciations have caused me to look a little closer into his political history; and if, upon full examination, I find one good act—one single green spot to rest my eye on—I will consent that he may come into our party: provided, always, he comes as a private; as a "capting," he cannot come.

As to bargains, I tell my colleague, [Mr. THOMPSON,] on behalf of at least the Democracy of the Hoosier State, there will be none made. But at the same time that we refuse to assume the responsibility of this Administration, we will, by no means, refuse to aid the Administration to carry on the Government. We will not refuse to support a good measure, simply because it is recommended by a man in whose election we had no agency. I, for one, will vote for every measure I think right, let who will recommend it; much less will I join in an attempt to tumble my Government to pieces, merely for the gratification of seeing John Tyler buried under its ruins.

After the general route sustained by the Whig party since the last adjournment of Congress, I had hoped they would have been taught wisdom, and somewhat changed their haughty dictatorial tone. Whipping is beneficial generally on bad children, and I thought it would have done the Whigs good. Never did a party so much need taking down. None was ever so haughty, so presuming, so self-conceited. Well do I remember the declaration of the imperious tenant of Ashland, that the Democrats were like criminals on the hangman's cart, waiting only for the order of execution. Yes, sir, no longer ago than the extra session, this was the language of the master here, and repeated by the man the country over. Indeed, it appeared to me at the extra session, and a part of the last, that the entire party had tried how they could act the tyrant. All discussion, all freedom of debate, was effectually set aside—the gag introduced—the hour rule applied—and this hall, sacred to liberty, made to play second fiddle to caucus rooms. Let me here put in a few words in exculpation of some of those who aided in this work of furies I do not accuse my Whig friends with having perpetrated all the mischiefs of which they were the authors, out of mere wantonness. It grew partly out of ignorance of their duties. They knew not how to manage. They had been a long time out of power—they had been running on grass, (to use a farmer's phrase,) until they had become lean and lank. The consequence was, when they got into clover, their course was constantly marked by the most enormous excesses. Such another set of legislators I hope never again to see.

At the commencement of this session, I hoped, from their conduct, that the late elections had had their desired effect on the Whigs in this House. Under this impression, I wrote to numbers of my friends that the Whigs were quite tame, and disposed to attend to public business. If, however, it shall turn out that destruction is not sufficient, but that nothing else than annihilation will do this party, I hope, at least, that those who are yet sober on political matters will take the warning which the prostration of the late Whig party gives to the world; and, in future, let politicians here make the laws, and the people will make the Presidents.

In defence of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] against the charge of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT,] I am bound to say that this party and personal debate did not originate with the gentleman from Massachusetts. If my memory serves me, it originated with the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ARNOLD,] who opened up the floodgates of his wrath against the Administration, and poured sluices of billingsgate upon the heads of John Tyler and his friends; a liberal share of which was meted out to what he calls "the sub-tranian Democracy."

Thus, you see, this debate originated on the opposite side of the House. Indeed, I have never known one of this character that did not; and I now challenge any person within the sound of my voice to mention the occasion, since this Congress commenced its first session, when any member of the Democratic party commenced a party debate that consumed the time of the House one hour. There is no such instance. Heretofore, during this session, the Whigs, smarting under their late castigation, have forborne to enter into a personal or party debate. Within the last few days, however, they have shown an evident disposition to launch out into their former practices of violence and vituperation. Is it, then, to be expected that the particular friends of the President will sit still, and hear themselves and their friends violently and wantonly assailed, without making a proper reply and suitable resentment? The whole course of my Whig friends here seems to me to be directed to sustaining the power which they by accident obtained; and I will be excused for saying that, unless they alter their course, and that speedily, such an accident will never happen to them again.

One word further upon the subject of a coalition between the Administration and the Democrats. I see no signs of such a union. There seems to me as much prospect of the ultra Whigs—the "white Charlies"—coalescing with the Democrats, as there is of Tyler and his friends. I hope, therefore, that I, for one, shall not be subjected to the suspicion of bargain and intrigue. It was the supposed, if not real, bargain between the venerable ex-President now on this floor, and the "Western Star," which caused the sun of Ashland to set, and set forever. With this example of results before me, I pray my name may never be tainted with the suspicion of a political bargain. I am now just starting out in political life, and I cannot say where I may want to go yet;—perhaps I may aspire to a seat in the Senate—perhaps to the Vice Presidency, or even the Presidency. There is no telling where the untamed ambition of a native Hoosier may lead him; but, come of me what may, I pray that I may never have attached to me even a suspicion of political bargain and sale.

One concluding remark to my colleague and the gentleman from Massachusetts, in relation to the geographical divisions which they hope will spring up amongst the Democrats. Both these gentlemen seem delighted with this idea. These gentlemen know nothing of the "hooks of steel" that bind Democrats each to the other, and all together. If they did, they would know that the affections of that party towards their public men are not in the least degree dependent upon geographical location. Democrats know no distinctions of geography. The links and bonds that bind them together are sufficiently large to embrace a hemisphere within its circle. Let the nomination once be made—there will be no difference whether the candidate comes from the North or the South, the East or the West. Nor will it be material who opposes—the Whigs, the "white Charlies," or even the "constitutional fact," or all these together. Give us an open field and a fair fight, and we will lick them, one and all—else I am no prophet.

SPEECH OF MR. BENTON,

OF MISSOURI,

In Senate, Thursday, January 12, 1843—On the Oregon bill.

Mr. BENTON said, in substance, that the objections to this bill grew out of the clause granting land to the settlers, not so much on account of the grants themselves, as on account of the exclusive jurisdiction over the country, which the grants would seem to imply. This was the objection; for no one defended the title of the British to one inch square of the valley of Oregon. The Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. SEVIER,] who has just spoken, had well said that this was an objection to the whole bill; for the rest would be worth nothing, without these grants to the settlers. Nobody would go there without the inducement of land. The British had planted a power there—the Hudson Bay Fur Company—in which the old Northwest Company was merged; and this power was to them in the NEW WORLD what the EAST INDIA COMPANY was to them in the OLD WORLD: it was an arm of the Government, and did everything for the Government which policy, or treaties, prevented it from doing for itself. This company was settling and colonizing the Columbia for the British Government; and we wish American citizens to settle and colonize it for us. The British Government gives inducement to this company. It gives them trade, commerce, an exclusive charter, laws, and national protection. We must give inducement also; and our inducement must be land and protection. Grants of land will carry settlers there; and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAPPAN] was treading in the tracks of Mr. Jefferson (perhaps without having read his recommendation, although he has read much) when he proposed, in his speech of yesterday, to plant 50,000 settlers, with their 50,000 rifles, on the banks of the Oregon. Mr. Jefferson had proposed the same thing in regard to Louisiana. He proposed that we should settle that vast domain when we acquired it; and for that purpose, that donations of land should be made to the first 30,000 settlers who should go there. This was the right doctrine, and the old doctrine. The white race were a land-loving people, and had a right to possess it, because they used it according to the intentions of the CREATOR. The white race went for land, and they will continue to go for it, and will go where they can get it. Europe, Asia, and America have been settled by them in this way. All the States of this Union have been so settled. The principle is founded in their nature, and in God's command; and it will continue to be obeyed. The valley of the Columbia is a vast field open to the settler. It is ours, and our people are beginning to go upon it. They go under the expectation of getting land; and that expectation must be confirmed to them. This bill proposes to confirm it; and if it fails in this particular, it fails in all. There is nothing left to induce emigration; and emigration is the only thing which can save the country from the British, acting through their powerful agent—the HUDSON BAY COMPANY.

Mr. B. said he would not restate the American title to this country: it had been well done by others who had preceded him in the debate. He would only give a little more development to two points—the treaties of 1803 and 1819; the former with France, by which we acquired Louisiana; the latter with Spain, by which we acquired all her rights on the northwest coast of America north of 42 degrees. By the first of these treaties we became a party to the 10th article of the treaty of Utrecht, between France and England; the treaty of peace of 1714 which terminated the wars of Queen Anne and Louis XIV, and settled all their differences of every kind in Europe and America, and undertook to prevent the recurrence of future differences between them. The 10th article of this treaty applied to their settlements and territories in North America, and directed commissaries to be appointed to mark and define their possessions. These commissaries did their work. They drew a line from ocean to ocean, to separate the French and British dominions, and to prevent future encroachments and collisions. This line began on the coast of Labrador, and followed a course slightly south of west, to the centre of North America, leaving the British settlements of Hudson's Bay to the north, and the French Canadian possessions to the south. This line took for a landmark the Lake of the Woods, which was then believed to be due east from the head of the Missi-ippi; and from that point took the 49th parallel of north latitude indefinitely to the west. The language of the line is "indefinitely;" and this established the northern boundary of Louisiana, and erected a wall beyond which future French settlements could not cross to the north, nor British to the south.

As purchasers of Louisiana, the treaty of 1803 made us party to the 10th article of the treaty of Utrecht, and made the 49th parallel the same to us and the British, which it had been to the French and the British: it became a wall which neither could pass, so far as it depended upon that line. This the British saw, and quickly went to work to abrogate or mutilate a line which presented an impassable barrier to their designs upon the Columbia river. The American, Captain Gray, had first discovered that river at its mouth, in 1790; Lewis and Clarke had discovered it from its head to the sea in 1804–5; and these discoveries of contiguous territory gave us the rights of first discovery over the whole river, in addition to the rights derived from treaties. But no sooner had Captain Gray discovered this great river than the British coveted it, and sent out McKenzie to discover it over again, and especially to find its head in high northern latitudes. To do this, McKenzie, proceeding from Canada, bore far to the north; missed all the waters of the Columbia; fell upon the Tacoutche Tesse; and struck the ocean five hundred miles (following the coast) to the north of the Columbia. Thus, this attempt to hatch a claim to this river, by discovering it at the head, after we had discovered it at the mouth, entirely failed; and the British were left without a pretext for claiming our property. In this dilemma, McKenzie proposed to make short work of it with the United States: he proposed to seize the river, and to hold it, because it was necessary to the British scheme of trade and domination in that quarter; and to expel all "American adventurers" from it. His advice was in these words:

"The Russians, who first discovered that along the coasts of Asia no useful or regular navigation existed, opened an interior communication by rivers, &c., and through that long and wide extended continent, to the strait that separates Asia from America, over which they passed to the American continent. Our situation is at length in some degree similar to theirs—the non-existence of a practicable passage by sea, and the existence of one through the continent, are clearly proved; and it requires only the countenance and support of the British Government to increase, in a very ample proportion, this national advantage, and secure the trade of that country to its subjects. * * * * * * By the rivers which discharge themselves into Hudson's Bay, at Port Nelson, it is proposed to carry on thre trade to their source at the head of the Saskatchiwine river, which rises in the Rocky Mountains, not eight degrees of longitude from the Pacific ocean. The Columbia flows from the same mountains, and discharges itself into the Pacific in north latitude 36 degrees 20 minutes. Both of them are capable of receiving ships at their mouths, and are navigable throughout for boats. * * * * * * But whatever course may be taken from the Atlantic, the Columbia is the line of communication from the Pacific ocean, pointed out by nature, as it is the only navigable river in the whole extent of Vancouver's minute survey of the coast. Its banks also form the first level country in all the southern extent of continental coast from Cook's entry, and, consequently, the most northern situation suited for the residence of a civilized people. By opening this intercourse between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and forming regular establishments through the interior, and at both extremes, as well as along the coasts and islands, the entire command of the fur-trade of North America might be obtained from latitude 45 to the pole, except that portion of it which the Russians have in the Pacific. To this may be added the fishing in both seas, and the markets in the four quarters of the globe. Such would be the field for commercial enterprise; and incalculable would be the produce of it, when supported by the operations of that credit and capital which Great Britain so eminently possesses. Then would this country begin to be remunerated for the expense it has sustained in discovering and surveying the coast of the Pacific ocean, which is at present left to American adventurers, who, without regularity or capital, or the desire of conciliating future confidence, look altogether to the interests of the moment. Such adventurers (and many of them, as I have been informed, have been very successful) would instantly disappear before a well-regulated trade. * * * * * * Many political reasons, which it is not necessary here to enumerate, must present themselves to the mind of every man acquainted with the enlarged system and capacities of British commerce, in support of the measures which I have briefly suggested as promising the most important advantages to the trade of the United Kingdom. * * * * * * Let the line begin where it may on the Mississippi, it must be continued west, till it terminates in the Pacific ocean to the south of the Columbia river."

This was the proposition of McKenzie; and from that moment the labors of the British Government became systematic and incessant to seize the Columbia. Their first step in this work was to abrogate, or mutilate, the established boundary of the 49th degree of north latitude; for, while that line stood, they could not approach within three degrees of the mouth of the Columbia, which was in 46 degrees. British diplomacy now went to work to destroy this line, at least beyond the Rocky Mountains; and labored indefatigably at it, until they accomplished their design.

Louisiana was acquired in 1803. In the very instant of signing the treaty which brought us that province, another treaty was signed in London, (without a knowledge of what was done in Paris,) fixing, among other things, the line from the Lake of the Woods to the Mississippi. This treaty, signed by Mr. Rufus King and Lord Hawkesbury, was rejected by Mr. Jefferson, without reference to the Senate, on account of the fifth article, (which related to the line between the Lake of the Woods and the head of the Mississippi,) for fear it might compromise the northern boundary of Louisiana and the line of 49 degrees. In this negotiation of 1803, the British made no attempt on the line of the 49th degree, because it was not then known to them that we had acquired Louisiana; but Mr. Jefferson, having a knowledge of this acquisition, was determined that nothing should be done to compromise our rights, or to unsettle the boundaries established under the treaty of Utrecht.

Another treaty was negotiated with Great Britain in 1807, between Messrs. Monroe and William Pinckney on one side, and Lords Holland and Auckland on the other. The English were now fully possessed of the fact that we had acquired Louisiana, and become a party to the line of 49 degrees; and they set themselves openly to work to destroy that line. The correspondence of the ministers shows the pertinacity of these attempts; and the instructions of Mr. Adams, in 1818, (when Secretary of State, under Mr. Monroe,) to Messrs. Rush and Gallatin, then in London, charged with negotiating a convention on points left unsettled at Ghent, condense the history of the mutual propositions then made. Finally, an article was agreed upon, in which the British succeeded in mutilating the line, and stopping it at the Rocky Mountains. This treaty of 1807 shared the fate of that of 1803, but for a different reason. It was rejected by Mr. Jefferson, without reference to the Senate, because it did not contain an explicit renunciation of the pretension of impressment!

At Ghent the attempt was renewed: the arrest of the line at the Rocky Mountains was agreed upon, but the British coupled with their proposition a demand for the free navigation of the Mississippi, and access to it through the territories of the United States; and this demand occasioned the whole article to be omitted. The Ghent treaty was signed without any stipulation on the subject of the line along the 49th degree, and that point became a principal object of the ministers charged with completing at London, in 1818, the subjects unfinished at Ghent in 1814. Thus the British were again foiled; but, true to their design, they persevered and accomplished it in the convention signed at London in 1818. That convention arrested the line at the mountains, and opened the Columbia to the joint occupation of the British; and, being ratified by the United States, it has become binding and obligatory on the country. But it is a point not to be overlooked, or undervalued, in this case, that it was in the year 1818 that this arrestation of the line took place; that up to that period it was in full force in all its extent, and, consequently, in full force to the Pacific ocean; and a complete bar (leaving out all other barriers) to any British acquisition, by discovery, south of 49 degrees in North America.

The other point in our title, to which I wish to give a little more development than it has received from other speakers, is, its derivation under the treaty with Spain of 1819. By that treaty the United States succeeded to all the rights of Spain on the northwest coast of America north of 42 degrees. These rights, according to the memoir of the Spanish minister, Don Onis, extended to the Russian possessions—the British having nothing on that coast! This was the representation of the Spanish minister; and with this, the fact of the case agreed. The Nootka Sound treaty and controversy of 1790 had decided that point! It decided that the British had no right to Nootka, a place four degrees north of the Columbia, and no way connected with it: and it ended in obtaining for the British the privilege, and nothing but the privilege, of fishing and hunting along the northwest coast, and erecting the temporary huts which the pursuit of these occupations might require. Colonization or settlement was renounced. The treaty itself, especially the 3d and the 6th articles, will prove this; and the parliamentary debates of the day correspond with the words of the treaty. As a fact, that treaty nullifies all British claim on the northwest coast; as a law, (if not abrogated by war,) it would still confine them to the pursuit of hunting and fishing. The treaty of 1819, by which we acquired all the Spanish title north of 42°, has given us all the benefits of the Nootka Sound treaty, both as a fact, and as a law; and, tested by either, the British are excluded from the northwest coast of America, for all the purposes of settlement or colonization.

Having given this development to our title as derived from the treaties of 1803 and 1819 with France and Spain, Mr. B. proceeded to show the nullity of the British pretension, and the tortious nature of the possession which they had acquired on the Columbia river. For this purpose he took several positions, and stated them as points which he meant to establish by proof. The first was, that up to the year 1818, the British never pretended to state any claim, or any shadow or color of claim, of any kind whatever, to the Columbia river. The second position was, that in the year 1818 they suggested title under the discoveries of Captain Cook, and under purchases made from Indians south of the Columbia prior to the American revolution; but showed nothing to sustain these empty suggestions. The third position was, that in 1826 they abandoned the idle suggestions of 1818, and took refuge, for the first time, under the Nootka Sound treaty; and, in the fourth place, he undertook to show that their possession of the Columbia was intrusive and tortious—a trespass, and a fraud upon our pre-existing possession of the same river; and a wrong and aggression which the Government of the United States should resist and repulse.

In support of these positions, Mr. B. read copiously from Mr. Adams's instructions of 1818 to the American ministers in London who negotiated the convention of that year; and from a letter from Mr. John Jacob Astor of 1813 to the Secretary of State, (Mr. Monroe,) to be laid before President Madison. These documents established, as he maintained, all the points he had stated, and showed the nullity and futility, as well as the impudence, of the British pretension.

"From the earnestness with which the British Government now return to the object of fixing this boundary, there is reason to believe that they have some other purpose connected with it, which they do not avow, but which, in their estimation, gives it an importance not belonging to it, considered in itself." * * * * "The new pretension, however, of disputing our title to the settlement at the mouth of the Columbia river, either indicates a design, on their part, to encroach, by new establishments of their own, upon the 49th parallel of latitude, south of which they can have no valid claim; or it manifests a jealousy of the United States—a desire to check the progress of our settlements, of which it might have been supposed that experience would, before this day, have relieved them." * * * * "Their projects for the line, both in the negotiations of Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney in 1807, and at Ghent in 1814, were to take the 49th parallel of latitude from the Lake of the Woods, west, as far as the territories of the United States extend in that direction, with a caveat against its extension to the South Sea, or beyond the Stony Mountains. Upon which two observations are to be made: first, that it is uncertain whether any part of the Lake of the Woods is in latitude 49; and, secondly, that they always affected to apply the indefinite of the extension, "as far as the territories extend," to the territories of the United States, and not to those of Great Britain—leaving a nest-egg for future pretensions south of latitude 49." * * * * "From the late correspondence with the Spanish minister, (Don Onis,) it appears that the claim of Spain upon the shores of the South Sea extends to the 56th degree of north latitude: but there is a Russian settlement in 55, besides a temporary lodgment connected with it as far south as 42. The pretensions of the British may, on this occasion, be disclosed. We know not precisely what they are; nor have they explained the grounds, or the motives, upon which they contest our right to the settlement called Astoria, formed before the late war, and broke up by the British sloop-of-war Racoon, in the course of it." * * * * "As the British Government admits, explicitly, their obligation, under the treaty of Ghent, to restore the post, there can be no question with regard to the United States to resume it." * * * * "We do not perceive how, or why, this question should be referred to two commissioners of the respective nations; and as Russia herself has pretensions on that coast, it deserves the consideration of both parties, whether the ultimate determination in the almost unavoidable case of a difference between the commissioners could with propriety be referred to her sovereign." * * * * "The expedient itself, of submitting questions of territorial rights and boundaries, in discussion between two nations, to the decision of a third, was unusual, if not entirely new; and should the contingency occur, will probably encounter difficulties of execution not foreseen at the time that the stipulation was made resorting to it. The subjects in controversy are of a nature too intricate and complicated, requiring on the part of the arbitrator a patience of investigation and research, historical, political, legal, geographical, and astronomical, for which it is impossible to conceive that the sovereign of a great empire could personally bestow the time."

Having read these extracts from Mr. Adams's letter of instructions of July, 1818, Mr. B. commented upon them to sustain his several positions in relation to the nullity, inconsistency, and bad faith of the British pretension. He particularly relied upon these expressions: "The new pretension of disputing our title to the Columbia river"—"design on their part to encroach by new establishments south of 49 degrees"—"desire to check the progress of our settlements"—"jealousy of the United States"—"affected to apply the indefinite extension of the limit to our territories, and not to those of Great Britain"—"leave a nest-egg for future pretensions south of 49"—"the Spanish minister claims for Spain to 56"—"the pretensions of the British Government may, on this occasion, be disclosed"—"we know not precisely what they are." Upon these expressions, and others, Mr. B. relied, and commented, to show that, up to the date of that letter of Mr. Adams, (to wit, July 28th, 1818,) the British had shown or suggested no claim of any kind whatever to any part of the valley of the Columbia; that they were trusting to the arts of diplomacy to generate something which could be hatched into a claim; and that their design was to encroach upon our settlements south of 49.

This was the state of the question in July, 1818, when the negotiation was commenced in London, which ended in the convention of October of that year, for a ten years' joint possession of all the country west of the Rocky Mountains. The negotiation was conducted by Messrs. Gallatin and Rush, and, of course, was calculated to constrain the British to make a disclosure of the grounds of their pretensions. Mr. Adams had notified them that, on this occasion, the British claim must be disclosed; and disclosed it was! and what a disclosure! Listen to it, as communicated to our Government by Messrs. Gallatin and Rush in their despatch of October 20, 1818. Here it is:

"The British plenipotentiaries asserted that former voyages, and principally that of Captain Cook, gave to Great Britain the rights derived from discovery; and they alluded to purchases from the natives south of the river Columbia, which they alleged to have been made prior to the American revolution."

This was the claim disclosed; and in support of this, not one name, fact, or specification of any kind was submitted. Discovery and purchase was the ground of their pretension. But who discovered, and when, and from whom the purchase was made, the British commissioners could not tell. They did not attempt to tell; but proposed to compromise the question by taking the river for the boundary, and getting the use of the harbor at its mouth. Their proposition to this effect is thus stated, in the same despatch, by Messrs. Gallatin and Rush:

"They did not make any formal proposition for a boundary, but intimated that the river itself was the most convenient that could be adopted, and that they would not agree to any that did not give them the harbor at the mouth of the river in common with the United States."

This (said Mr. B.) was their intimation for a boundary; and in this intimation we recognise the precise policy which McKenzie had marked out, and by which the British were to become the masters of the Columbia, and to expel the "American adventurers" from it.

Our commissioners did not agree to this boundary, and to this joint-tenantcy in the harbor; but they signed the convention of 1818, according to their instructions, which arrested the line of the 49th degree at the Rocky Mountains, and gave a joint occupation of the country beyond the mountains to both parties. Their instructions authorized them to do this: and the point to be now noted is, that up to the ratification of that convention the line of 49 degrees, as established under the treaty of Utrecht, to define the possessions and limit the acquisitions by discovery of France and Great Britain in North America, remained in full force! That line was in force until we ratified the convention; and, by that line, without regard to other barriers, Great Britain was barred out from all the valley of the Columbia, and all the coast of North America south of 49 degrees. The convention abrogated the line—unhappily abrogated it—from the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific ocean. But it did so with a reservation, that the claims of the parties were not to be affected by it. The abrogation was unfortunate; but the reservation was a stipulation to prevent mischief—a stipulation to baffle the designs of subtle diplomacy, always seeking to deposite the seeds of a new contestation in the simulated settlement of an old one; and it was equivalent to an express declaration that the British claim was to be made no better, and ours to be made no worse, by this arrestation of the line of 49 degrees, and the joint occupation of the Columbia, which resulted from it.

We have now (said Mr. B.) traced the British pretension up to the conclusion of the convention of 1818; and we have seen that, up to the month of July of that year, they had stated or suggested no claim, or even shadow or color of claim, to the Columbia; that, being pressed, they then intimated a claim resting on DISCOVERY and PURCHASE, but without stating a single particular by which this pretended discovery and purchase could be brought to the touchstone of proof and reason. They were evidently absurd, and even ridiculous. All the world knows that Capt. Cook never saw the Columbia!—all the world knows that no other British navigator ever saw it, until after Capt. Gray showed it to them!—and, as for the Indian purchases south of that river, before the Revolution, it is a story of a man in the moon! and has no name, date, place, sum, sign, trace, circumstance, fact, or supposition to rest upon!

The pretension, then, of this right by discovery, and by purchase, so tardily brought forward in October, 1818, are absurdities which the British could not, and did not, support; and which they have since totally abandoned. This abandonment was made in 1827—at the time when the convention of 1818, being about to expire upon its limitation of ten years—was renewed until one of the parties chose to terminate it by giving twelve months' notice. It was made by Messrs. Huskisson and Addington, in their formal negotiations with Mr. Gallatin for the renewal of the convention of 1818. In that negotiation, they delivered a paper to the American negotiator, in which the British claim to the Columbia is referred—and for the first time referred—to the Nootka Sound convention of 1790! Hear it!

"The rights of Great Britain are recorded and defined in the convention of 1790: they embrace the right to navigate the waters of those countries—to settle in and over any part of them, and to trade with the inhabitants and occupiers of the same. These rights have been peaceably exercised ever since the date of that convention; that is, for a period of nearly forty years. Under that convention, valuable British interests have grown up in that quarter."

Here is a complete abandonment of the claim founded on discovery and purchase before the Revolution! That claim, set up for the first time in 1818, is abandoned in 1827!—and the Nootka Sound convention, which had never been vouched before, is then paraded as the instrument in which the "rights" of Great Britain are "recorded" and "defined;" and under which valuable "British" interests had grown up in that quarter. This is, at least, an admission that the discovery and purchase brought forward as the foundation, and the sole foundation, of the British claim in 1818, were unfounded and suppositious! and not only relieves us from all further attention to such intimations, but gives us the benefit of a legal maxim, as universal in its application as it is just and reasonable in its principle!—that maxim which discredits the whole title, in support of which an untruth has been adduced.

But the British "right" to the Columbia now rests upon the Nootka Sound convention; since the year of our Lord 1827, their claim to this country has become a "right," and this "right" has established itself in the musty record of the Nootka Sound convention! Be it so! We will quickly see what that convention is worth to them. For that purpose we may look to the convention itself, or to the character of it given in the British House of Commons at the time of its negotiation. The first article of the treaty restored the British to their fishing and hunting privileges and buildings in Nootka Sound. The third article granted the limited privilege of fishing and hunting on certain other parts of the coast; and the sixth article limited the buildings which might be erected to the temporary huts necessary for the hunters and fishermen. This was the treaty. Listen to Mr. Fox. After denouncing the treaty as one of CONCESSIONS, and not of ACQUISITIONS, on the part of Great Britain, he goes on to say:

"Our right before, was to settle in any part of the south or northwest coast of America, not fortified against us by previous occupancy; and we are now restricted to settle in certain places only, and under certain restrictions. This was an important concession on our part." . . . .
"Our right of making settlements was not, as now, a right to build huts, but to plant colonies, if we thought proper." . . . .
"By the 3d article, we are authorized to navigate the Pacific ocean and South seas, unmolested, for the purpose of trading with the natives. But, after this pompous recognition of right to navigation, fishery, and commerce, comes another article, (the sixth,) which takes away the right of landing and erecting even temporary huts, for any purpose but that of carrying on the fishery; and amounts to a complete dereliction of all right to settle in any way for the purpose of commerce with the natives."

This was the language of Mr. Fox; and under this language Mr. Pitt (the author of the convention) sunk down and admitted that no new rights were gained under the treaty! that nothing had been gained but the acknowledgment of the pre-existing right of fishing, trading, and navigating the Pacific ocean.! Hear him:

"In answer to this, Mr. Pitt maintained that, though with this country had gained consisted not of new rights, it certainly did of new advantages. We had before a right to the Southern whale fishery, and a right to navigate and carry on fisheries in the Pacific ocean, and to trade on the coasts of any part of Northwest America; but that right not only had not been acknowledged, but disputed and resisted; whereas, by the convention, it was secured to us—a circumstance which, though no new right, was a new advantage."

This (said Mr. B.) is the Nootka Sound treaty which is now relied upon to establish the British right to the Columbia. Under this treaty they have taken possession of the Columbia, although 500 miles from Nootka, and having no connexion with it. Under this treaty a British colony is growing up there; and in protection of this colony, the British now declare their determination to maintain their ground. The same paper from Mr. Huskisson and Mr. Addington, which vouched the Nootka convention for the record and the definition of the "right," proceeds to say:

"Under that convention, valuable British interests have grown up in these countries. . . . . .
In the interior of the country in question, the subjects of Great Britain have had for many years settlements and trading posts. Several of these posts are on the tributary streams of the Columbia; several upon the Columbia itself; some to the northward, and others to the southward of that river. And they navigate the Columbia as the sole channel for the conveyance of their produce to the British stations nearest the sea, and for the shipments of it from thence to Great Britain. It is also by the Columbia that these posts and settlements receive their annual supplies from Great Britain. . . . . .
To the interests and establishments which British industry and enterprise have created, Great Britain owes protection. That protection will be given both as regards SETTLEMENT and FREEDOM of TRADE and NAVIGATION, with every attention not to infringe the co-ordinate rights of the United States; it being the desire of the British Government, so long as the joint occupancy continues, to regulate its own obligations by the same rules which govern the obligations of every other occupying party."

Have grown up there, and will be protected! British interests have grown up on the Columbia, and the British Government owes protection to these interests, and will give it! This is now the language of British ministers; and this is what we have got for forty years' forbearance to assert our title! The nest-egg laid by British diplomacy, has undergone incubation, and has hatched, and has produced a full-grown bird—a game cock—which has clapped his wings and crowed defiance in the face of the American eagle! and this poor eagle, in a view could be got of him as he stood during the "informal conferences" between Mr. Webster and Lord Ashburton, would be found (no doubt) to have stuck his head under his wing, and hung out the white and craven feather.

British interests have grown up on both sides of the Columbia—to the south as well as to the north of the river—and it is the intention of the British Government to protect the whole. So say Mr. Huskisson and Mr. Addington. But this is diplomacy—modern diplomacy—equivalent to finesse. The south of the Columbia has not been seized to be retained, but to be given up! The north is to be retained, for that is the commanding bank. The south is only seized to be given up as an equivalent, according to the modern system of compromising, so successfully introduced in the case of Maine. Seize all! then give back half! call this a compromise! and there will be people (for the minds of men are various)—there will be people to applaud the fine arrangement, and to thank God for such a happy deliverance from war. No, sir, no. This is a joke about holding on to the south bank. The settlements made there are for surrender, not for retention. They are made there to be given up as equivalents for what is taken from us on the north, and thus settle the Columbia question according to the precedent of Maine.

But the settlements on the north bank: their protection is no joke. The British mean to hold on to them, for they command the remainder. The Nootka Sound controversy is to have the effect upon us which it could not have upon the Spaniards forty years ago. In vain the lighted match was brandished over the British cannon in the affair of Nootka in 1790; in vain immediate and bloody war was threatened. The Spanish Government, though old, decrepid, and tottering under the feeble sway of Charles IV. and the favorite Godoy, had yet too much of the Castilian blood in it to prefer dishonor to war. They prepared for war! and the ritish, seeing that the Don could not be bullied, linquished their high pretensions of colonization id settlement, and accepted the humble privilege fishing, and hunting, and sailing the high seas. his is the way the old Nootka controversy between pain and England ended fifty years ago. After e experiment which the British have just made our peace-loving temper, it is not to be supposed at we shall get out of the new Nootka scrape ithout seeing the match applied to the priming, having the cup of dishonor held to our lips until e drink it to the dregs.

The origin and the character of these establishents on the Columbia, which the British Governent avows its determination to protect, I now roceed to show; and for that purpose will have recourse to the letters of Mr. John Jacob Astor, ddressed to the Department of State, and giving account of his settlement on that river, and the tempts of the British fur company to break it up fore the war, and their success in doing so after e war commenced, and by the aid of their Govrnment. It was in the spring of 1811 that the ship onquin, despatched from New York by Mr. Asr, carrying 20 guns and 60 men, and an over-land arty of 100 men, led by Mr. Wilson P. Hunt, arved on the Columbia, and built the fort called storia, near its mouth, and trading posts in the nterior. There were no British establishments en upon the river! But the moment the Hudson ay Company heard of Mr. Astor's enterprise, they ommenced their system of encroachment upon it. now read from his letters:

"It is well known that as soon as the Northwest Company had nformation of my intentions, and plan for conducting my comercial operations, they despatched a party of men from the inerior, with a view to arrive before my people at Columbia. hese men were obliged to return without effecting their obct. In the mean time, representations were made to their overnment as to the probable effect of my operations on their nterests, and requesting to interfere in their behalf. This being in time of peace, the Government did not deem it advisable o do so. So soon, however, as war was declared, these representations were renewed. Aid was asked from the Governent; and it was granted. The Phœbe frigate, and sloops-of-ar Racoon and Porcupine, were sent from England, with orers to proceed to Columbia river and destroy my property. hey sailed from England early in January, 1813. Arriving at lo de Janeiro, Admiral Dickson ordered the Phœbe frigate, ith one of the sloops, to pursue Captain Porter, in the frigate Essex, and the sloop-of-war Racoon, to the Columbia river. he arrived there, took possession in the name of the King, and hanged the name of the place (Astoria) to Fort George. * * * * * The plan by me adopted was such as must ave materially affected the interest of the Northwest and Hudon Bay Companies; and it was easy to be foreseen that they ould employ every measure to counteract my operations; and hich, as my impressions, I stated to the Executive as early as ebruary, 1811, as will be seen by the copy of a letter which I rote to the Secretary of State; to which no reply was given. o repeated application, some time after, aid was promised me; but I believe the situation of the country rendered it inconvenient to give it." * * * * * * "I believe, at present, February, 1813,) there is no post or establishment on the Columbia river but the one here spoken of, (Astoria,) though I am pretty sure the Northwest Company will endeavor to fix one, as I have just now a letter from London dated November 19th, 1812,) which says the Northwest Company are fitting the ship Isaac Todd, of about 500 tons, to go to the northwest coast. The writer does not say under what circumstances the ship goes; but that she will go to Columbia river, there can be no doubt. I pray you, sir, to have the goodness to bring this subject under the consideration of the President," &c.

Mr. B. read other passages from Mr. Astor's letters, explanatory of his enlarged and liberal views in making the establishment at the mouth of the Columbia river, and said they showed him to be a statesman as well as an able merchant. He also passed a high encomium on the character of Mr. Wilson P. Hunt, who led the overland expedition of 100 men to the Columbia in 1811, and who, notwithstanding his political opposition, was kept in the best federal office in the State of Missouri (the St. Louis post office) eleven and a half years out of the twelve that Gen. Jackson and Mr. Van Buren were Presidents. Having done this justice to Mr. Astor, and his agent, Mr. Hunt, (the first projector, and the first founder of a white settlement on the Columbia river,) Mr. B. returned to the immediate object of his quotations from Mr. Astor's letters: they were to show that he made the first settlement on the Columbia—that there was then no British settlement upon it—that the British fur companies went to work immediately to break him up—that he resisted them during the peace, but sunk under them during the war, the British Government having come to their aid. The capture of his post was an act of war, done by a British sloop of war; and as a place so captured, it was bound to be restored at the peace. The Ghent treaty stipulated for the restitution, and it was restored. But here a fraudulent evasion of the treaty was immediately perpetrated. The fort Astoria was given up; and the clear intention of the restitution was that the fort represented the country, and that, in its surrender, the country should be given up. This was the clear intent of the treaty; not so the conduct of the British! They gave up the little fort itself, and immediately built a better one, in a better position higher up the river; and then established a chain of posts from the tide-water to the mountains, and on both sides of the river. These are the establishments which Mr. Huskisson and Mr. Addington say have grown up under the Nootka convention, and to which the British Government owes protection, and intends to give it! These are the establishments with respect to which that arrogant language was used, and which, in fact, are not within 500 miles of Nootka Sound, and have no connexion with it. They are wilful encroachments upon our known territory!—they are flagrant intrusions upon our settlements!—they are fraudulent evasions of the treaty of Ghent!—and they are taking the character of permanent possession and national colonies, while the Nootka Sound convention, under which they are alleged (absurdly alleged) to have grown up, would only have justified temporary huts upon the coast, for the personal accommodation of hunters and fishermen while pursuing their craft. Major Pilcher, late superintendent of Indian affairs at St. Louis, (removed for his politics and his friendship to me,) and who visited the Columbia in 1829, thus speaks of the principal of these establishments, such as it was at that time:

"This fort is on the north side of the Columbia, nearly opposite the mouth of the Multnomah, in the region of tide-water, and near the head of ship navigation. It is a grand position, both in a military and commercial point of view, and formed to command the whole region watered by the Columbia and its tributaries. The surrounding country, both in climate and soil, is capable of sustaining a large population; and its resources in timber give ample facilities for ship-building. This post is fortified with cannon; and, having been selected as the principal or master position, no pains have been spared to strengthen and improve it. For this purpose, the old post near the mouth of the river has been abandoned. About 120 acres of ground are in cultivation; and the product in wheat, barley, oats, corn, potatoes, and other vegetables, is equal to what is known in the best parts of the United States. Domestic animals are numerous—the horned cattle having been stated to me at 300; hogs, horses, sheep, and goats, in proportion; also, the usual domestic fowls: everything, in fact, indicating a permanent establishment. Ship-building has commenced at this place. One vessel has been built and rigged, sent to sea, and employed in the trade of the Pacific ocean. I also met a gentleman, on my way to Lake Winnipec, at the portage between the Columbia and Athabasca, who was on his way from Hudson's Bay to Fort Colville, with a master ship-carpenter, and who was destined for Fort Vancouver, for the purpose of building a ship of considerable burden. Both grist and saw mills have been built at Fort Vancouver: with the latter, they saw the timber which is needed for their own use, and also for exportation to the Sandwich Islands; upon the former, their wheat is manufactured into flour. And, from all that I could learn, this important post is silently growing up into a colony; and is, perhaps, intended as a future military and naval station, which was not expected to be delivered up at the expiration of the treaty which granted them a temporary and joint possession."

Such are the nature, origin, and present condition of the British establishments on the Columbia. They are intrusions upon our known territory—tortious aggressions before the war on Mr. Astor's settlement—fraudulent evasions of the treaty of Ghent—and have no more to do with the Nootka Sound convention than they have with the late treaty of China. Nootka is in vain invoked to cover these encroachments upon us—encroachments for which British diplomacy has been endeavoring above thirty years to prepare the way—in which the powerful Hudson Bay Company has acted as the agent of the Government—and for the protection of which company the British ministers now boldly hurl defiance in our faces. There is nothing in the Nootka treaty to cover all this, even if it was not abrogated by war; and it remains to be seen whether the threat of war is to have an effect upon this vigorous young Republic of eighteen millions of people, which it failed to have over the decaying Spanish monarchy in 1790.

Fort Vancouver is but one of the British establishments on the Columbia: they have a connected chain of these settlements, stretching from tidewater to the mountains, and connecting with the interior posts which extend from Canada and from Hudson's Bay. They have the possession of the country: while the possession by right, by treaties, and by the admission of the British themselves, belongs to us. This was admitted during the negotiations of 1818. Mr. Rush, in a letter to Mr. Adams, of February, 1818, bears testimony to this admission. He says:

"It is proper, at this stage, to say that Lord Castlereagh admitted, in the most ample extent, our right to be reinstated, and to be the party in possession while treating of the title."

This was the admission of Lord Castlereagh while negotiating the convention of 1818. He had admitted our right to be reinstated—that is, to be restored to the possession which we had before the war, and of which war had deprived us. This possession was not limited to the diagram of earth covered by Mr. Astor's fort, but to the country of which it was part. To give up this diagram covered by a fort, and then go and take possession of all the country besides, was not a restitution, no more than it would have been to have taken possession of Michigan after giving up Mackinaw, or of Maine, after giving up Castine. We have a right to the possession, while treating of the title; but we have not the possession; and this bill, which proposes merely to obtain a part of what is due to us, is resisted because it implies the assertion of an exclusive possession, and may be a breach of the convention of 1818. This is a mistake. Exclusive can only be to the extent occupied. The British now have exclusive possession of the ground covered by Fort Vancouver, Fort Colville, and other forts, and of all the ground which they cultivate. They have forts, houses, fields, and farms, and possess them exclusively. Our grants will be no more exclusive than theirs: they will only exclude to the extent of the grant.

The objection to the terms of this bill grow out of the third article of the convention of 1818—that article which gives mutuality of occupancy, for certain purposes, to the country claimed by each party, for ten years; an article which is continued indefinitely by the convention of 1828, subject to determination on one year's notice from either party. It is supposed that that article will prevent us from using our own property as we might have used it before that convention was made. This is a mistake; and the reading of the article itself will show that its object was to give the privileges of hunting, fishing, and navigation to the citizens and subjects of each power over the territories claimed by the other, without diminishing the power of each over the territories claimed by itself. This is clear from the article, which is in these words:

"It is agreed that any country that may be claimed by either party on the northwest coast of America, westward of the Stony Mountains, shall, together with its harbors, bays, and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers within the same, be free and open for the term of ten years from the date of the signature of this convention, to the vessels, citizens, and subjects of the two powers; it being well understood that this agreement is not to be construed to the prejudice of any claim which either of the two high contracting parties may have to any part of said country; nor shall it be taken to affect the claims of any other power or State to any part of the said country; the only object of the high contracting parties, in that respect, being to prevent disputes and differences amongst themselves."

This (said Mr. B.) is clear and explicit. We acquire the right of going upon the British claims to hunt, fish, and navigate: they acquire the right to come upon our claims for the same purposes: the claims of each remaining precisely as they were. This is all clear. Now, what were the claims of each at that time? Ours was territorial, and definite and notorious to the Columbia river, from its head to its mouth. The letter of Mr. Adams to our ministers in London, and their letters to him, show that the British had no such claim; that they pretended none such; but only labored to abrogate the line of forty-nine degrees, and to lay a nest-egg for future pretensions south of that line. Their claims were in the northwest—far in the northwest—where McKenzie, Hearne, and other discoverers had gone, and where the fur companies had taken possession. Our claim covered the whole Columbia. Mutuality of occupancy in each other's claimed territories for ten years, without diminution of rights over our own claimed territories, was the extent of the stipulation; and, therefore, we might do upon our claim whatever we did before, subject to the navigation, trade, &c., with which it was encumbered. We might grant land before the convention; we can grant it since. We might plant a colony before the convention, and may do it since; and the grant of land is the incident of colonization. In fact, we have placed no limitation upon our pre-existing rights.

And now, what has been the conduct of the British under this article? They have crossed the 49th degree—come down upon the Columbia—taken possession of it from the head to the mouth—fortified and colonized it—monopolized the fur trade—driven all our traders across the mountains—killed more than a thousand of them, (through their Indians,) and used the Columbia as a free port, through which they bring goods free of duty into our territories—up into the Rocky Mountains, and across them. This is what they have done by their agent, the Hudson Bay Company. In its own name, and by an act of Parliament immediately after the convention, the British Government has extended jurisdiction over the whole country, taking no notice at all of our claims, and subjecting all our citizens and their property to British judges, British courts, and appeals to Canada. This act has been read by my colleague, [Mr. LINN,] and I commend it to the consideration of all Americans who object to this bill for fear it may imply an exclusive jurisdiction! and so give offence to the British. This is what has been done by the British since the convention. They have taken possession of our claimed territory, of our harbor, our river—colonized the country—and killed and expelled our traders. What have we done? Nothing! So far from going into the Northwest to hunt, fish, and navigate on their claims, we have been expelled from our own! and the mutual convention has become the means of the exclusive possession of the British! Our traders, left to contend single-handed against the organized Hudson Bay Company, against their Indians, against their free goods, have all been driven in—forced not only out of the valley of the Columbia, but out of the Rocky Mountains—and ruin has overtaken many of them. Even the strong and rich company of Mr. Chouteau can no longer approach the Rocky Mountains. The Hudson Bay traders are the masters there. Every American that approaches that region, does so at the peril of his life. Many were killed there this summer. And, in the face of all this, we sit here, fearing to pass this bill, lest it may give offence to the British.

It is time to terminate this convention of 1818; it is time to terminate the discreditable state of things in relation to the Columbia. It is a war subject, and the peace mission should have terminated it! No earthly consideration should have detached this question from the Maine boundary, and the other subjects of complaint. To separate them, was to surrender all the unsettled questions. The Columbia, and the Southern question in relation to slaves, were separated; and in that separation their sacrifice, or a war on account of them, was involved. The President, in his message recommending the peace treaty, informs us that the Columbia was the subject of "informal conferences" between the negotiators of that treaty; but that it could not then be included among the subjects of formal negotiation. This was an ominous announciation, and should have opened the eyes of the President to a great danger. If the peace mission, which came here to settle everything, and which had so much to gain in the Maine boundary and the African alliance;—if this mission could not agree with us about the Columbia, what mission ever can? To an inquiry from the Senate to know the nature and extent of these "informal conferences" between Mr. Webster and Lord Ashburton, and to learn the reason why the Columbia question could not have been included among the subjects of formal negotiation—to these inquiries, the President answers, that it is incompatible with the public interest to communicate these things. This is a strange answer, and most unexpected. We have no political secrets in our country, neither among ourselves nor with foreigners. On this subject of the Columbia, especially, we have no secrets. Everything in relation to it has been published. All the conferences heretofore have been made public. The protocols, the minutes, the conversations, on both sides, have all been published. The British have published their claim, such as it is: we have published ours. The public documents are full of them, and there can be nothing in the question itself to require secrecy. The negotiator, and not the subject, may require secrecy. Propositions may have been made, which no previous administration would tolerate, and which it may be deemed prudent to conceal until it has taken the form of a stipulation, and the cry of war can be raised to ravish its ratification from us. All previous administrations, while claiming the whole valley of the Columbia, have refused to admit a particle of British claim south of 49 degrees. Mr. Adams, under Mr. Monroe, peremptorily refused to submit any such claim even to arbitration. The Maine boundary, settled by the treaty of 1783, had been submitted to arbitration; but this was refused. And now, if, after all this, any proposition has been made by our Government to give up the north bank of the river, I, for one, shall not fail to brand such a proposition with the name of treason.

This pretension to the Columbia is an encroachment upon our rights and possession. It is a continuation of the encroachments which Great Britain systematically practises upon us. Diplomacy and audacity carry her through, and gain her position after position upon our borders. It is in vain that the treaty of 1783 gave us a safe military frontier. We have been losing it ever since the late war, and are still losing it. The commission under the treaty of Ghent took from us the islands of Grand Menan, Campo Bello, and Indian island, on the coast of Maine, and which command the bays of Fundy and Passamaquoddy. Those islands belonged to us by the treaty of peace, and by the laws of God and Nature; for they are on our coast, and within wading distance of it. Can we not wade to these islands? [Looking at Senator WILLIAMS, who answered, "We can wade to one of them."] Yes, wade to it! And yet the British worked them out of us; and now can wade to us, and command our land, as well as our water. By these acquisitions, and those of the late treaty, the Bay of Fundy will become a great naval station to overawe and scourge our whole coast, from Maine to Florida. Under the same commission of the Ghent treaty, she got from us the island of Boisblanc, in the mouth of the Detroit river, and which commands that river and the entrance into Lake Erie. It was ours under the treaty of 1783; it was taken from us by diplomacy. And now an American ship must pass between the mouths of two sets of British batteries—one on Boisblanc; the other directly opposite, at Malden; and the two batteries within three or four hundred yards of each other. Am I right as to the distance? [Looking at Senator WOODBRIDGE, who answered, "The distance is three hundred yards."] Then comes the late treaty, which takes from us (for I will say nothing of what the award gave up beyond the St. John) the mountain frontier, 3,000 feet in height, 150 miles long, approaching Quebec and the St. Lawrence, and, in the language of Mr. Featherstonhaugh, "commanding all their communications, and commanding and overawing Quebec itself." This we have given up; and, in doing so, have given up our military advantages in that quarter, and placed them in the hands of Great Britain, to be used against ourselves in future wars. The boundary between the Lake Superior and the Lake of the Woods has been altered by the late treaty, and subjected us to another encroachment, and to the loss of a military advantage, which Great Britain gains. To say nothing about Pigeon river as being or not being the "long lake" of the treaty of 1783; to say nothing of that, there are yet two routes commencing in that stream—one bearing far to the south, and forming the large island called "Hunter's." By the old boundary, the line went the northern route; by the new, it goes to the south; giving the British a large scope of our territory, (which is of no great value;) but giving them, also, the exclusive possession of the old route, the best route, and the one commanding the Indians, which is of great importance. Above all, he brings them back to the Grand Portage, on this side of Pigeon river, from which they removed forty years ago to avoid paying duties; and then went to Fort William, beyond the Kamanistequia; he brings back the British fur company, and re-establishes them in the United States. At the same time, while yielding to this encroachment upon us in the Northwest, the American negotiator, disregarding his own witnesses when they would not follow his leading questions to draw testimony favorable to the British,—disregarding these witnesses, the American negotiator, yields to an encroachment in that quarter; grants all that Lord Ashburton asked, and then affects to have made an acquisition there of four millions of acres of fine mineral land! The encroachment now attempted upon the Columbia, is but a continuation of this system of encroachments which is kept up against us, and which, until 1818, labored even to get the navigation of the Mississippi, by laboring to make the line from the Lake of the Woods reach its head spring. If Great Britain had succeeded in getting this line to touch the Mississippi, she was then to claim the navigation of the river, under the law of nations, contrary to her doctrine in the case of the people of Maine and the river St. John. The line of the 49th parallel of north latitude is another instance of her encroaching policy; it has been mutilated by the persevering efforts of British diplomacy; and the breaking of that line was immediately followed by the most daring of all her encroachments—that of the Columbia river.

Besides encroaching upon our borders, Great Britain is using all her own advantages in the same hostile sense. Bermuda, opposite the Southern coast, is made a vast place of arms. Nassau, New Providence, almost in sight of Florida, is made the same; the lines of steamers to Halifax and to the West Indies, commanded by naval officers and fitted for war, are all preparations against us. All around us—north, south, east, west—Great Britain is surrounding us, and encroaching upon us. Like a vast boa constrictor, she is involving us in her folds, and twisting herself all around us! and we sit here fearing to exercise our own rights, lest we give her offence! We are beleaguered, blockaded, hedged in, circumvented on all sides; yet fear to warn the intruder from our premises.

We fear war! as if the fear of war ever kept it off. We fear war! while Great Britain is systematically preparing for war with us. All her encroachments upon us show that she is preparing for this result. Why else this eternal pressure upon us! We do not go to the islands on the British coasts to obtain commanding positions against her. No other power in the world comes here to encroach upon us. Why does she come, except with hostile intents! She is preparing for war; and the late treaty is the largest of all her preparations. It pacifies the Northern States, leaving the South and West in the lurch; while the new corn law gives them virtually a free trade, and a separate trade in the great staples of grain and provisions. Henceforth they must have a separate interest in peace with Great Britain. The Union has ceased to be a unit in its complaints against that power!

Great Britain is preparing for war against us, and is manœuvring to get the advantage in the cause; to find a pretext in the question of slavery—a question in which she would have the sympathies of all the world, and much of this Union, on her side. Hence her invention of the new claim of visiting our ships on the coast of Africa—a claim which is a branch of the impressment claim, and which the tribute of the five years eighty-gun squadron has purchased off for the present. As a nation, Great Britain despises and hates our nation. There may be individual Englishmen who have regard for individual Americans; but, as it concerns nation and nation, they despise and hate us! They want war with us; and count upon its being short and triumphant. They count upon raising a San Domingo insurrection in the South, arming all the Indians of North America against us, and crushing the paper fabric of our finances. This is their count. We should count upon expelling them from our continent, giving liberty to Ireland, and aiding the English people to reform their Government. Sooner or later, war will come, for Great Britain is determined upon it; and we should roll back the thunder upon her own shores. Thirty thousand friends of Ireland landed on her coast, and forming the rallying-point for a million of patriots, would make that devoted island free, and shake OLD ENGLAND to her centre. These are my sentiments; and I neither dissemble nor deny them. Peace is our policy. War is the policy of England; and war with us is now her favorite policy. Let it come, rather than dishonor! The man is alive, and with a beard on his face, (though it may not be I,) who will then see an American army in Ireland, and an American general in the streets of London.

SPEECH OF MR. LINN,

OF MISSOURI.

In Senate, Monday, January 9, 1843.—The bill for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon being under discussion, and on its passage—

Mr. LINN, in reply to the Senators from South Carolina and Massachusetts, [Messrs. CALHOUN and CROATE] addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The Senator from South Carolina has given a brief, but very admirable analysis of the English and American claims to the Territory of Oregon; and spoken with great force and truth of the rapid advance of our population to the West, which may well be compared to the rolling on of a great and wide stream. Yes, its march is onward to the West—to the far West; and can only be stayed by the waters of the great Pacific. You might as well attempt to dam the course of the turbulent Mississippi, as to arrest the onward march of this restless people. The puny arm of man is too feeble for such an overwhelming power: fter achieving the independence of the old thirteen tates, and scaling the Alleghany Mountains, they re rapidly filling up the magnificent valley of the fissisippi with a prosperous, happy, and intelli- ent race of beings, who have subdued the savages f the forest; made the wilderness blossom like the se; built villages and churches, towns and cities; ade roads; cut canals; endowed colleges, and tun- elled mountains.

The borders of the mighty rivers of the West are dorned, even at this early day, with everything to ake life happy; and these elongated oceans bear n their bosoms floating palaces, animate with gay assengers; and freighted with their own, and the ch productions of every clime and country. This eople, imbued with a spirit that holds in contempt l obstacles to their onward march, are now moving p the inclined plane of the vast Western prairies, nd in a few years will reach the gorges and passes f the Rocky Mountains from whence, they will recipitate themselves into the fertile region and ild climate of the Territory of Oregon, trampling nder their feet all opposition to their progress. But, otwithstanding, the policy of the Government it- elf has, in the disposition made of all the Indian ibes of the interior States, raised up an artificial arrier, which for the present has stopped the natural pread of our population to the West. On this In- ian frontier, it has reached its limits. This outlet f the West (Oregon) must be opened, or our peo- le will soon break across the bounds within which re have pledged ourselves by treaties that the ex- striated Indian tribes shall dwell securely. The regon region must be opened to the adventurous nd migratory spirit of our people; or the collected lood will soon burst over, and sweep away the In- ian, to whom we have solemnly promised an un- isturbed refuge in the home to which we have, by o humane a policy, transplanted him.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] egards this bill as going new and dangerous lengths— angerous to the peace and tranquillity of the two ountries. Yet the bills introduced with the same bject, long since, under the administrations of Mr. lonroe and Mr. Adams, by Doctor Floyd, were far tronger. They provided for the erection of forts nd custom-houses. As for that formidable and erpetual impediment, the treaty, it existed just as uch in force then, as now; and surely those gentle- en might be considered as tolerable judges of the ace of treaty stipulations. Adverting, then, to the nglish claim, as founded on their alleged discovery, Mr. LINN treated the pretended visit of Drake to that ortion of the Northwest coast as altogether prepos- erous. The narrative itself, which describes a re- ion bound up in ribs of ice, in the month of June, akes it impossible for any one now to believe that Drake's visit was to Oregon—a coast never witness- ng such intense cold, even in mid-winter, and sually enjoying the soft temperature of earlier pring. Nor can any more stress be laid upon the al- ged discoveries of Mear's and Vancouver's Lieut. Broughton. But, in truth, this whole British claim s recent. It was never heard of, as against the dis- overy of Captain Gray, or the explorations of Lewis nd Clarke. As late as 1814, the question of our dis- overy was minutely examined in one of the lead- ng British authorities on such questions, and our laim admitted as incontrovertible. After the sur- ender of Astoria during the war, (which place fell nto the hands of the British, through the treachery f Mr. Astor's English partners,) they began to per- eive, in its full extent, the value of this new acquisi- ion; and although it was surrendered to the United States under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, he English began to announce their pretensions to claim—first, through anonymous writers in the Na- ional Intelligencer, at this place, (at the instance, it vas said, of Sir Charles Bagot;) and afterwards by he British authorities, in their formal correspondence vith the United States Government. As to what England may urge in regard to the force of the Nootka Sound treaty with Spain, it is sufficient, at present, to say that any such claim must have fallen with that treaty itself. Temporary in its character, and speedily dissolved by the war which occurred between the two countries soon after, our right, if placed alone on the strong and certain ground of prior discovery, would be as immutable as the everlasting hills.

The Senator from South Carolina has urged that we should, first of all, give the twelve months' no- tice of our renunciation of the treaty. He (Mr. LINN) could only answer that he had repeatedly, by resolutions, urged that course in former years; but always in vain. He had ever been met with the answer: "This is not the proper time—wait." Meanwhile, the adverse possession was going on, fortifying from year to year the British claim and the British resources, to make it good. Mr. Madi- son had encouraged the bold and well-arranged scheme of Astor to fortify and colonize. He was dispossessed; and the nucleus of empire which his establishments formed, passed into the hands of the Hudsons Bay Company, now the great instru- ment of English aggrandizement in that quarter. The Senator insists that, by the treaty, there should be a joint possession. Be it so, if you will. But where is our part of this joint possession? In what does it consist, or has it consisted? We have no posts there, no agent, no military power to protect traders. Nay, indeed, no traders! For they have disappeared before foreign competition; or fallen a sacrifice to the rifle, the tomahawk, or the scalping- knife of those savages whom the Hudson Bay Com- pany can always make the instruments of system- atic massacre of adventurous rivals. Of the extent of these murders, or of the regularity with which they are enacted, the Senator has probably but little notion, unless he has made it the subject of special investigation. I can assure him that, before the year 1829, there had perished in this way, on the plains and in the mountains, as was well ascertained by a committee of this body, full five hundred men; and the yearly slaughter has gone on ever since, ranging between fifteen and twenty men during the year 1842. But, whatever has been the history of your peopling distant regions, will be its history now—every effort to be disputed with something which this Government shrinks from encountering. You have never failed to turn your back upon any such hardy enterprise. The very navigation of the great river of the West, so vital to the prosperity and happiness of the population of the valley of the Mississippi, for thirty years would have been yielded to Spain, under the old articles of confederation, but that it required the assent of nin States to bring it into the validity of a treaty. Six Eastern States were ready to abandon it, for an interest the most wretchedly disproportionate. If that mighty access to a new and a greater empire of the West has been preserved to you, it is in spite of your supineness, in spite of your timidity, in spite of your impolicy.

As for me, (said Mr. L.,) I desire, in this irre- sistible advance of our population, destined to carry to the very verge of the continent the benefits of our free institutions, to march with every public right in the lead, while we carry to those regions of barbarism the press, the ploughshare, and the bible. And I would, even in these great purposes, halt rather than violate our national faith solemnly pledged in a treaty. But I tell the Senator that we cannot thus rigidly adhere to what our rival so lit- tle regards. That Senator does not know, or has overlooked, the progress which English possession has been for near thirty years making against us, under cover of the Hudson Bay Company—the irresponsible instrument of British power in that quarter—by means of which and this treaty we are steadily circumvented. There, as in the East Indies, Britain prepares her way to unchecked dominion, through the stealthy advance of these trading companies, which scatter the seeds that are to spring up into a harvest of power for her.

I insist that the bill does not attempt to dis- possess Great Britain of anything she now holds. It does not define our territory. That we have some there, is certain. Can she object to our set- tling south of the Columbia, on a territory to which, with all her facility of claiming, and tenacity of holding on, she has been willing to surrender? She, herself, has extended her jurisdiction over Oregon,—built forts, set up establishments, settled farms. Why cannot we do the same?

I am glad (said Mr. L.) that the Congress of the United States—at least as far as the expression of opinion has gone—has made some progress in this matter. If the Senators [Messrs. CALHOUN and CHOATE] who have just spoken will turn back to the recorded arguments of 1822, and subsequent years, in Congress, they will find that the reasons they now urge against granting lands, were then used against the proposition to build forts, extend our laws, or erect custom-houses. I now un- derstand these Senators as resting their objections to this bill on the clause granting away lands in the territory—on our obligations under the treaty of 1818, renewed in 1827; and that they do not raise the same objections to our building forts and occu- pying such portions of land as may suit our con- venience. This is reporting some progress, as there existed three objections formerly, and one only is put forward now.

It strikes me, Mr. President,—indeed, I know it to be a fact—that the British Government, as a Government, never has built a fort in the Oregon country. It is plain, then, that if our Government erects fortifications on the Columbia, the same ob- jection may be made by the British Government, which is now made here, with regard to grants of land—that it amounts to the exercise of an exclusive right not authorized by our obligations under the treaty. There is, in fact, no objection which can be urged against our making grants of land, that will not equally apply to our Government building forts, and occupying any part of the soil. It is a mere question of a government doing an act openly and honestly as a government; or doing it covertly, through the agency it has itself created.

The Government of Great Britain has not direct- ly, in its capacity as a Government, built forts, or selected and occupied lands in the territory; but it has encouraged its creature—the Hudson Bay Company—to do these acts; and, when they are done, it tells us openly that British interests have grown up there, which it must and will protect against the world. The facts are indisputable, that forts, called Hudson Bay "trading posts," exist on the Columbia; that the English have selected and occupied lands in which their Government has promised that their interests shall be protected; and that, although our citizens may, in their private ca- pacities, make settlements and occupy lands there also, our Government has failed to promise them the same protection and security promised to the subjects of Great Britain by their Government.

We are, indeed, with some inconsistency, told by the Senators that we may build forts; which ne- cessarily implies the permanent occupation of the sites upon which they are to be built; but we cannot exercise the same power over the contiguous lands, that we do over those on which the forts stand. The principle appears to me to be identically the same, whether we occupy or appropriate one acre or a thousand, or whether the value of the land is little or much. The objection on the score of exclusive appropriation of any part of the territory for Gov- ernmental purposes, is like applicable to our obli- gations under the treaty, if those obligations are in reality susceptible of the construction given to them by the Senators. Great Britain, in her own pur- suits, has not so regarded her obligations under the treaty. And all that I propose to do by this bill is, to take the same steps she has taken; to inter- pret our obligations as she interprets hers; and to offer our citizens the same encouragement and pro- tection she invariably gives to her subjects, through the medium of the Hudson Bay Company.

Why should there be anything offensive to Great Britain in all this? Why should this endanger the peace of the two countries? And if she can be so unreasonable as to conceive offence at it, why should that deter us from doing right—from doing our duty? Are we to wait for her permission?—to submit to her dictation?—to follow in her wake, in re- gard to the construction to be put upon this treaty?— to look to her submissively till she says, You may go so far, but you shall go no farther? No, sir; Mr. L. said he could not, would not believe that any American will, for a moment, entertain the craven thought. He knew something of the colossal power, the boundless energy, and the vast wealth of that little island, fast anchored in the far Atlantic. He knew that, from her isolated sea-girt throne, she overlooks the whole world; and that she has said, and is saying, to the nations of the earth—like one of her monarchs of old to the ocean—"thus far ye shall go, but no farther." But he also knew that we—at least, in times not long past—had refused to bow to her commands, and had set at naught her threats. And he would not now, nor should he ever, as an American citizen, submit to the arrogance of dictation. Either on this, or any other subject of our internal policy, the consideration of her pleasure or displeasure could have no weight with him. Neither as a Senator here, nor as a private citizen elsewhere, would he ever yield one iota of our claim to that territory. It is ours by treaty with France and Spain, by discovery, and by settlement; and he was prepared to take every step in his power to do what is necessary to assert and maintain our title. If, in doing this, we are compelled to approach the verge of war, or plunge in the gulf, let the blame fall on the injustice which drives us to it. He was not insensible to the evils of war. He knew it was a rough game—a scourge to the nations of the earth—and that we must share its miseries as well as its triumphs. He knew, too, that England never wants a pretext for war, when she decides that it is her interest to be the aggressor. If she chooses to make the passage of this bill a pretext, it is the same thing to us as the selection of any other pretext. She makes war or peace, just to suit her own views and further her own policy. She acts for her own interests, regardless of the effects on others. She never asked for our interpretation of the treaty when she encouraged the building of British posts on the Columbia, and the occupation of the whole country through the agency of her fur companies. She did not wait for our permission to build up British interests in the country, which, when erecting, she told us to our teeth she would protect. But we are told on this floor that she construes the treaty to mean a joint occupancy for trading purposes; and we are called upon to interpret it as she does, while we know that her actions do not conform to that interpretation.

I hold (said Mr. L.) that we are to interpret the treaty for ourselves. We witness that, under the mantle of her Hudson Bay Company, Great Britain is spreading her coils around the whole territory; and we know that her policy must eventuate in her obtaining, not a joint occupancy and jurisdiction, but an exclusive possession. Under this cover, she has already done what this bill calls upon you now to do on our part, or weakly to suffer our rights, even under the treaty, to lapse. She has legislated for the jurisdiction of the whole, under the pretext of legislating for the protection of her Hudson Bay Company and its interests.

What is this but the same artful course she pursued in India? For, at first, her movements were under the shadow of her East India Company; until, eventually, she took the reins openly into her own hands, and became the ruler of two hundred millions of subjects entangled in her meshes.

On the banks of the Columbia river, she is laying the foundation for a similar state of things. It is in vain for gentlemen, in their overweening confidence in the national integrity of England, to deny the facts indelibly impressed on the pages of history, which records these transactions.

He would ask the Senators whether she has not taken the course indicated, in relation to India? and whether the increase of her power there was not fostered in the same way that she is now cultivating it on the Columbia? It is a system from which she cannot and will not depart, wherever she is permitted to prosecute it. It is our policy to put a stop to that system in the Oregon Territory.

In what I have said, I would not wish to be understood as meaning to assert that, in exercising her present authority over this territory, Great Britain would think of dispossessing our citizens already settled there, or preventing our emigrants from becoming new settlers. The result to which her policy must lead, if followed out without interruption, would be, that all settlers—no matter whence they came—should ultimately become her subjects, under the force of circumstances. But what I chiefly insist upon, is, that she has given to the treaty, which we are called upon to respect to the letter, a construction in every way advantageous to herself; and that we, in self-defence, are necessarily obliged to act upon similar views.

It is not pretended by her that we may not settle the country south of the Columbia river; for, since her ultimatum of 1827, in which she proposed to take that stream as her southern boundary, the Hudson Bay Company have actually dropped any pretensions to exclusive right on the southern side. Indeed, her hunters and trappers, after exhausting its fur-bearing animals, have gradually withdrawn from the hills and plains of the south, leaving many regular agricultural settlements in the valley of the Wallamette, where they have farms, and even mills, and have established themselves with increased energy, as if determined to make their settlements permanent on the northern bank of the Columbia. Although this is a disguised admission that they have no right to exclusive appropriation on the south side, it is equally a proof that they do exercise exclusive right over the northern side of the river. But even then they do not give up their jurisdiction over the whole territory down to the 42d degree of latitude, and even to the borders of Missouri and Arkansas.

It has been said by the Senator from Massachusetts, that the British authorities have not construed the treaty so as to confer any joint right but that of trading; and that our exercising the power of granting away lands for agricultural purposes would be subversive of the objects of the treaty, to maintain the right of hunting, trapping, and trading in the country, by the subjects of Great Britain, and citizens of the United States, jointly. But how do the facts square with this assumption? Have not the British extensive and well-cultivated farms on the Columbia? Have they not large tracts to the north of this river, from which they have prohibited all game from being hunted or trapped? Have they not established at home, in the city of London, the Puget Sound Company, with a view of pursuing agriculture on an extensive scale at Forts Nasqually, Colville Walla-walla, and what is called their Colony of Vancouver? Have they not extensive saw-mills, furnishing lumber for exportation from the Columbia river to the Sandwich Islands and elsewhere? Have they not contracts with Russian settlements to the north, for incredible quantities of wheat, butter, pork, beef, salmon, and other products of the country? And will the Senators say that these are legitimate exercises of the right to trap, hunt, and trade in the territory? Does the treaty, providing for the joint use of the country for purposes of trading, trapping, and hunting, give the British a right to turn it into British agricultural settlements, and deny to us the right of making the like appropriation of the soil? What exclusive right did they obtain to cut down, and turn into lumber, for exportation, the timber of the territory? Was there less exercise of exclusive ownership over the timber, than over the forts built of it?

The Senator from Massachusetts says he has no objection to the other portions of the bill, if the grant of lands is stricken out. Does not the Senator see that its whole efficacy would be destroyed by that very operation? It would be a dead letter; for no citizens of the United States would have sufficient inducement to abandon the certainties which they enjoy at home, for the uncertainties, risks, and expenses of an emigration so distant and dangerous, merely on the assurance of protection from a few widely-scattered military posts. They must have this stimulant, which is the rational and substantial encouragement for an enterprise so great to them as emigrating to a wild country, cut off from friends, kindred, and government, by thousands of miles, and by hordes of savage tribes. Our citizens there, and going there, without the guaranty of this clause of the bill, would be discouraged, and be ultimately rooted out by the British, to whom the Indians are tributary. Give them the land, and they will hold it.

We have raised a barrier against our own onward march westward, by the Indian tribes planted on our territorial borders. They are there open to a foreign subsidy, for impeding our accession to our ocean limits; and it has become of vital interest to our safety to acquire an ascendency over these treacherous and dangerous neighbors. That ascendency can only be acquired and preserved by placing our population, in part, beyond them, and securing our avenues of intercourse with our distant territory. And we cannot plant any of our population there, without giving that encouragement for colonization, which it has been the uniform practice of every civilized nation to hold out in such cases.

That we have the right to give all that encouragement which this bill proposes, he (Mr. L.) had no more doubt, than he had of our title to some of the Oregon Territory—a matter that never has been, and never can be, disputed with truth.

SPEECH OF MR. GIDDINGS, OF OHIO.

In the House of Representatives, January 14, 1843.—On the bill for the relief of the people of West Florida.

Mr. GIDDINGS said that a gentleman not now in his seat (the Hon. WM. B. CALHOUN, of Massachusetts) had intended to present some objections to the bill now before the House. As that gentleman (said he) is absent, I feel it my duty to state such objections as exist in my own mind. In order to be understood, I will briefly relate some historical facts that have a bearing on the subject. As early as 1811 Congress, by secret resolution, authorized the President to take possession of the Floridas, "in case an arrangement could be made with the local authorities of the provinces for delivering possession of the same, or any part thereof, to the United States." By virtue of this act, Gen. Matthews invaded East Florida in the year 1812. While there, the men under his command committed all those depredations which too commonly attend the march of an invading army. They were not restrained by the laws of the Territory, nor by those of necessity. They took property which we never furnish for our troops, and for which, when taken from our citizens by our officers or soldiers, we grant no compensation. Nor did they stop here. They went further, and interfered with the personal relations of the people, and brought away their slaves. What disposition was made of the slaves does not appear. I fear they were not restored to liberty. They were probably held in servitude by their captors, and they, or their descendants, are most likely in bondage in that Territory or some neighboring State. In 1814 General Jackson invaded the Territory of West Florida, and similar depredations were committed by the troops under his command. In 1818 he again invaded East Florida, where like depredations were committed.

In 1819 the United States, by her then Secretary of State, John Quincy Adams, entered into a treaty with his Catholic Majesty, acting by his Minister Plenipotentiary, Don Onis, by which Florida was ceded to the United States.

The last clause of the ninth article of the treaty is as follows:

"The United States will cause satisfaction to be made for the injuries, if any, which by process of law shall be established to have been suffered by the Spanish officers, and the individual Spanish inhabitants, by the late operations of the American army in Florida."

In 1823, Congress passed a law to carry into effect this clause of the treaty. At this time all departments of the Government appear to have concurred in their construction of this provision of the treaty. They limited it to the operations of the American army in 1818, under General Jackson, as its terms plainly import. But I understand that all payment for slaves killed or stolen either by the army, or by the followers of General Jackson's camp, was refused by the Treasury Department. The people of Florida, however, were not satisfied with this limitation, particularly those who had suffered under the invasion by General Matthews. They applied for indemnity also under the law, and their claims were rejected. They then applied to Congress for relief; and in 1834, another law was passed for the purpose of extending indemnity to those who suffered losses by the operations of the army under General Matthews in 1812 and in 1818.

This was an act entirely gratuitous. The losses occasioned by the army under General Matthews had not been embraced in the treaty; and Congress went altogether beyond our stipulations with Spain, in passing the law of 1834.

Under this law, as well as that of 1823, all kinds of property were paid for; but no payments were made, as I understand, for persons who had been either killed or stolen, up to the year 1838, when the Secretary of the Treasury found himself so strongly beset by slaveholders, who claimed to have lost slaves during the campaigns in East Florida under General Matthews and General Jackson, that he referred the subject to the then Attorney General, Felix Grundy, who seems to have arrived at the very satisfactory conclusion that men were property, (vide opinions of the Attorney General, vol. 3, Ex. Doc. 2d session 26th Congress.) He seems not only to have considered men as property, but he appears to have supposed that stealing them constituted a part of the operations of our armies in Florida. This learned opinion was deemed satisfactory, and the doors of our treasury were thrown open to the slaveholders, and the money acquired by the toil of Northern freemen was handed over in payment for the bones and sinews of their fellow-men.

This, sir, is the history; and we are now asked to take another step, and pay for the losses sustained in West Florida by reason of the invasion of General Jackson in 1814. We are, by this bill, not only asked to pay for all property used, taken, and destroyed by his army, and by the followers of his camp; but we are asked to pay for the slaves killed and stolen by his army, and those who followed it.

The House will bear in mind that the Government holds itself responsible only for the authorized acts of its agents. The commander of an army may impress provisions for its support, if they are not furnished by the Government; or he may impress teams to transport his baggage and arms when they are not otherwise provided. But he cannot go beyond that, and take property not allowed to an army by the laws of the country. If he take my family pictures, or any other articles which we do not ordinarily provide for our armies, it is a trespass, for which he alone is liable. As before remarked, I understand that property of every description was paid for under these acts of Congress, whether it was taken by order of the commanding officer, or by the followers of the camp; or whether it was property ordinarily allowed to an army, or such articles as we never furnish to our troops.

This practice of the Government with our own citizens is the same as in private life. If our agent keep within the bounds of his authority, we hold ourselves responsible for his acts; if he transcend his authority, we are not bound. Now, if the House desire to go further than we have been accustomed to go with our own citizens, and grant to the people of Florida indemnity for all acts committed by our army, or by those who followed the camp of General Jackson, upon property which they were authorized to take, or upon that which they had no authority to take, I shall not object. It is to that feature in the bill which seeks to grant to the people of West Florida indemnity for the slaves stolen by the army, and by the followers of the army, under General Jackson in 1814, to which I object. I oppose this provision of the bill, for the reason that it seeks to overturn the entire practice of Congress since the adoption of the Constitution; and, in my opinion, is in palpable violation of the constitutional rights of the people of the free States. It is, therefore, an unyielding sense of duty that constrains me to oppose the passage of this bill—a bill which is to take from the pockets of my constituents, and of the people of the free States, their money, and apply it in payment for human flesh. I do it from no wish to stir up strife, by agitating what is generally called "the delicate question;" but I do it in defence of the constitutional rights of the people of the free States. I deem the subject of paramount importance to the nation, and particularly to those States.

I have had no agency in bringing forward this bill. That has been done by others. Its passage is urged upon us; and we must silently permit it to become a law; or we must array ourselves in opposition to its further progress. Gentlemen from the free States must select the position which they desire to occupy. They must, by their votes, aid in taking money from the pockets of their constituents, and handing it over to those who claim the bodies, the flesh and blood of their fellow-men, as property; or they must stand forth in defence of the interests and the honor of the Northern States, and of the Federal Constitution. I will remark, further, that these questions of the constitutional rights of the people of the several States in regard to slavery, are pressing upon us from so many directions, that their discussion cannot much longer be delayed. The number of bills now upon our calendar, which involve those questions, forbids all hopes of suppressing the agitation of this matter. Again: if we look for a moment to the various parts of the Union, and mark the feeling that exists both at the North and at the South, the intensity of which is increasing daily, from conflicting interests and collisions of supposed rights, we must conclude that every dictate of patriotism impels us to the speedy adjustment of these difficulties. This feeling is constantly gathering strength throughout our country; and every delay will add to its already accumulated force, and will increase the difficulties of allaying it. I therefore deem the present time the most favorable for adjusting those difficulties, from which we have so long shrunk with a tremulous delicacy. If, however, we have not the moral courage to meet those important questions in this hall, and to decide upon them as statesmen and patriots, it requires no inspiration to foresee that the people will assume to themselves the responsibility which they have assigned to us. I shall not presume to predict the manner of the adjudication, nor when that event shall take place.

Sir, if we pass this bill, shall we not add to the feelings of the North, which have already reached a point where they cannot be trifled with? I ask gentlemen of the North whether they are prepared to take the money of their constituents and pay for slaves killed by the army of General Jackson, or stolen by the followers of his camp? Are gentlemen of either political party, from the free States, prepared to thrust their hands into the pockets of their constituents, for money to hand over to the slaveholders of Florida as a compensation for slaves? If, sir, we are prepared to do this, let us do it openly and fearlessly; let us place ourselves before the world; in that attitude, let there be no dodging or skulking; let us say by our acts that we think our constituents will submit to it; that they have not the spirit to resist, nor the independence to oppose, such violations of their rights;—let this be made the issue, and the result will not be doubtful. In all sincerity, I ask Southern gentlemen if they believe we can compel the sturdy sons of liberty at the North, whose fathers and brothers fell in the late war, and who were thrown pennyless upon the world, to contribute a portion of their property, acquired by toil, to pay the slaveholders of Florida for negroes enticed away by the followers of Gen. Jackson's camp? If we pass this bill in its present form, we shall adopt a new principle into our legislation—one that has not heretofore been known in an American Congress—one that, up to this day, has been denied and repudiated by this House. I trust that gentlemen will notice this important fact, and that they will be prepared to say, by their vote upon the passage of this bill, whether they are willing to overturn the principles which have guided our national legislation for more than half a century. I am not prepared to go into a minute examination of all claims for slaves that have been presented to Congress since the adoption of our Constitution. The leading cases were ably examined by my highly respected predecessor, the Hon. E. Whittlesey, in a report which he, as chairman of the Committee of Claims, made to this House in 1830, (vide 3d vol. Reports, 1st session 21st Congress, No. 401.) I will send this report to the Clerk's table, with a request that he will read it to the House. [The Clerk here read the report of the Committee of Claims, made upon the memorial of Francis Larch. When the reading was closed, Mr. GIDDINGS resumed.]

The case presented by this report is one of the very strongest character. Francis Larch owned a slave, which he held as property under the laws of Louisiana. This slave, while driving a horse and cart belonging to his master, was, on the day of the battle of New Orleans, impressed, with the horse and cart, into the public service, by order of the commanding officer. During the battle, the slave and horse were killed, and the cart destroyed by cannon shot. Mr. Larch applied to Congress for compensation. The Committee of Claims, composed of members both from the slave and the free States, reported unanimously in favor of paying for the horse and cart, and against any compensation for the slave. They came to this conclusion after learning, from the Register of the Treasury, that slaves had never been paid for by the Federal Government during the revolutionary war, nor since that period; and after a careful examination of the action of the House upon this question whenever it had come before them. I commend to the notice of gentlemen the action of this House in 1816, when an attempt was made to grant indemnity for slaves killed in the public service. This attempt was opposed by several Southern members, among whom was Mr. McCoy of Virginia; and such was the force of reasoning brought to bear against the application, that only forty members voted for it. We have the authority of this report, made by Mr. Whittlesey, that, up to the year 1830, no payment for slaves killed in the public service, or otherwise lost to their owners, had ever been authorized by Congress. I have carefully examined the proceedings of this body since the date of this report, and so have other gentlemen; but we have found no instance in which Congress has acknowledged any obligation resting upon the United States to pay for slaves. On the contrary, the records of the Committee of Claims show conclusively that, up to the present Congress, that committee, from 1794, (the date of its earliest record,) has rejected every claim presented to them for compensation on account of slaves lost in the public service, whether they had been impressed into the service, or had entered it by consent of their masters. I therefore say, without hesitation, that, from the meeting of the first Congress, in 1789, up to this day, the practice of Congress on this subject has been uniform. All applications for indemnity for the loss of slaves have been rejected, without exception; and I appeal to gentlemen to maintain inviolate this usage, which, by universal consent, has now become law with us. Lay not violent hands upon a rule thus sanctioned by the wisdom of our predecessors for more than fifty years.

The report which has been read speaks of it as "a delicate question," and of adding to the excitement already existing." The committee, like other members, were in the habit of approaching this subject with a kind of horror which their imaginations seem to have thrown around it. They appear to have been unwilling to examine in detail the principles on which they based their report; but the precedents were established by those who assisted in framing the Constitution. Their examples have been approved and followed down to this day, and, in my opinion, should not now be departed from. Those sages and patriots who framed the Constitution must have understood their own intentions in framing it; and, being guided by the most pure love of country, while subsequently serving in this hall, their decisions on this point are certainly entitled to great weight.

But, overwhelming as the authority of these precedents is, and conclusive as the former practice of this House would seem to be, there are other and far stronger arguments to be drawn from the Constitution itself. But, before entering upon this part of the argument, I propose to examine briefly the maxim which prevails so generally in the slave States, that "slaves are property." This saying is frequently made by gentlemen from the South, and is sometimes repeated by those of the North. The constitution of Ohio declares that "man is created free, and is endowed by his Creator with a right to the uninterrupted enjoyment of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

This constitution my colleagues and myself have often sworn to support. How, then, we can call man property, and say that, as such, he belongs to his fellow-man, is a matter which I cannot readily comprehend. But it is said that Kentucky, and all the other slave States, by their laws, have declared a portion of their people to be the property of the others. Here is the conflict between the laws of Kentucky and Ohio. They are at variance with each other, and cannot be reconciled. Yet, sir, as I prefer the doctrine of our constitution, I may enjoy the blessings of liberty while I remain in that State. If I prefer the slavery of Kentucky, I may go to that State, and participate in its privileges, and live under her laws. While, then, the people of Ohio cannot demand of me the adoption of their political faith—that man is endowed by his Creator with the right to enjoy his life and his liberty—neither can the people of Kentucky force upon me, while a citizen of Ohio, the doctrine that man can hold property in man. These laws of Kentucky are in force within her territory, but not in Ohio. The laws of Ohio are in force within that State, but have no validity in Kentucky. But it is said that we are bound to consider slaves as property, because this law of the slave States has declared them such. If that be the case, then are the people of the slave States bound to consider man free, because the paramount law of Ohio has declared him so. Sir, our law is as binding upon the people of Kentucky, as the laws of that State are upon the people of Ohio. We acknowledge no superiority in our sister State, nor do we claim any for our own. We stand upon the same level, enjoying equal rights, and maintaining an equal independence. If she can demand of us a portion of our substance to pay her people for the loss of slaves, may we not demand of her citizens a portion of their wealth to compensate our people for the loss of our sons, our brothers, our husbands, and fathers, killed in defending her citizens (perhaps her slaves) against a foreign enemy? Is the slave more valuable than a freeman? Or is the loss of a slave of more importance to the country than that of a freeman? Has the nation a deeper interest in the lives of slaves, than it has in those of freemen?

That difference in the laws of the several States existed at the formation of the Constitution. Had the framers of that instrument intended to have overturned the doctrine of the free States, and of the civilized world, in this respect, they would have been likely to leave some evidence of that fact in the Constitution itself, or in the debates of the convention that framed it. The distinction between persons and property was drawn by the hand of God himself, at the creation. That distinction cannot be obliterated by man. "The human form divine" is distinct from all other earthly beings and things. This distinction was sanctioned and established when the voice of the Almighty proclaimed to man, "Have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowls of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth!"

"This," says Sir William Blackstone, "was the origin of property." It is founded upon the command of Heaven, and is totally unconnected with the laws of our slave States. This marked distinction between persons and property has been observed by jurists, statesmen, and writers, from the earliest antiquity to the present day. In 1776, the Congress of these colonies declared "that all men are created equal." The members of the convention that framed the Constitution were profoundly read in natural and municipal law, and well understood this fundamental distinction. Mr. Madison, who is styled "the father of the Constitution," has left on record his opinion, as expressed in the convention. He declared it "wrong to admit slaves to be property." We have no intimation that an individual in the convention differed from him. On this point, so far as our information extends, there was no difference of opinion. On the contrary, we have conclusive evidence that the distinction between persons and property was kept up by the language of the Constitution itself. In every instance where that instrument refers to the unfortunate class of people called slaves, they are characterized as persons. Thus, in fixing the ratio of representation, in the 2d section of the 1st article, they are denominated persons. When it grants to Congress power to suppress the slave-trade, in section 9, article 1, it characterizes them as persons. In section 2, article 4, in providing for the recapture of fugitive slaves, they are again styled persons. But in no instance are they alluded to as property.

It would really seem as though these facts could leave no room for cavil as to the light in which the Constitution of the United States regards them. If the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States could make this question more clear, I might cite the decision of Groves vs. Slaughter, reported in 15th Peters, in which this point came before the court, and it was said by Justice McLean that, although slaves may, by the laws of particular States, be declared property, "yet the Federal Constitution regards them only as persons." But, in my opinion, the language of the Constitution is conclusive, and cannot be made more apparent by argument. In some of the States, slaves are declared property. But the question now before us is, Do these laws overrule the laws of other States? and do they supersede the Federal Constitution? The constitutions of the free States, that of the Federal Government, the opinions of the civilized world, the hand of nature, and the voice of God, have distinguished persons from property; and it is now too late for a particular State to overturn these authorities, and force upon us the new principle that man is property, or that property is man. It cannot be done. My friend in front of me [Mr. HOWARD] says it cannot be done short of a "bill of sale from the Almighty." But, Mr. Speaker, should such an instrument be produced, I would at once deny its authenticity.

[Mr. HOLMES of S. C. called Mr. GIDDINGS to order for sacrilege.

The SPEAKER pro tem. (Mr. MCKENNAN) decided that Mr. GIDDINGS was not out of order, and desired him to proceed.]

Mr. GIDDINGS resumed. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that any gentleman should permit his feelings to become excited at what I was saying. I hope to control my own feelings, let others do as they may. I have said what I desired to say upon the subject of man holding man as property. There is, however, another view of the question to which I wish to call the attention of the House. It is this: that we do not possess the constitutional right to involve the people of the free States in the expense, the disgrace, or the guilt of slavery. With them, it is a matter of principle and of conscience. They will not consent to be involved in slavery, unless they are constitutionally liable to be made participators in that institution.

I deny that they are thus liable. I lay it down as a principle well established—one that is not to be denied or doubted—that, by our Federal Constitution, no power was delegated to Congress to involve the people of the free States in the expense, the guilt, or the disgrace of that institution. I have on a former occasion stated some of my views upon this point; but I trust the House will bear with me, if, upon the present occasion, I again refer to the doctrine which I trust will at no distant day be acknowledged as a fundamental principle of this Government. In order to be understood, I will refer to the situation of the several States prior to the adoption of the Constitution. At that period, each State exercised supreme and unlimited power over the institution of slavery within its own limits. Each possessed the power to continue or abolish it without interference or interruption from any other power on earth. Virginia held her slaves subject only to the laws of that State. Massachusetts enjoyed her freedom in the same unlimited and supreme degree. Virginia could not call upon Massachusetts to share with her any portion of the expense, the disgrace, or the guilt of slavery. Nor could Congress, under the old Confederation, involve Massachusetts, to any extent whatever, in that institution. If the slaves of Virginia were killed or lost, or ran away from their masters, her people sustained the loss, if any; nor could they throw any part of it upon the people of Massachusetts. The people of the latter State enjoyed their freedom, entirely exempt from the restrictions of slavery. Her people were not liable to be called upon to contribute their funds to pay for the bones and sinews of their fellow-men, in violation of their moral principles.

At the formation of the Constitution, the people of each State entertained their own views concerning slavery. The North were opposed to that institution. The South deemed it necessary for their prosperity. The same conflicting views and interests existed at that period, that exist at this day. The Northern States were anxious for the abolition of slavery. The Southern States refused to adopt the Constitution, if, by so doing, the Federal Government were to have any power over it. Virginia would not intrust her slavery to the control of the Federal Government, nor would Massachusetts intrust the liberty of her people to that power.

On the subject of slavery, each State, therefore, retained to itself its whole powers concerning that institution—delegating no portion of those powers to the Federal Government, except the power to legislate so far as to enable the owners of fugitive slaves to recapture them. This power was expressly given in the Constitution: and its existence there is as strong a negative of the existence of all other powers, as could have been expressed by any language whatever. It therefore follows, that at this day we have no more power to apply the public funds to pay for slaves, than Congress possessed under the old articles of Confederation. We have no more power to take a slave from his master now, than the old Congress had. The citizens of Virginia at this day holds his slave as independent of the Federal Government as he did prior to the adoption of our Constitution. We, sir, possess no more constitutional power to separate the master and slave in Virginia, than we do to sever that relation between persons in India. Nor have we any more constitutional right to involve the people of the free States in the expense of slavery, or in the moral guilt of paying a slaveholder for loosing his grasp upon his fellow-man, than we have to take money from the people of Great Britain for that object. Sir, we should violate the rights of the people of Canada in no greater degree, if we were to compel them to aid in the payment for lost slaves, than we shall those of the free States, if we compel them to contribute for the same purpose. Sir, the right of enjoying our personal liberty, and the right of continuing slavery, were State interests, which were never brought into the political copartnership. They constitute no portion of our joint capital; nor can they be reached by the acts of our political firm. We, acting for the joint interests of all the States, cannot interfere with either the slavery of the South or the liberty of the North. The power to do this has never been delegated to us. Its exercise would be a usurpation—a palpable violation of the Constitution—a subversion of the rights of the people upon whom it is exercised. If we have power to involve the people of the free States in the payment of slaves to any extent, we have the right to exert precisely the same power, and to the same extent, for the abolition of slavery in the slave States. Establish the principle that we can involve the people of the free States in the payment of slaves, and it will follow that we have jurisdiction over slavery. If we have power to make the free States pay for slaves, we have power to say they shall not be paid for. If we may interfere to any extent, we may to all extent. If we have jurisdiction over that institution, let us at once exercise it as becomes a nation professing freedom. I am ready to take jurisdiction of it whenever I can satisfy myself that we can constitutionally do so.

When we once commence legislation in regard to slavery, I hope and trust we shall speak of "natural rights," of "human liberty," and of the crime of holding our fellow-men in bondage. When we talk of slavery, I trust it will be to execrate it, to abolish it, and not to discuss the propriety of encouraging its continuance at the expense of this Government and of the free States, or in any other manner.

I move to recommit the bill, with instructions to the committee which reported it, to insert a proviso that nothing contained in it shall authorize the payment for any slave killed, taken, or carried off by the American army, or any person belonging thereto, or accompanying the same.

SPEECH OF MR. MERIWETHER,

OF GEORGIA.

In the House of Representatives, January 4, 1843—On the bill for the repeal of the bankrupt law.

Mr. MERIWETHER said that he concurred fully in opinion with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BOWNE,] that there would be no repeal of the bankrupt law at the present session. He had no doubt that many of those who professed to oppose the law, were at heart its friends; and that such would vote for all motions for commitment, for all instructions, to waste time and defeat action. They were opposed to repeal; but, to save appearances, were compelled to make a show of resistance to the law. The measure had been made a theme for party declamation throughout the Union. It would be difficult to find, in the vocabulary of epithets, one which had not been exhausted upon both the measure and its advocates; and now, after it had been made the stepping-stone to power, it would be too impudent for those who had so used it, at once to vote against the repeal. hence they have sought its defeat by indirect attacks, and will, no doubt, succeed in their purpose. The whole country had been aroused against the law; its provisions had been declared to be ruinous, dishonest, villanous: and yet those very provisions, thus condemned, had, every one of them, time and again, been commended to the people, by the votes of the leading members of the Democratic party in the Senate. All this the country had neglected to look at; and the advocates of the law had not had time to catch the first calm, in the storm which had swept over them, to demonstrate it. The law—just as it is, without change of a syllable, word, or sentence—is acceptable, no doubt, to the majority of the Democratic party; but they have told the people differently, and must now act with some show of sincerity. But I predict this repeal bill will be strangled just where it is; and, next session, the Democratic party, having the power, will complain of their inability to correct all of "Whig misrule," and leave the bankrupt law still in full operation. The facts just stated by the gentleman show that I am not very far wrong in my suspicions. He tells us that he voted against the passage of the bill originally; that there is not a man in his district, save one, who does support it; that that one is an "open and avowed supporter" of the law; that the people demand the repeal, and, to insure it, have left him [Mr. BOWNE] at home, and elected in his stead this very same "open and avowed supporter" of the present law. This fact shows that the excitement in the gentleman's district was not very alarming, however unanimous it may have been. And it shows, further, that the gentleman may have mistaken public sentiment; and, in order to get into the current again, and to keep up appearances, it may be that his speech was intended to do what he censured in others so much—to stave off the question of repeal! That strange speech had an "awful squinting" that way.

This fact shows, furthermore, what confidence is to be placed in the complaints of the Democratic party against their opponents and their acts. No exception to the acts of the Whig party was more prejudicial to them than that founded upon the bankrupt law. It was daily denounced as the means of destroying all confidence in society, and bringing bankruptcy and ruin upon the whole country. It was denounced as a system of robbery, and a palpable violation of the Constitution. These charges have been believed; and the country has, by its vote, evicted from power and place the party who held control when the law was passed. The gentleman was no silent spectator in the great struggle. He denounced the law; his constituents agreed with him, all but one man; and now, when the battle has been won, when the weapon of assault is yet reeking with the blood of the victim, when victory is certain,—that very constituency hurl from their affections the man who had faithfully sustained their views, and have elected in his place one who had opposed him and them upon this very question. For the party's sake, they joined in the denunciation; and now, for their own sakes, they have elected a Representative who could, without change, subserve their views. They opposed a principle to get into power; and when in power, they sustain it, to keep there.

Mr. M. said that he was opposed to the repeal of the bankrupt law. He stated that now, as it was possible he should not again touch the subject under consideration in the course of his remarks, [laughter,] he should follow very closely the example which had been set him. He voted originally for the passage of the bill. He was not satisfied, at the time, as to the wishes of his constituents upon the subject. He had to rely upon the evidence before him, in the shape of memorials addressed to this House—upon private letters received by himself and others—upon conversations with gentlemen who were at the seat of Government, from his State, at the extra session. From all these sources, the overpowering evidence was, that the people of his State desired the passage of the law, and he voted for it. Before the law went into operation, however, he became satisfied that the same people desired its repeal; he therefore voted in accordance with their wishes. Recently, the subject had not been agitated; but he had seen the good effects of the law; it was a measure of justice, sent in mercy to a whole people, groaning beneath the iron rod of heartless power, and struggling, amidst the deepest and most gloomy reverses of fortune, to subsist those whom nature had made dependent upon their labor. Then, upon his own responsibility, he should vote against the repeal. Further, he should so vote upon every incidental motion as would most certainly tend to defeat that repeal. And if, as it had been said, it was an object of great desire to the Democratic party to reserve to a Democratic Congress the honor of repealing the law, he would, by his votes, help to give them an opportunity. Then we should see whether they would repeal the law, or retain it; whether they would modify it; and whether, since they have declared it to be unconstitutional, they would attempt, by their legislation, to set up debts which they now say have been unconstitutionally discharged. Let them have a fair sweep; and let us see how far they will verify, by their acts, what they have said to the people.

Mr. M. said he had been very much amused at the confession of sins which was now going on with the Democracy. Whether conscience was pricking, or concealment was no longer necessary, he pretended not to say. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BOWNE] had said that he was an old Federalist, but as soon as he judged for himself he became a Democrat. Mr. M. thought it was no great effort of judgment to lead a votary of Federalism to Democracy: the dividing line between the two had never yet been defined. The gentleman said that if proscription was to cut off or repel a man from the Democratic party because he was a Federalist, many who were now in their ranks would have no further place here. This was a candid and a true confession; and if a political confessor were appointed, it would be a difficult matter to divine the time of his duration in office, if he but listened for a moment to the confession of each Democrat who had the same sin upon his shoulders which the gentleman admitted was on his own.

Mr. M. had sometimes been at a loss to account for the great zeal of the gentleman [Mr. BOWNE] in behalf of the cause of Democracy. If he is a penitent at the footstool of political mercy, and if, by shifting from Federalism to Democracy, he has found (or thinks he has found) a political regenerating grace, it may be that to the maxim, that "new converts are always the most zealous," is to be attributed his fiery zeal. But Mr. M. had likewise heard it said, that the most "zealous converts" were not always the most radically reformed. The gentleman might still be under a delusion as to his conversion, and as to the probabilities of conversion at all for one who occupies his place. But, be this as it may—whether the gentleman be reformed or not—whether it be in fancy or in fact—judging of the past by the present, if the past was as bad with him, proportionably, as the present seems to be, let no man who seeks political reformation ever cease from the struggle to acquire it; for, looking upon the gentleman's present condition as improved, I feel that, in the most perfect respect to him, I may say to others, go on—

> "For while the lamp holds out to burn,
> The vilest sinner may return."

But, turning from the gentleman and his faith, I desire to say something of the auction sale, which is the subject of a speculation. My friend from Indiana [Mr. THOMPSON] expressed the opinion that the article offered was damaged, and there would be no bidders. I thought then, and yet think, he was mistaken. The thing is damaged, beyond doubt; but the Democracy, rather than be without power, would bid for and use any article, however badly damaged; and, in the sequel, we shall see that their too free use of a damaged commodity has resulted in damaging them. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] was too old a dealer in politics—was too skilful and provident—not to know the value of the article to be sold. He knew the character of the bidders too well—their necessities and dispositions—to hazard his object. He stood behind the screen; he saw those who pulled the wires; he knew the suppliants for Executive favor; he held his notes in his pocket, and saw and knew all the motives to action—who must act, when they must act, and how; he saw over the entire ground, and knew the stations of his men.

The result has shown that he was not mistaken. Never did auctioneer ply his bidders so well before; never did bidders respond more kindly before. True, there was some little squeamishness at first—some little restlessness; but this was natural, and to be expected, when the business had been so suddenly and publicly thrown upon them. All seemed to like Mr. Tyler very well; he was quite an honest man; he had been badly served by the Whigs—a most rascally set of ingrates, who had put him in office, and then had refused to put their heads down as stones on which he might step higher and longer. They did not like Daniel Webster and John C. Spencer, however; but this was a secondary matter; they would support Mr. Tyler's measures that were right, and they knew he would offer nothing that his conscience did not approve, unless seduced by Daniel Webster. This was the maiden coyness with which the Democracy began their bids; but, as an earnest that more would be granted, if enough had not been conceded, the auctioneer was assured that the Democracy would not dash themselves against the "constitutional fact."

As the auction has advanced, the bidders have been warmed up, and better terms have been offered. The gentleman [Mr. BOWNE] comes up fully in public to the terms doubtlessly reserved and dictated in private. He says: Take Daniel Webster and John C. Spencer, with all their sins upon them; receive them gladly and with open arms; and tells his brethren that if they are rejected for the sin of Federalism, measuring the same justice to others, they must force "thousands of other gentlemen" from their ranks. Does not this look like bidding, and bidding freely, for the damaged "thing?" and would the gentleman [Mr. CUSHING] have opened this sale if he did not know that circumstances would force the Democracy to show their loyalty here? Sir, this auction has been a troublesome matter to the Democracy; it has driven them to assume positions, to show division, to disclose purposes, which they had hoped to hide from the public eye. The Whigs have had their day of adversity; offices and measures were swept from us, like sand before the wind. This was a day of rejoicing for the Democracy; they laughed at our adversities, and feasted upon the full harvest of Executive patronage; and, so long as the Captain-General was in the dispensation of his favors, all was quiet and happy; so long as the war was against the Whigs, not a sorrowful thought crossed their happy bosoms. But that war is over; the enemy is supposed to be routed; and now the Captain begins to inquire, What share of the spoils is mine? What profit enures to me? Who bids for the "constitutional fact," against which I have dashed our common foe? There are in my family those who intend to be heard in the next Presidential election. Who bids for my power?

Sir, I may repeat, this auction has been a troublesome matter for our opponents. Accustomed to grief ourselves, we have more philosophy in its midst. We have looked upon the sorrows of our opponents with compassion, since the bright sunshine of their hopes has been turned to the chilling damps of disappointment. We would that the bitter cup could pass from them. We have seen that the hour of their dissolution has come, before they have yet entered upon the Elysian fields of their glory. But, who bids? is the hateful sound that rings through their ears. Who bids? is the accursed knell which foretells the hour of their doom.

But, sir, a community of action is likely to beget a community of sympathy. The Democracy have been the soldiery with which Captain Tyler has waged his war upon the "friends he left behind him." They have imbibed a love, as was natural, for their Captain; and the dispensation of many favors—of good and substantial offices, all held at his will—has not failed to impress upon these favorites, and their friends' friends and relations, and upon all who think that, by possibility, they might fall into the "line of safe precedents," that the Captain has manly virtues, lofty genius, noble daring; and > "Who should be king but Charlie?"

Besides, there are "buddings of disaffection" in the ranks of the Democracy, growing out of the succession, as the gentleman [Mr. CUSHING] very shrewdly told us. Differences between the Northern and the Southern house were far from any hope of speedy reconciliation. In the mean time, the "fact" was here and could not be surmounted. All these things had brought uncertainty into the ranks of the Democracy; and at this moment, so inopportune for them, the President has snatched the banner of the guard, and planted it in their midst. Who feels that they need my power? Who bids for it? is the ready query that, like an electric shock, thrills throughout their whole ranks; and bid, some one must.

Now, sir, it is unnecessary for any one to disguise the fact that Mr. Tyler has divided and broken the ranks of the Democratic party. Their "one and indivisible" front is a mass of chaos. Followers are flocking to his banner; and the little guard, once so insignificant, is now quite an army of well-disposed affections, if not counted men; and all its recruits are drawn from the Democracy. The number, too, is greater than public opinion has allowed. The "givings out" of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOWNE] favored this opinion; and, if I am not mistaken, from the gentleman's speech of yesterday, [Mr. WELLER,] he has no special objection to fight under the banner of the Captain, since he was going into private life. The position of the President now is such, that the Democracy dare not treat with neglect or contempt his overtures. They dare not refuse him audience. They must respond when he cries, Who bids?

The welcome of Daniel Webster and John C. Spencer to the ranks of Democracy, by the gentleman from New York, is no new idea in that party. It has before been thought of by them, and acted upon before; and all this parade before the country by gentlemen, that they cannot receive them, nor the Administration with them, is but a feint, to operate upon certain quarters and certain men, when, eventually, acting under the constraining will of the people, as pretended, they will be received into full fellowship, at least by one portion of the immaculate "one and indivisible" Democracy.

I propose reading a resolution adopted at a large meeting of Democrats in the State of Kentucky, at which, the "Madisonian" says, the most influential Democrats of the State attended, and that they are men not surpassed for influence in that party in the Union. Mr. M. read the following:

"Resolved, That Daniel Webster and John C. Spencer, the brightest luminaries of the Whig sky, have, in their transit to Democracy, formed a halo of glory around its principles."

[Laughter, and cries of "Read that again."]

After this, let not my friends think that this Administration is without bidders, when it is put up for sale. The gentleman [Mr. CUSHING] knew all these facts, and knew, however damaged it was to the country, yet, for party purposes, it was highly valuable to the Democracy. Mr. Tyler, by his patronage, is omnipotent with that party. He has done what no other man, either in or out of the party, could do. He has not only carried his own strength into the ranks of the Democracy, but he has carried with him, and installed into his command, Daniel Webster and John C. Spencer as his lieutenants; and the Democracy are rallying around them, while they "formed a halo of glory around its principles." The Democracy will always bid at such a sale. What higher evidence can be wanting of the disposition to bid, irrespective of conditions, than this? And what better evidence of an alliance, offensive as well as defensive, than that which makes old enemies "one and indivisible" political associates? We shall see hereafter if there is not still stronger evidence of alliance—one founded on a bid, and that bid a bargain.

But it may be asked if Mr. Tyler himself is, without difficulty, surrounded by so many new associates and friends? It appears not; from indications, it seems that there are false teachers in the household; that the bidders are themselves treacherous; and, while they bargain for their loyalty, they are seeking to rob patronage of its power, and to sacrifice its dispenser to their selfishness. Treason seems to reign in the camp, and friendship is made the screen behind which perfidy perpetrates its deeds.

I hold in my hand a letter said to have been written from the White House. It appeared in the New York "Union," the accredited organ in that city of the President, and would not have appeared there, urging such grave charges, uttering such melancholy complaints, and speaking such desponding language, if there was no foundation for all, and a great many more causes of dissatisfaction than those detailed. Speaking of the President, it says:

"The President is like a man who is walking over a straight road, and ever and anon some kind friend advises him to turn to the right or the left, or to go up that hill, or down that lane, intending to do him the favor, if they can get him out of the straight and honest path he has chosen, to strip him of his coat, waistcoat, and breeches."

[Roars of laughter.]

Mr. M. continued. He hoped the gentleman from New York was not one of the number who were trying to get the President's breeches. [Continued laughter.] What a melancholy picture does this tale unfold! How fearfully true is the treachery which it discloses! That the highest officer within the gift of a free people is subject to such associations; that he cannot trust himself to the counsel they may present; and that, under the flattering but deceitful profession of friendship, counsellors around him advise to a policy not to subserve the public good, but which, if adopted, selects their own selfish purposes as the only object to be attained, robs him of all ability to be useful, and makes him the degraded tool of their ambition! The language of this complaint is figurative, but the fact it discloses is real. Surely the President must feel that he reclines on thorns, when surrounded by a faction which has been collected through the patronage of power, and which will betray him as interest may dictate. These are melancholy facts, to go down to posterity as evidence of the prostitution of the present day. Well might the gentleman, [Mr. CUSHING,] knowing all these things—the professions of friendship made, and the perfidy which was ready to betray confidence reposed—put up the Administration at auction; well might he seek to bring out before the public eye those who were its friends, that those who had sworn their loyalty in the recesses at the White House should register their vows before the world—that the true friends might be distinguished, and the robbers of coats and breeches expelled. But how could it be otherwise than that, when treachery had once tainted its victim, the victim should perfect the treachery?

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELLER] had said on yesterday that the President had been greatly annoyed and assailed by the Whigs who wanted office; that their "voracious maws" not being satisfied, they had turned in wrath against him. Upon the subject of office, perhaps that gentleman would have done as well to have been silent. If reports be true, should that gentleman be not now most perfectly satisfied, he might incur the charge of having the insatiable appetite of a cormorant. But it seems that the thirst for office happens not to be confined to the Whigs alone. No doubt that there was a great rush on their part as soon as they had been installed in power. Many honest and honorable men had been hurled from office, for no other reason than that they had an opinion of their own. They came forward quickly to have the stigma wiped from their characters—which official tyranny had stamped upon them. But it is a fact, which is disgraceful to both parties, that too many of their members desire office for the gains which it brings to them. But the Democrats seem to have much rapacity for office too, and have proved a source of great vexation at the White House. The same letter to which I before referred has this remark:

"I am glad to find that your Tyler cliques in New York are becoming more orderly and governable. I thought at one time, from their continued rush to the Capitol, that a new party, under the name of 'Want-to-get-into-the-custom-house Party,' would carry all before them; for there was no want of applicants for collectors, postmasters, marshals, navy agents, district attorneys, &c.; and, if the applicants themselves were to be credited, those high functionaries were but sorry fellows at best. Although none has succeeded, or is likely to succeed, yet ever and anon a poor 'faint and wayworn traveller' finds his way down here with his pockets full of letters of recommendation from the malcontents, representing you all to be without the capacity or the inclination to do the least service to the President; and these denunciations generally end by the complainant's asking for an office."

Then, it seems, continued Mr. M., that the President is beleaguered by office hunters from the Democracy; and, when he places them in power around him, they fail not to consult all the artifices of their address to seduce him from an honest, straightforward path, into private ways and by-paths, where they may practise upon him their arts of petit larceny, robbing him even of the slight habiliments which now serve to hide his nakedness. But what does this letter of complaint show? That there must be between the President and his followers a quid pro quo for every favor asked, and every service rendered. Office is asked with the understanding that the "ability and capacity to serve the President," not the country, can be afforded; and office is granted, with the understanding that that "ability and capacity" are made effective in serving the President. What is this but a bargain—a contract—an agreement to do a particular thing—between parties capable and willing to contract, and actually contracting, and the performance under that contract of some service, which strips the transaction in law of that want of consideration which would render the agreement a nudum pactum?

And what was that bargain to which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] alluded, which he so bitterly denounced the other day as carrying on its face a "damning suspicion?" The public news said that it amounted to more than an agreement for office for each of the parties. And what is the fact disclosed by this White House letter? That office is conferred upon those only who have the "ability and capacity" to serve the President; and those who receive offices must employ that "ability and capacity" in his service.

This is the scene enacting behind the curtain at the White House; and forthwith the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] the accredited friend and counsellor of the President, comes upon this floor, in a debate upon the repeal of the bankrupt law, uninduced by anything before said, repeats what it seems had before been heard elsewhere in rehearsals, that the Administration must have friends, and that it possessed the means of rewarding them, and punishing foes. He tells us that the Whigs have been dashed to pieces against the President's "fixed fact." This was punishment. He tells the Democrats that they will "not profit by experience," and that they are dashing wildly against that same "fixed fact." This we all understand to mean the veto of the sub-treasury bill, whenever readopted. He had spoken of the "buddings of discontent" in the Democratic party; that a prominent man would draw off one wing, and another man would draw off another wing of that party; that, in the next presidential election, there were those connected with the present Administration who intended soon to have a word to say; and that no one would make anything by indulging in a "fierce warfare against the President;" that he held the veto power—something more omnipotent than mere patronage. Now, English these sentiments; and what do they mean? That the patronage of the Executive will be thrown into the support of that candidate and his friends, and the veto power used for their advantage, whose friends and associates, possessing the "ability and capacity," would render him (the President) the most effective service, and would not rob him of his coat, waistcoat, and breeches. Is there no intimation of a willingness to bargain for power in all this? No expectation of reward created for services rendered or to be rendered? No temptation to excite rivalry in devotion to the President? And what was the effect of this announciation of purpose on the part of the President? The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KENNEDY] said that he would not bid: to have avowed such an intention would have been to expose and defeat his purpose; but he told the gentleman [Mr. CUSHING] that he, a Democrat, would not encounter the rod of punishment—the veto! The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELLER] said that it was the high duty of every Democrat to support every act of the Administration as far as he could; and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BOWNE,] discarding all barriers, exhorts his associates to take Mr. Tyler, his administration—Webster and Spencer—however deeply dyed in political sins—to take one and all, now and at once, without atonement, conditions, reservations, or stipulations—to take them freely, cheerfully, graciously; and to become with them, at once, "one and indivisible." What call you all this? Is there no response here to the question, Where shall I find my friends? No cringing before the lash? No reaching after the reward? No manifestation of fear that the "fixed fact" was dangerous; that those connected with the Administration, who intended soon to have a word to say in the next presidential election, might not speak that word unfavorably; that certain "discontents" might not profit by that word; and no evidence of a belief that prudence dictated at once that all fears should be quelled, that a "fierce warfare against the President" was not to be expected from a certain quarter? Does not all this squint most awfully at the fact, that the terms of sale, as stated, are ready to be embraced? Do not the bids fully cover the offer? And is there nothing like a bargain, an agreement, an undertaking, mutually to do and perform certain acts, for a mutual consideration?

But the gentleman, no doubt, did look further, and to other terms than those he expressed, when he put this Administration up at auction. Possibly he had other objects in view; and I will ask the gentleman if he did expect that at this sale any bids would be put in by the Whig party?

[Mr. CUSHING (Mr. M. yielding the floor) said the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MERIWETHER] had repeated the remark several times made in this House, and to which he had sought an opportunity to reply. The gentleman desired Mr. C. to inform im when he (Mr. C.) had put up the Administraon, if he expected the Whig party to bid? Mr.

. called on the gentleman, and on every member f this House, to put his finger on any part of his peech that authorized this imputation. [Laughter.]
le denied that there was any foundation whatever or it; and he asked the gentleman from Georgia to elect from that speech a single sentence, if he ould, which justified that imputation, which the entleman himself would declare to the House to e unjust in principle, or untrue in fact?]

Mr. MERIWETHER resumed: The gentleman from lassachusetts was trying to play a Yankee trick pon him—answering his question by asking him nother. The answer had in nowise been given to ie interrogatory. Waiving, however, his right to sist upon an answer, the gentleman asks me to oint to a single sentence of his remarks that ould justify such an imputation. Mr. M. would oint the gentleman to his whole speech for evience to sustain the construction he and others ad placed upon it. It was no objection to the ct, that one single sentence did not contain the roposition of sale; the whole speech was comounded of several propositions, each resting upon, nd connecting with, the other. If this (Mr. C.'s) ule of interpretation were to apply, we might, for ie same reason, reject some of the most important uths of the Bible. Mr. M. could understand othing else from the gentleman's remarks than the mputation which had been made. But I will inti-nate to the gentleman what I have before said to ie House were the terms of his propositions, and eave him to contradict the facts as I state them:
hat he spoke of a "fixed fact" in the Federal Govrnment; of the President as that "fact;" that the Whig party had been dashed against it; that expeience did not serve to teach the Democratic party, nd they were going to repeat the same experiment; hat "fact" was the veto power in the hands of the President; that in the Democratic ranks there were iscontent and division in reference to the succesion; that some persons connected with the Adminstration intended soon to have a word to say in he next Presidential election; and that the interest
f no party would be advanced by a fierce attack pon the President, and he deemed it material to e frank upon that point now. Now, with these ropositions, what other could follow, but that the Administration would elect in the use of its friend-hip, (which means the patronage of the Governnent and the exercise of the veto power,) to bestow he one, and to use or withhold the other, as would bserve the interest of party friends? And who ould be its friends, but those who sustained its neasures, and were not "too furious" in their oposition to the President? And why talk of being rank in your statements, if nothing was meant by t—no agreement to be understood? Could lanuage be plainer, or logic more clear, than that hich deduces this crowning proposition from such remises? And the bare statement of these propoitions had not failed of its effect. The gentleman rom Indiana [Mr. KENNEDY] had promptly re-ponded to them, disclaiming any intention to bid:
nd to have acknowledged it would have been too arefaced,) but assured the gentleman that the De-ocracy would not encounter the "fixed fact" in eir legislation at the incoming Congress; which as to say, "declare your will, and we will execute ." But, as the gentleman now says he did not in-nd to sell, I suppose the sale is postponed for the resent. [Laughter.]

[Mr. CUSHING (Mr. M. again yielding the floor or explanation) said that the gentleman had put to im a question which was based on the assumption hat he (Mr. C.) had done a particular thing in this louse. Mr. C. had replied, by contradicting the ssumption and challenging proof, exhibiting deonstration on that point; and the gentleman said hat he had practised the Yankee mode of answer-ng a question by asking another. It was not so; Ir. C. had answered emphatically and fully, cov-ring the whole ground; and he now begged leave ask the gentleman a question: Would the gentle-an be good enough to put his finger on a single entence of that speech which, either as a Whig or emocrat, the gentleman would aver to be unjust principle or untrue in fact? If he would, Mr. would pledge himself to show, by exhibition of n authority of some of the highest and best men hat had lived in the United States since the Rev-lution, that propositions of the same tenor had fore been made.]

Mr. M. resumed. He had referred the gentleman to his whole speech; he seemed unwilling to scan it; he referred him to it again; and when he shall have read it throughout, calmly and dispassionately, he would find more in it than he seems willing to admit now is there, and more than he ought ever to have put there. Even the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] from the manner in which he had undertaken the other day to explain away the gentleman's speech, had evinced an un-uttered conviction, that the construction placed upon the speech was not altogether foreign to its legitimate meaning. The gentleman says that he will show, upon the authority of the highest and best men of the country, that similar propositions have before been made. Mr. M. did not doubt this.
Frequent charges had been made of similar combinations, and public sentiment had condemned them. Does their recurrence justify them? or does the knowledge of their existence by the "highest and best men" of the country give them a passport to our approval? or does the existence of like propositions negative the fact that those now being debated ever had an existence? He calls upon me to condemn any sentence of his speech as "unjust in principle or untrue in fact." His isolated positions, his individual propositions, may stand. The gentleman sees the drift of my remarks too well not to understand my attack to be upon his speech as a whole. I may or may not dissent from his propositions individually; that is not the issue I make. But depend them one upon another; connect them together, as he has connected them; deduce from them, as he has deduced the consequence, the right of the President to wield the patronage of his office and the veto power for the building up or pulling down of parties, irrespective of the public welfare, and of throwing the influence and power of that patronage and of the veto, as freaks of friendship or hatred may come over him, to perpetuate or destroy political friends or opponents,—and I denounce the whole jointly, and each singly, in view of such connexion; and I point to each and every of them as untrue in fact, and grossly unjust in principle to the people, and destructive of every semblance of political right.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have not yet learned whether, at this auction, when it shall take place, it will be expected that the Whigs should bid or not?
When I was interrupted, I was about entering upon the subject of Democratic difficulties. The gentleman [Mr. CUSHING] had spoken of discontents already existing; of the intention of some connected with the Administration to have a word to say in the next election. Mr. M. said that, doubtless, these divisions had been fully canvassed at the other end of the avenue. The letter from the White House, before referred to, alludes to this matter; and this allusion, and the identity of sentiment expressed by the gentleman with the letter, while they show that what he has said was not the result of momentary excitement, but premeditated and spoken almost by authority, confirm to us that these dissensions in the Democratic ranks are the subject of speculation and calculation by the wire-workers at the President's. Here is the reference:

"Talking of the Presidency, I never saw Mr.
Calhoun look so well and so full of hope and expectation. The Legislatures of South Carolina and Alabama have nominated him, and other States will follow. He is excessively uneasy and fretful about going into a national convention, for fear that Mr. Van Buren, being more dexterous with the cups and balls, will cheat him out of a nomination; and in this respect he has grounds of apprehension. Mr. Van Buren in a convention is like a little fierce bull in an amphitheatre, and is sure to gore and toss all the horses and riders who may come into the ring against him."

Here are some strong intimations of approaching difficulty; and while it comes up completely to the views as expressed by the gentleman, [Mr. CUSH-ING,] let us see if the concluding views do not cover the whole ground assumed by him. The letter continues:

"There is absolutely nothing doing here, we may say, in the political world, and I am glad of it; because when the politicians lie on their oars, the country gains by it. Everything, of course, is in an unsettled state. If a storm is brewing between the Whigs, the Calhoun men, and the Van Buren men, the Administration have only to remain tranquil until the hurricane blows over, and then take advantage of the times. If the people could only unhorse the leaders, no man would be so strong as John Tyler, because he is evidently gaining strength among the great body of the people."

Can any one (continued Mr. M.) look at all these facts, and shut his eyes to the conviction that the gentleman's speech was not made without concert with others—without premeditation or design—without object? and, if not without object, what other than to identify the Administration, for profit or loss, for better or worse, with some one of the contending factions of the "one and indivisible Democratic party?"

The fact of division in that party is left unquestioned. That Mr. Tyler has effected that division, and to a great extent, is undeniable. The only remaining question was, which portion of that party desired most to convert his influence to its use?

The Northern wing of the Democracy had stepped forth boldly, bid freely, and anxiously sought to close the sale; but the Southern wing had not, as yet, been heard from publicly. Rumor had blessed them with a greater share of executive favor, but yet they have not signified their intention to bid or not. I should like to hear from that division of the party before the debate closes.

There is a great deal submitted to (said Mr. M.) in this hall, from parliamentary courtesy. There never was freer use made of this liberty than during this debate. When it first began, a casual visiter would have supposed that the war waging by the Democrats was aimed solely at the Whig party. While the fact of an open rupture was first developing itself, the effort to direct the quarrel against the Whigs was most desperate, and soundly were we whipped over the shoulders for the benefit of our opponents. Well, he did not know that he had much objection to this course. Mr. M. was opposed to making family jars public spectacles.
He was willing to take the castigation, if, in so doing, he could hide the wounds which family feuds had made. He would have been very willing to have covered up the divisions which existed in the ranks of his opponents; but this seemed now to be a hopeless matter, and they had themselves become careless and indifferent as to their exposure. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KENNEDY] had tried very diligently to cover up all their difficulties; he thrust most desperately at us; said some hard things; appealed to old prejudices; spoke of our unworthiness, and the vast superiority of his own friends.
But all this would not do; there was no response; and in the bitterness of grief, in a moment of almost frenzied sorrow, he bade us to stand aloof, and let their family quarrel alone. Mr. M. said he should abide the admonition, and leave the family to its tumults. The "cohesive principle," which had hitherto bound them together, seemed too weak to preserve the Union.

Mr. M. could not help thinking, when he heard such violent declamation from the other side, how unsubstantial it was, and how very deceptive it was to those who believed or thought there would be a serious contest by the opposition in the next Presidential election. The people abroad expected a warm and animated contest; but the resistance which would be presented seemed more like a shadow than a substance. The Democracy were united while the whole party warred against the Whigs; but now, when the selection is to be made who shall wear the robes, confusion and discord have scattered them abroad, and divided and broken their front. The heterogeneous mass has many candidates for the honor—some whose claims are growing very stale, and must now be canvassed or never; they present many aspirants to the people, but they will not be permitted to elect all, and they are too weak to elect any one. Division is among them, and is premonitory of defeat; if they are not counting it, why do they not rally and present their candidate? If they can make a selection, why not meet at once and harmonize? But do they not fear a failure, and consequently a certain overthrow, by attempting a reconciliation, and not possessing the power to accomplish it? Is there to be a convention? It is said that there may be a fair convention of the party; if so, when and where is it to be held? The party doubtless have little hope of any united action, and, consequently, no hope of success in 1844.

Although he was no prophet, he would predict, without the hazard of having that prediction condemned by the reality, that, should the Democratic party present but one candidate for the next Presidency and Vice Presidency, that candidate for President would be Daniel Webster; and that candidate for the Vice Presidency would be John C. Spencer;

And it was right that this should be so; for they are the first men who ever placed a "halo of glory" around the "principles" of that party. The principle of gratitude demands it.

Mr. M. said, as it had occurred to him that the repeal of the bankrupt law was at this time before them, he would make one or two remarks on that subject before he concluded. He should vote against the repeal, for two reasons. It had been said that, in the course of the operations of the law, many creditors had been made bankrupts by the discharge of their debtors. This was a proposition that Mr. M. could not well understand; the note or obligation of an insolvent would go no further to pay a debt, as assets, than that of a bankrupt; and he did not understand how a creditor under the bankrupt law, getting a part of his debt, was worse off than he was under the insolvent laws of the States, where he got nothing. It might be, however, that a creditor had so arranged, through favor, relationship, reward, or the hope of it, or by a fraudulent agreement with the debtor, to get his own claim satisfied, and to cover up the rest of his property for his future benefit, and to oust the weaker and smaller creditors altogether; and that the bankrupt law, coming in to defeat such fraudulent combinations, had placed all upon an equality, whereby this creditor was made to share with others the insolvency of the debtor, and his losses thereby had proved disastrous to him. Be this as it may, however, let the law be right or wrong in its origin, since it has made victims by its operation, the highest, noblest, most enduring obligation of the Government is to give to these victims its benefits, since they have unwittingly shared its injuries.

There was another reason why Mr. M. would not now vote for the repeal. Many men are now struggling to escape their embarrassments; and so long as the hope is held out that, should their efforts fail, still they may find relief under the just and wise provisions of this law, they will struggle on. But, agitate the repeal; give them nothing to hope for but the mercy of creditors; and they fly at once to the courts for relief, cease from all further efforts, and sink into despondency at once. Nothing paralyzes more the energies of man than the cheerless and annoying frowns of rapacious creditors. If you would render him useful to society, valuable to his friends, and even available to those creditors, you must open before him the bright field of hope; soothe the pangs of bitter sorrow and mortification; stimulate his energies by encouragement; and do not conduct so towards him that he must feel at every moment the uplifted axe is about to descend upon him. It is the fear of this fatal axe which is now driving many into premature bankruptcy, and filling the courts with applications. Between bankruptcy and the continued demand of the Shylock's last pound of flesh, human nature is more than itself if it selects the heartless demand. It is the encouragement which this law holds out, that has nerved the energies of many an enterprising man, which has dissipated the dark cloud that overhung many a debtor, and opened to him a bright sunshine. It is this law which has stimulated enterprise, and, by well-directed efforts, has paid fully many debts which, without it, would have been discharged by insolvency; and, guided by the star of its bright hope, many an unfortunate debtor will yet fully indemnify his creditors, and reserve to himself the means of comfortable subsistence in old age. Then, why should we rshly repeal it, and wither so many fond hopes, now budding into usefulness for society?

It is said that the law is unconstitutional. On that point Mr. M. would say but a word. It is said that it impairs the obligation of contracts, and hence is unconstitutional. He believed no such thing. Every contract has been made, subject to the power of Congress to pass a uniform system of bankruptcy. The Constitution is the supreme law of the land; that declares and defines the power; and whenever a contract has been made, it was in view of that "supreme law"—as much so as if a law had been spread on your statute-book. If a contract had been made antecedent to the adoption of the Constitution, then this law would be unconstitutional in its application to that contract. But such contracts alone could plead an exception; all others must submit to it. But it is said that we must confine our act to the meaning of a "bankrupt law" as understood at the time of the adoption of the Constitution; and we are carried to England, to her bankrupt act then existing, for a definition of the term. Well, what do we find, when we look to that fountain of learning? Why, nothing more than that England had declared that her subjects, being unable to pay their debts, might surrender their effects and be discharged; and she limited this right to a favored few, whom she called traders. Now, said Mr. M., what is the principle? Why, that a surrender of assets entitles to a discharge. The individuals to whom the privilege applies is a question of expediency, and not of principle. According to the assumption made, no law could be a bankrupt act, unless the whole English law, with its forms, penalties, rights, punishments, and machinery, were adopted by our own legislation. The argument carries its own refutation along with it; for no one would seriously contend that we had no discretion left as to the forms we might employ. Exercise that discretion for a moment, and the potent assumption is defeated. Mr. M. said that if evil had grown out of the law, all admitted good might come of it hereafter. Why, then, when you are about to reap its benefits, would you repeal it?

SPEECH OF MR. S. McROBERTS,

OF ILLINOIS.

In Senate, December 30, 1842, and January 9, 1843.—On the title of the United States to the Territory of Oregon, and in favor of the bill for its occupation and settlement.

The bill "to authorize the adoption of measures for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon, and for extending certain portions of the laws over the same," having been taken up, as in Committee of the Whole, the motion pending was to strike out the preamble to the bill, which is in these words: "Whereas the title of the United States to the Territory of Oregon is certain, and will not be abandoned"—

Mr. McROBERTS addressed the Senate as follows:

I shall vote, Mr. President, against the motion to strike out the preamble to this bill. There is no great vitality in a preamble to any law; but the one before us expresses so clearly the rights of the people of the United States, that I prefer it should stand as it is. But whether the preamble be retained in the bill or not, it is my purpose to-day to show that our title to the Oregon Territory is certain, and to present those reasons which I hope may, to some extent at least, induce our countrymen never to abandon it. The citizens of my own State take a deep interest in this question; they have memorialized Congress repeatedly, for years past, to adopt efficient means for the settlement and occupation of the Oregon. The same spirit has long animated the entire population of the West. Nor is it confined to that great division of the Republic, but other States—I believe from all of them on this side of the Alleghanies, at some time or other, have petitions been received, urging this measure upon the attention and consideration of Congress. So far, therefore, as the public voice is concerned—a voice which is indispensable in all great undertakings—we shall never be stronger than at present. We have the great element of national strength and power upon our side. These things all point to the conclusion, that now is the time.

Sir, there are other considerations—great and paramount considerations—connected with, and dependent upon, a determined and speedy action upon this bill. Have you counted the cost necessarily attendant upon delay? Have you weighed well the effect of procrastination? It is with States, as it is with individuals,—long continued neglect of your own rights when others are in their enjoyment, solely because of such neglect, may ultimately prove fatal to those rights. We live in a stirring age; the wants of the human race increase with the augmentation of its numbers, and such wants, when vacant territory is concerned, seldom ask many questions. Of one thing, sir, you may rest assured: if you refuse to take the necessary steps, and afford the necessary protection, to cause the Oregon to be populated by your citizens, other nations will populate it for you. Already great numbers have gone there, who owe allegiance to other nations. They have asked no questions, and we have interposed no obstacle. The unsurpassed salubrity of the climate, and the fertile soil of the Oregon, its contiguity to the ocean, and the facility to commerce with other portions of the globe, its fisheries, and furs, and its minerals, are temptations too inviting to be overlooked. These are the temptations which Nature offers to emigrants to pass this bill is but to follow her dictates. To pass it now, will secure the advantages to your own citizens, which, if neglected, will fall into other hands.

That the questions connected with the Oregon should have remained for forty years unsettled, is, I think, very much to be regretted. The mere fact of the delay has operated to retard individual exertion in the settlement and improvement of the country. But this has not been the fault of any President of the United States, or of the Government; for it has been urged on Congress from that quarter on various occasions and in various forms. Repeated efforts have been made to bring the questions with Great Britain in relation to the Oregon to an amicable adjustment, though hitherto without success. No other Government but that of Great Britain would have desired such delays. In 1815, at the treaty of Ghent, an admirable opportunity presented itself to settle the question of boundary; but it was not acted upon. In 1818, our minister at London was specially instructed to press the final settlement of the question of boundary. It was so pressed, but nothing definite could be obtained. Our minister proposed that the 49th parallel of latitude (which was the then established boundary) west to the Lake of the Woods, should be extended across the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific ocean, and should be the permanent boundary; the north to belong to Great Britain, and the south to the United States. This the British Government refused. In 1826, the United States proposed a renewal of the discussion as to boundary. Mr. Gallatin and Mr Rush, our ministers, were instructed to propose (and accordingly made the proposition) that the 49th parallel of latitude, which was the boundary between the British possessions and the United States, west from the Lake of the Woods to the Rocky Mountains, should be the permanent boundary, and be extended across the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific ocean. This proposition, and by which the then administration proposed to surrender all claim of the United States between the 49th and 54th parallel of latitude, was refused by Great Britain. Her ministers, not content with five degrees of latitude on the Pacific ocean, which had been offered them, proposed that the 49th parallel of latitude should be extended across the Rocky Mountains till it intersected the northern source of the Columbia river, and then proceed down the main channel to the sea. This, being wholly inadmissible, was rejected; and the minister of the United States (Mr. Gallatin) informed the British Government that this Government was absolved from its offer to abide by the 49th parallel of latitude, and would thereafter insist upon the whole territory to which it had just claim. Great Britain, however, acted in the spirit of her accustomed policy; and one part of that policy is, that when its Government has in point of fact no strict right in a claim once set up, to effect delay—to procrastinate—to put off its adjustment; well knowing that weak pretensions have always been strengthened by that policy. We must cut the Gordian knot, and take possession; or Great Britain will accomplish all she desires, overrun the country with her people, and then with more plausibility urge her claim, upon the ground that she is bound to afford them protection. The convention which was made in 1818, and renewed in 1827, securing to her a joint occupancy with us, has been made by her subservient to this very result. Are we to have no end to these delays? Why is it that a distinguished nobleman of England, (Lord Ashburton,) who was sent to this country as a special minister, and, as was said, to settle, if possible, all disputes between the two countries, should have had no instructions from the British ministry upon this subject? When the British Government had the right clearly on its side, there is not an instance on record where it sought for delay. Now, I am perfectly willing to allow that it is always proper to proceed deliberately; to see that we have the right on our side, when we are obliged to go into such matters. But what I do contend for is, that our right and title to the territory claimed by us (take from latitude 42 to 49 degrees north, for example) have been long since so clearly ascertained, that we should not have admitted any pretence for delay in its recognition. Such would have been the course of Great Britain herself, had she the right and title we possess.

I propose to state briefly the grounds of our title, to show that it has been long since rendered plain and indubitable. I will try and present the subject in such a manner that those who run may not only read, but comprehend also. A cherished principle upon which our people have always acted, is first to investigate, and be certain that they are right; because, if either individuals or nations must quarrel, it is one of the cardinal laws of being, that—

"Thrice is he armed who hath his quarrel just."

Let us commence with the title which we derived from Spain; because it is to be remembered that, whatever of right Spain had to the Northwest coast, either by discovery, occupancy, or purchase, has been transferred to us in the most enlarged and ample manner.

1st. From 1532 to 1540, several expeditions were fitted out under Spanish authority, and explored California and the coast to a considerable distance north of it. The commanders were Mazuela, Grijalva, Becera, and Ulloa. Their object was discovery, and to find what did not exist—a water communication through to the Atlantic.

In 1540, Coronado, by orders from the viceroy, made an important expedition by land in the interior north of New Mexico; and in 1543, Bartolome Ferrelo discovered Cape Blanco in 43 degrees north latitude.

2d. It is established beyond all question, that in a voyage of discovery under the authority of Spain, in the year 1592, Juan De Fuca discovered and traversed the straits which bear his name. The straits enter the land at 48 degrees north latitude, and extend east 100 miles, and thence northwest 250 miles, into the Pacific again, in latitude 51 degrees; that he remained twenty days in the straits, landed frequently, and traded with the natives. It further appears that this voyage and discovery was made known to England by letters from Michael Lok, the English consul at Aleppo, to Lord Treasurer Cecil, and Sir Walter Raleigh. Spain, therefore, first discovered the country, and traversed it as far north as 51 degrees north latitude, 251 years since, and 184 years before the celebrated voyage of Captain Cook.

3d. In 1602 and subsequent years, further and more extensive surveys were made of the coast by Corvan and Vizcaino, under the Spanish Government, extending north of its former possessions; and on the 16th of January 1603, Aguiler discovered the beautiful river Umqua, which is within our boundary, in latitude 44 degrees north.

4th. Complete and authentic evidence exists that in August, 1774, Perez and Martinez, under Spanish authority, first discovered the Sound of Nootka between latitude 49 and 50 degrees north. They called it San Lorenzo. (Humboldt, p. 331.)

5th. That equally conclusive evidence exists that Heceta, Ayala, and Quadra, Spanish officers and navigators, discovered the bay at or near the river Columbia.

6th. That in these two years 1774 and 1775, the Northwest coast was explored by Perez and Martinez, Spanish navigators, as high as the 58th degree of north latitude.

7th. That in pursuance of orders from the viceroy of Mexico, then under the Government of Spain, Martinez, with two armed vessels, took possession of Nootka on the 6th of May 1789; and it is affirmed in Greenhow's compilation, upon full examination, that, "before the arrival of the Spanish commander Martinez at Nootka, in May 1789, no settlement, factory, or commercial or military establishment whatever, had been founded, or even attempted; and no jurisdiction had been exercised by the subjects or authorities of any civilized nation in any part of America bordering upon the Pacific, between Port San Francisco and Prince William's Sound." The first being in latitude 37 degrees north, and the second in latitude 60 degrees.

Such are the prominent points showing the rights of Spain to the Northwest coast, founded upon discovery and occupancy. Now, the United States have become the successors of Spain, and every right she had, according to the law of nations belongs to us. By the treaty of February 10, 1763, between Great Britain, France, and Spain, England was confirmed in her possession to the French provinces on the St. Lawrence, and she relinquished all claim to territory beyond the Mississippi. Spain acquired Louisiana from France the 3d of November, 1762, and held it until October 1, 1800; she then retroceded it to France—"the same in extent as it now is in the hands of Spain, as it was when France formerly possessed it, and as it should be according to the treaties subsequently made between Spain and other nations." Such is the language of the treaty.

On the 30th of April, 1803, the First Consul of France (Bonaparte) ceded Louisiana to the United States, in the language of the deed itself, "with all its rights and appurtenances, as fully and in the same manner as it had been acquired from Spain" in 1800.

Whatever extent Louisiana possessed under either France or Spain, became the territory of the United States. The discovery by La Salle of the river St. Louis (now Mississippi) gave to France, according to the law of nations, the whole territory watered by it, or its tributary streams, not previously occupied by any other power. This extended Louisiana to the Rocky Mountains on the west, and up the main channel to its source.

By the treaty of February 22, 1819, commonly called the Florida treaty, the boundary between the possessions of the United States and Spain was established at latitude 42 degrees north, extending from the head-waters of the Arkansas, west, to the Pacific ocean. And the third article of the treaty declares that "his Catholic Majesty cedes to the said United States all his rights, claims, and pretensions to any territories east and north of the said line; and for himself, his heirs and successors, renounces all claim to the said territories forever." This is the treaty that perfects our rights; and by this sweeping clause invests the United States with every right, interest, or claim, which the Spanish monarchy possessed upon the shores of the Pacific. What her discoveries were, extending through a period of two hundred and fifty years, I have already shown.

So much for our title to the Oregon, derived by treaty, through France and Spain. Let us now trace our own title, as founded upon discovery and occupancy by citizens and soldiers under the flag of the United States.

The valuable commerce in furs and skins upon the shores of the Pacific induced enterprising merchants, shortly after the Revolution, to engage in that trade.

On the 30th September, 1787, Captains Robert Gray and John Kendrick sailed from Boston in the ships Washington and Columbia, for the Northwest coast. The Washington arrived at Nootka on the 17th of September, 1788, and the Columbia the latter part of that month; at which place both vessels spent the winter. The next year Captain Gray discovered the strait of Fuca, and passed up it fifty miles; and from information derived from the natives, he had no doubt it communicated with the Pacific north of Nootka, at a place he had the year before called Pintard's Sound. The furs collected by Gray and Kendrick they sold in Canton. Gray returned to the United States, and Kendrick remained upon the coast. Gray shortly after again sailed for the Northwest coast, and on the 7th of May, 1792, he discovered a safe harbor in latitude 47 degrees north, and which, in honor of one of the owners of the ship, he called Bulfinch's harbor. On the 11th of May, 1792, he discovered the mouth of the Columbia, which he describes as being a broad and rapid river, the water of which was so perfectly fresh that the casks of the ship were filled within ten miles of the Pacific. He ascended the river twenty miles; he landed and examined the country, and remained there trading with the great number of natives that crowded round his ship in their canoes, until the 20th of the month, when he sailed out into the Pacific. He bestowed the name of his ship—the Columbia—upon the noble river, and called the promontory on the north Cape Hancock, and that on the south Cape Adams.

Such is the account given by Captain Gray himself of his discovery of the Columbia. The material facts are recorded at length in the log-book of his ship, a copy of which has been furnished by Mr. Charles Bulfinch under oath.

The discovery of this great river of the West constitutes an important era in the history of the country. It opened a new channel of communication from the ocean to the Rocky Mountains, and extended, by means of its tributaries, to almost every part of one of the most fertile regions upon the globe. It contributed to secure to the country, under whose flag the discovery was made, a title to the river, and the magnificent territory which is watered by it.

Since the Oregon Territory has begun to be understood and to be justly appreciated, the British Government, through its ministers, have indulged in doubts—nay, in denial—as to Mr. Gray's prior discovery of the Columbia. In order that there shall be no misunderstanding, I will give the words of the British plenipotentiaries in their communication in 1826, to Mr. Gallatin, our minister.

They say that "Great Britain can show that, in 1788, (that is, four years before Gray entered the mouth of the Columbia river,) Mr. Mears, a lieutenant in the royal navy, who had been sent by the East India Company on a trading expedition to the Northwest coast of America, had already minutely explored that coast from the 49th to the 45th degree of north latitude; had taken formal possession of the straits of De Fuca in the name of his sovereign; had purchased land, trafficked, and formed treaties with the natives; and had actually entered the bay of the Columbia, to the northern headland, which he gave the name of Cape Disappointment. Dixon, Scott, Duncan, Strange, and other private British traders, had also visited these shores and countries several years before Gray; but the single example of Mears suffices to quash Gray's claim to prior discovery. To the other navigators above mentioned, therefore, it is unnecessary to refer more particularly."

Let us proceed to examine the pretensions of the British Government, as set forth in the extraordinary passage here quoted. That Mr. Mears should have minutely explored that coast—"minutely explored" are the words—and yet not have discovered a river which is seven miles wide at the mouth, would seem to be too great a tax upon the credulity of any one. That he should have entered the bay south of Cape Disappointment in 1788, and thereby furnished his Government any claim to the Columbia, would be equally incredible, when it is positively proved that Heceta, a Spanish navigator, entered the same opening in 1775, and actually named the same Entrada de Heceta, and which is so represented on the Spanish maps. That Mr. Mears should have taken formal possession of the Strait of De Fuca, and that such act should be relied upon as conferring any right, is equally wonderful—especially when it is remembered that the said straits had been discovered and navigated from one end to the other under Spanish authority, and therefore rightfully belonged to Spain for a period, at that time, of one hundred and ninety-six years. Captain Berkeley, under Austrian colors, entered the Strait of De Fuca in the summer of 1787, one year before Mears was there. Why did not he claim it? Berkeley, finding it in the latitude, and answering the description which De Fuca had given of it, and which appeared upon all the old maps, immediately bestowed upon it the name of its discoverer, and called it the Strait of Juan De Fuca. Captain Gray, of the United States, landed at Nootka, (which is on the island formed by this strait,) the 17th of September, 1788; Captain Kendrick joined him during the same month; they built houses, traded with the natives, and spent the winter there. Gray sailed up this same strait fifty miles. The reason that Berkeley and Gray made no claim to the discovery of the Strait of Fuca is, because they knew what the whole maritime world knew—that the merit belonged to another; and that the strait would forever bear the name of its rightful discoverer.

What discoveries were made by Dixon, Scott

Duncan, Strange, and other British traders, we are not told; and for a very good reason. Indeed, they seem to be named only to fill up the back ground of the picture, as the sentence concludes by saying that the single example of Mears suffices to quash—yes, quash is the word—Gray's claim to the prior discovery of the Columbia river.

Now, it so happens that I have beforeme a piece of evidence upon this subject, that cannot fail to be interesting to the Senate and the country. It is testimony written at the time, with all the frankness of a gallant sailor—and that sailor, too, an officer of Great Britain. I read it here, to show how the assumed facts and conjured up arguments of a British minister to sustain a bad cause, and made out forty years after the date of the transaction, are annihilated by the naked statement of a sailor, and he their own officer.

I read from the second volume of the voyage of discovery of Captain George Vancouver to the north Pacific ocean in 1791–'92–'93–'94.

Vancouver was in latitude 47° 37′, and says at page 41:

"At four o'clock a sail was discovered to the westward, standing in shore. This was a very great novelty, not having seen any vessel but our own consort during the last eight months. She soon hoisted American colors, and fired a gun to leeward. At six we spoke her. She proved to be the ship Columbia, commanded by Mr. Robert Gray, belonging to Boston. Having little doubt of his being the same person who had formerly commanded the sloop Washington, I desired he would bring to, and sent Mr. Puget and Mr. Menzies on board to acquire such information as might be serviceable in our future operations.

"On the return of the boat, we found our conjectures had not been ill-grounded; that this was the same gentleman who had commanded the sloop Washington at the time we were informed. She had made a very singular voyage behind Nootka. It was not a little remarkable, that, on our approach to this inland sea, (Strait of De Fuca,) we should fall in with the identical person who, it had been stated, had sailed through it. His relation differed, however, very materially from that published in England. He assured the officers that he had penetrated only fifty miles into the strait in question.

"He (Captain Gray) likewise informed them of his having been off the mouth of a river, in latitude 46° 10′, where the outset or reflux was so strong as to prevent his entering for nine days."

Page 58: "The river Mr. Gray mentioned should, from the latitude he assigned to it, have existence in the bay south of Cape Disappointment. This we passed on the forenoon of the 27th; and, as I then observed, if any inlet or river should be found, it must be a very intricate one, and inaccessible to vessels of our burden. Mr. Gray said he had been several days attempting to enter it. I was thoroughly convinced, as were also most persons of observation on board, that we could not possibly have passed any safe navigable opening, harbor, or place of security for shipping, on this coast, from Cape Mendocino to the promontory of Classat:"—that is, from 40° to 47° 30′ north latitude, and extending a great distance both north and south of the Columbia.

In the month of October following, when the worthy Captain Vancouver returned to Nootka, and saw Mr. Quadra, the Spanish commander, he changed his opinion upon the point that there was no such river as the Columbia, or no harbor on the coast for shipping. The 13th of October, at page 388 vol. 2d, he uses this language:

"The present re-established serenity (of weather) encouraged me to hope I might be enabled, in our route to the southward, to re-examine the coast, and particularly a river and a harbor discovered by Mr. Gray, in the ship Columbia, between the 46th and 47th degrees of latitude, of which Señor Quadra had favored me with a sketch. For this purpose our course was directed along shore to the eastward, which would afford an opportunity of examining the Spanish survey between Nootka and De Fuca's straits."

This last passage contains three highly important admissions:

1st. That Mr. Gray had discovered the river Columbia.

2d. That he had discovered a harbor (meaning Gray's harbor) north of the river; and that both these discoveries had been made upon a coast where he (Vancouver) had declared, in April before, that no river, no harbor, or opening, existed.

3d. That the Spaniards had previously made a survey of the coast from Nootka Sound to De Fuca's straits.

Accordingly, on the 16th of October, at page 393, we have the following order of Captain Vancouver:

"I directed Mr. Whidley, taking one of the Discovery's boats, should proceed in the Dedalus to examine Gray's harbor, said to be situated in latitude 46° 53′; whilst the Chatham and Discovery explored the river Mr. Gray had discovered in the latitude 46° 10′."

Page 395: "In the afternoon, when having nearly reached Cape Disappointment, which forms the north point of entrance into Columbia river, (so named by Mr. Gray,) I directed the Chatham to lead into it."

Sir, (said Mr. McR.,) was ever proof of the existence of any fact more conclusive than that here exhibited—that Captain Gray was the first discoverer of the great river of the West! This old volume which I have found in the library contains the regular journal of daily entries, made by Captain Vancouver from April to October, 1792. The information furnished to him by Captain Gray, of the strait of Fuca, of Gray's harbor, and of the Columbia river, is repeatedly mentioned. Captain Vancouver objected, in April, that there was any such river or bay. When he returned in October, and learned the particulars from Quadra, and received from him a diagram of both, he directs the bay to be examined by Whidley, and orders the other vessel to lead into the Columbia. He examines them, and admits that Gray was the discoverer. In the face of proof like this, is it not amazing that the British ministers in 1826 should declare to Mr. Gallatin that the discoveries of Mears suffice to "quash" Gray's claim to prior discovery?

The connected testimony of their own witness, entered in his daily journal, and detailed in all the simplicity of truth, is, of itself, sufficient to quash a thousand such claims as those of Mears. It does not only destroy all pretensions on the part of Mears, but it annihilates the arguments of the ministry in sustaining it. As long as that noble stream shall bear the rich commerce that is destined to float upon its bosom from the mountains to the sea, so long will this evidence hold up to the living world the name and character of its undoubted discoverer.

There is another branch of this subject to be considered, and which completes the view of our title to the country by discovery. Mr. Jefferson nominated on the 11th January, 1803, Messrs. Livingston and Monroe to the Senate as ministers to negotiate for the purchase of Louisiana. On the 18th of that month, he recommended an appropriation for an expedition to the Pacific ocean. The 30th of April, 1803, the Louisiana treaty was signed; and on the 14th of May, 1804, Captains Lewis and Clarke entered the Missouri river on their western expedition. Of the importance of that expedition—of the privations and hardships which were endured in its performance—of the unrivalled intrepidity, courage, and talent, displayed by its commanders and the whole party, it is not now my purpose to speak. These things are known, and fill up one of the most interesting and thrilling pages in our history. The expedition traversed the Missouri to its sources among the Stony Mountains, crossed them in latitude 47 degrees north, found the head waters of the Columbia, constructed canoes, and passed down the river; and on the 15th of November, 1805, landed at Cape Hancock, upon the Pacific ocean. Lewis and Clarke and their party passed the winter at an encampment erected by them south of the Columbia, near its mouth. They traded, hunted, and fished with the Indians, and on the 13th of March, 1806, started for the United States. They followed the Columbia in their canoes to its falls, and thence travelled by land to the mountains. One party, under Captain Lewis, crossed the mountains directly east to the falls of the Missouri; while the other party, under Captain Clarke, crossed south, to the sources of the Yellow Stone, and passed down it to its mouth, where the parties were re-united, and on the 23d of September, 1806, arrived at St. Louis. This was the first instance in which the Oregon Territory and the Columbia river, from its source to its mouth, had ever been traversed by civilized man. The whole country on the route, for more than three thousand miles, was sublime wilderness. Lewis and Clarke were not men about whom posterity can err. They are of the number of those whose acts stand in high relief before the world, and whose courage, self-command, and indomitable perseverance awakened new impulses in the age in which God had placed them upon earth.

The trip was undertaken by the Government for the avowed purpose of discovery; it was intended to accomplish an exploration of the Oregon Territory from the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific ocean. It was intended to found a claim to that territory in virtue of such discovery, and in furtherance of our existing rights from the discovery of the mouth of the Columbia by Captain Gray. The notoriety of the expedition of Lewis and Clarke, and the publication of their journal, were notice to the world of our purposes, and of the success of the expedition.

Our enterprising citizens have traversed portions of the country on both sides of the Rocky Mountains often since, and as far south as the Mexican settlements. Emanuel Lisa, Hunt, Henry, and others of Missouri, could be named; and General Thomas James, of my own State. These noble men, though engaged in individual pursuits, explored our remote possessions, and from their intrepidity and talents made the name and character of their country respected in the remotest regions of the West. Their names are known among all the tribes, and by their exertions and sacrifices the rights of our country are engraved upon the mountains.

In furtherance of the rights of the United States to Oregon, founded upon prior discovery, there was an occupancy of the country under our flag of great notoriety, and a subsequent act of the British Government recognising our rights founded upon that occupancy. I refer to the establishment of Astoria, near the mouth of the Columbia. In 1810 the party left the United States, with the necessary material and men; part sailed from New York, and part crossed the country by land, and all met at the mouth of the Columbia in the spring of 1811. Astoria was established, houses and other buildings erected, gardens enclosed and cultivated, a vessel built and launched, and trading-posts located in the interior as high as the mouth of the Okanagan, which is four hundred miles up the Columbia. The party engaged in hunting and trapping, and carried on an extensive and lucrative trade with the natives. Their furs and skins they shipped to Canton. The proceeds were sent to the United States in silks, teas, and other products of the East India markets.

The establishment at Astoria—though it encountered some reverses, and especially in the murder by the Indians of the crew of the ship Tonquin (in which bloody affair, one of the crew, rather than suffer himself to be murdered by their hands, blew up the vessel, after the enemy had overpowered them,)—the establishment, I say, notwithstanding its reverses, bade fair to be highly prosperous. It had the entire command of the fur trade through the whole extent of the valley of the Columbia. It was the first permanent establishment ever made there. Arrangements at St. Petersburg had been made by it, for the exclusive trade with the Russian settlements in the north Pacific. There was not one British subject in the territory. The news of the war of 1812 was carried from Canada, by one of the Northwest Company, in 1813, and communicated to the inhabitants of Astoria. He was also the bearer of intelligence that a naval force was on its way from England to take possession of the mouth of the Columbia. The same intelligence was received from other quarters. A fraudulent sale was then made of the furs and other property, to a party of the British Northwest Company; and shortly after an English ship of war entered the Columbia river, and took possession of the fort and buildings at Astoria, changed the name to Fort George, and hoisted the British flag.

This was an act of public war. The place fell by belligerent capture. The property belonged to citizens of the United States, and was under the protection of our flag. England acquired no other right than that which grew out of the laws of war. I have detailed the material facts of the transaction, in order to show that England herself did not regard that capture as of any possession or territory of hers. Immediately after the treaty of Ghent, the United States demanded the restoration of Astoria, in pursuance of the stipulations in the first article, which provided that all territory, places, and possessions, captured by one party from the other during the war, should be restored.

Accordingly, after writing two letters denying our right to be restored to possession; and after an attempt to have the question referred to an umpire, which our Government refused; and after an armed vessel of the United States had actually sailed for the mouth of the Columbia, for the purpose of re-occupying Astoria, and finding that nothing would do but the restoration of the fort and property, the British Government surrendered it.

The act of delivery is worth reading, to show the good taste in which that Government can do things, and also to show the unqualified terms in which the restoration was made. It is in these words:

"In obedience to the commands of his royal highness the Prince Regent, signified in a despatch from the right honorable the Earl Bathurst, addressed to the partners or agents of the Northwest Company, bearing date the 27th January, 1818, and in obedience to a subsequent order, dated the 26th of July, from W. H. Sherriff, Esq., captain of his Majesty's ship Andromache, we, the undersigned, do, in conformity to the first article of the treaty of Ghent, restore to the Government of the United States, through its agent, J. B. Provost, Esq., the settlement of Fort George on the Columbia river. Given under our hands, in triplicate, at Fort George, (Columbia river,) this 6th day of October, 1818.

F. HICKEY,
Captain of H. M. Ship Blossom.
J. KEITH,
Of the Northwest Company."

We were, therefore, restored to the possession of Astoria in the most ample manner; and the United States have been in the legal possession ever since.

In 1818 Lord Castlereagh admitted the full right of the Americans to be reinstated, and to be the party in possession while treating of title. By the conventional law of Europe, the consummation of the inchoate title gained by discovery is the formation of settlements in the country discovered. This is a safe and well-settled rule; and we can justly say, that both by right of discovery, and by continued acts of ownership, as well as by the title derived through France and Spain, the United States, according to the settled law of nations, has a clear and undoubted right and title to the Territory of Oregon.

There is another branch of this subject to be considered. It is as to the validity of the claim which England has made to that territory. I propose to state the nature of this claim, that it may be seen in connexion with the view I have presented of our own. The subject is one of great interest, and an examination of its merits cannot be uninteresting to the country. England places her claim upon the right of discovery, and upon a treaty with Spain dated in 1790. The first English navigator that is mentioned as conferring any claim is Sir Francis Drake. He sailed from Plymouth in 1577, and arrived in the Pacific the next year. England and Spain were at peace; but as soon as he arrived at the Spanish towns of Gautulco, Acapulco, and others in Mexico, he commenced a system of robbery upon their towns and ships, that was altogether new to the Spaniards. We do not know what his instructions were; but one thing is certain—that he meant to let the Spaniards know that there was such a man as Sir Francis Drake. He certainly created quite a sensation, for the historian says that the bare mention of his name would horrify the people for a century afterwards. After he had thus amused himself, he sailed up the coast to 43 degrees north; and then returned to the coast at 38 degrees, repaired his ship, called the country New Albion, accepted the crown from the natives in the name of her Majesty Queen Elizabeth, and arrived in England in 1580. The whole of the coast seen by Drake, so far as we can judge from the evidence, had been explored under the authority of Spain thirty-six years before, and several times within that period.

Sir Thomas Cavendish next attempted the circumnavigation of the globe, in the list of English adventurers. He does not appear to have seen as much of the coast as Drake had before him.

The next name that appears in the list of English discoverers, is one that has been made immortal by his public services, and by the justice and excellence of his character. I mean the celebrated Captain Cook. England was anxious to ascertain whether there was or was not a northern passage by water connecting the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. She despatched ships forth at purpose, at the same time, to the north Pacific, and to Baffin's Bay. Captain Cook was selected to take charge of the expedition to the Pacific.

He was instructed to fall in with the Northwest coast at latitude 45, to recruit his wood and water, and then to sail to latitude 65 degrees north, and there to begin his examination for "a water passage pointing towards Hudson or Baffin's Bay." If he became convinced that no such communication existed, he was to explore the seas north as far as he could. He was to take possession of such countries as he might discover, that had not already been discovered or visited by other European powers. He was not to touch upon any part of the Spanish dominions, unless driven there by accident. He was to give no offence to the subjects of his Catholic Majesty or of Russia, but to treat them with friendship. Such is the substance of Cook's instructions. They clearly point out the objects of his voyage, and the views of the British Government. Cook sailed from England and reached the Northwest coast in 1778. He saw Cape Blanco in latitude 43, and Cape Flattery in latitude 48. But he did not see the mouth of the Columbia, nor the strait of Fuca. The 29th of March, 1778, he anchored in Nootka Sound. He remained there four weeks, repairing his vessels, and trading with the Indians. He found they had weapons of iron, and ornaments of brass. One chief had two silver spoons of Spanish manufacture. He saw Mount San Jacinto, which had been named four years before by Bodega, and Mount St. Elias, described in Bhering's voyage. He continued his examinations north, passed into the Arctic ocean, to the western extremity of America, and crossed over to Asia, naming the strait after Bhering, in honor of its first discoverer. He traced the coast of America to latitude 70 degrees 30 minutes north, when he had to return in consequence of the ice. He found no passage to the Atlantic, because none existed. The remainder of his history is known to the world. He visited the Russian settlement at Unalashka on his way to the south, and arrived at Owyhee, where, on the 16th of February, 1779, this gallant and generous man was murdered by savages.

The examinations and surveys of Cook in the north Pacific are of imperishable value. They opened to the world a new theatre for enterprise. But his instructions and the settled laws of nations prevented him from acquiring any rights by discovery to the Oregon Territory. His operations were directed to regions far north, and his discovery of the Capes Blanco and Flattery, and landing at Nootka, gave no right to England; for all these points had been previously seen and explored by Spanish navigators. Nootka Sound had been occupied by Perez in 1774, which was four years before Cook arrived. The subsequent navigators, Mears, Vancouver, and others, were nothing but trespassers upon the discoveries of Spain and of the United States.

The next ground of title assumed by Great Britain is founded upon a treaty with Spain. It is, therefore, necessary that we look into the provisions of that treaty. In 1826, upon the renewal of the discussion in regard to the Oregon between Great Britain and the United States, Mr. Huskisson and Mr. Addington, the ministers of Great Britain, in a communication to Mr. Gallatin, state their claim growing out of the Spanish treaty in these words:

"Great Britain claims no exclusive sovereignty over any portion of the territory on the Pacific, between the 42d and 49th parallel of latitude; her present claim—not in respect to any part, but to the whole—is limited to a right of joint occupancy in common with other States, leaving the right of exclusive dominion in abeyance; and her pretensions tend to the mere maintenance of her own rights, in resistance to the exclusive character of the pretensions of the United States.

"The rights of Great Britain are recorded and defined in the convention of 1790, (with Spain;) they embrace the right to navigate the waters of those countries, to settle in and over any part of them, and to trade with the inhabitants and occupiers of the same. It is admitted that the United States possess the same rights; but, beyond those rights, they possess none."

Here, then, we have not only the rights of Great Britain defined, but we are modestly told what are our rights. Her claim, it is said, is limited to a right of joint occupancy in common with other States. What other States? In 1826, did any other Government but ours (except the claim she was putting forth) lay claim to it? Spain, France, and Russia, had all renounced to us, and the boundaries were established. And is England to decide that the only right to Oregon, in favor of any Government, is a mere possessory one; and that it is a common right equally belonging to other States? If so, it would seem that our treaties with France, Spain, and Russia, are to be abrogated; that our right to Oregon must be abandoned; and that henceforth it is to be regarded as a country subject to the claim of any "other States" of the world. The avowal of doctrines so monstrous, and so wholly at war with the settled law of nations, only proves the utter groundlessness of her claim.

Let it be remembered that her ministers declared that "the rights of Great Britain are recorded and defined in the convention of 1790" with Spain. And then let us proceed to examine what are the rights, the breadth and length of which are recorded in that convention. Here is the fifth article, the one upon which these supposed English rights are founded:

"Art. 5. As well in the places which are to be restored to the British subjects by virtue of the first article, as in all other parts of the northwestern coast of North America, or of the islands adjacent, situate to the north of the coast already occupied by Spain, wherever the subjects of either of the two powers shall have made settlements since the month of April, 1789, or shall hereafter make any, the subjects of the other shall have free access, and shall carry on their trade without any disturbance or molestation."

Now, in what places, or upon what "parts" of the northwestern coast of North America, did this article operate? Is it upon the whole Northwest coast, or only upon a part of it? The plain language of the article furnishes the answer. It is upon the "parts of the northwestern coast, or of the islands adjacent, situate to the north of the coast already occupied by Spain, wherever the subjects of either of the two powers shall have made settlements since the month of April, 1789." And what parts of the northwest coast of North America did the subjects of either Spain or England then occupy by settlements made after the month of April, 1789? It is proved beyond all doubt, that the only place upon which either Spanish or British subjects made settlements between the month of April, 1789, and the 28th of October, 1790, the date of the convention, was at Nootka Sound. The testimony furnished by England and Spain, and the letters of Captain Gray and Joseph Ingraham, all concur in proving this. Nootka was head-quarters. The ships, after obtaining their supply of furs, sailed from there directly to Canton. The language of the convention could not refer to the ancient southern settlements at California or San Francisco. The dispute had grown out of disturbances at Nootka, upon the Northwest coast. Spain occupied Nootka; so had England; the convention looked to that occupation,

The joint occupancy was not to be to the south, but exclusively north of the parts so occupied. And Nootka is in latitude 49° 40′, which is two hundred and forty miles north of the mouth of the Columbia river. That convention, therefore, never gave to England the right to occupy a foot of territory south of Nootka Sound.

Sir, no part of the valley of the Columbia river is included in that treaty. And Mr. Huskisson and Mr. Addington, in stating that "the rights of Great Britain are recorded and defined in the convention of 1790 with Spain," have admitted that England has no rights whatever south of Nootka.

Mr. President, (said Mr. McR.,) in this construction of the treaty of 1790, I am sustained by the highest possible evidence. I am sustained by the authority of British statesmen, who supported that treaty when Mr. Pitt brought it before Parliament. I read from the 28th volume of Parliamentary History. The Duke of Montrose, who moved an address of thanks to his Majesty for having made the treaty, said:

"We are not only restored to Nootka, but, by an express stipulation, we may participate in a more northern settlement, if we should find at any time that a more northern situation would be preferable for the carrying on of the trade."

Mr. Dundas said: "At Nootka we have obtained a specific right of settlement to trade and fish," page 980.

Mr. Smith, another friend of the ministry, and who warmly supported the treaty, said:

"The whole coast of Prince William's Sound was free for us to settle on, no place being occupied there by a Spanish colony."

And where is Prince William's Sound? Mr. McR. said, by turning to the map it appeared that it is situated directly west of Mount St. Elias, in the 60th degree of north latitude, being nine hundred miles north of Columbia river.

Here we have the construction put upon the treaty by its friends, that the right on the part of Great Britain to make settlements was to be to the north of Nootka. The same volume (said Mr. McR.) contains the opinions of members of Parliament who were opposed to the treaty.

The celebrated Mr. Fox, of whose talents and sagacity I need not speak here, in the debate upon the convention, said:

"Our right before was to settle in any part of South or Northwest America not fortified against us by previous occupancy; and we are now restricted to settle in certain places only, and under certain restrictions." Again, at page 996 he says: "We had obtained an admission of our rights to settle to the north; and even that we had not obtained with clearness, as 'Spanish settlements' were the only mark of limits."

Lord North said:

"Was it not necessary to know the reasons for so vague a delineation of our rights in the Northwestern American seas, as the convention contained; and of the boon of Spain's not colonizing beyond the most northern of her settlements?"

The Marquis of Lansdowne said:

"As to the particular terms of the convention just concluded, it stipulated, with respect to Nootka Sound, what was either pernicious or trifling. It appeared madness to think of colonies, after what had passed in North America."

The last remark, you perceive, is a very pointed one; and being made but nine years after the Revolution, its import was well understood.

Sir, many members denounced the ministry, in terms of bitter reproach, because the treaty had not secured to them more of the Northwest coast, and because the British were restricted in their settlements to the territory north of Nootka.

Lord Porchester said:

"A conduct so absurd and pernicious, so destitute of all policy, the history of nations cannot exhibit. Bullying so unprovoked, evaporating at length in a convention so unmeaning, confidence given so liberally, and so illy rewarded, never was paralleled. Did not the event, he asked, confirm the very general observation without doors, that we had a ministry who had neither courage to make war, nor the skill to make peace?"

And, sir, (said Mr. McR.,) this very subject of boundary, and the exclusion of the British traders from the country south of Nootka—that is, from the whole valley of the Columbia river—was pressed upon the ministry as a dereliction of duty, with all the strength and eloquence of a most talented opposition. This point was never denied by the ministry or their friends. The treaty was defended on other grounds, and was adopted, with the admission of its friends, and the charge of its opponents, that the British right of joint occupancy with Spain was confined to the country north of Nootka Sound. And yet, sir, it was in this treaty—ay, this far-famed treaty—that, in 1826, Mr. Huskisson and Mr. Addington averred that "the rights of Great Britain are recorded and defined."

I take them at their word; and the history now exhibited, the concurrent testimony of its friends and opponents at the time of its adoption, together with the language of the treaty itself, all prove that it gave to Great Britain no right at all to any part of Oregon. We look to something higher than Nootka conventions for our title. It is based upon the first elements of national law,—upon prior discovery, upon occupancy, and upon deeds of purchase from France and Spain.

I have now done with this branch of the subject—the question of title. It is one of great and transcendant importance to the whole community; for our people, who square their lives by a sense of justice to others, only want to know what are their own rights, in order to defend and maintain them. And upon the views now presented of our indefeasible title to the Oregon Territory, I am willing to abide the decision of the living, and the judgment of posterity.

The bill before us proposes—

1st. To cause a line of posts, not to exceed five in number, to be established from our Western boundary to the mouth of the Columbia river.

2d. To attach the Oregon to the Territory of Iowa, for judicial purposes; and to appoint a judge and justices of the peace to administer the laws.

3d. That Congress will hereafter provide for granting to each inhabitant over eighteen years of age six hundred and forty acres of land, who shall cultivate it five years; to the wife of each occupant, one hundred and sixty acres; and to the father, for each child he may have under eighteen years of age, or that may be born there within the five years, one hundred and sixty acres.

These are the inducements which the bill proposes as an encouragement to emigrants. The honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CHOATE] are of opinion that the proposed grants of land may come in conflict with one of our treaty stipulations, giving a right of joint occupancy to English subjects. Now I think that, upon a more full examination of the subject, the objection will be removed; and I believe I shall be able to show that England has been permitting to be done precisely what we propose to do. The convention of October 20, 1818, and extended by that of August 6, 1827, was intended for the purposes of hunting and trapping; the whole object was to preserve peace among men of the two nations, in pursuit of furs and skins. The convention expressly exempted the title to the country from its operation. We can, therefore, as well dispose of the title to the land, as though the convention had no existence. Upon this point there can be no doubt. Now, as to the propriety of doing it, we all know that the leading inducements to the formation of that convention, which was to facilitate the collection of furs and skins, has almost entirely ceased; and particularly in the country south of the Columbia, which is the best adapted to agricultural pursuits.

The hunter has laid by his rifle and traps, and is cultivating the land for a subsistence. If our people go there, they must pursue the mechanics arts, or be cultivators of the soil—not hunters. And they will not go to Oregon, unless we make provision for them. Indeed, this donation is the most capital feature of the bill. It will insure a vigorous and active population in the country, and nothing else will. Now I think my honorable friends will agree with me about title.

Mr. CALHOUN. I agree that the question of title is clear.

Mr. CHOATE expressed himself of the same opinion.

Mr. MCROBERTS. We do not differ upon that point.

Now the convention of 1818, creating the joint occupancy, by one of its provisions, can be annulled by giving twelve months' notice. The passage of this bill will induce the Executive to give the required notice, or we can have it done by a joint-resolution. Before our people can get to Oregon, the convention will be annulled; although it imposes no obligation incompatible with our right to pass this bill. But there are other reasons: the bill is a pledge that we will make provision for emigrants and settlers, though no grant is to be made under five years. This pledge to provide for cultivators of the soil could not, therefore, molest the British subjects in any right of hunting, trapping, fishing, or farming, which was provided for or contemplated in the convention of 1818.

Sir, (said Mr. McR.,) the British Government have been for ten years doing, or permitting to be done, precisely what we propose. Its subjects have already large farms in Oregon. One gentleman there in 1837, as we learn from a letter of one of the missionaries, raised 4,500 bushels of wheat, 4,000 bushels peas, 1,700 bushels barley, 1,500 bushels oats, and potatoes in proportion. He has 750 cattle, 400 hogs, 200 horses, and a grist and saw mill of great value, and works one hundred hands, mostly Canadians. He has a garden of five acres (I quote from the printed letter) "stored with almost every species of vegetables, fruits, and flowers; among them figs, citrons, oranges, lemons, pomegranates, cotton plants, and all common fruits in the United States. Everything produces well. For some days our time was divided between visits to the farm, the mills, the herds, the dairy, the stores, the ships in port, the school, &c. It, of course, gave us great satisfaction to witness these fruits of civilization, which we supposed our eyes had looked upon for the last time when we passed the frontier line of our own land."

This is farming upon no ordinary scale. The establishment at Vancouver trades largely to the Sandwich Islands in flour and sawed lumber. Both English and Americans have farms on the Wallamett. And, sir, Great Britain is encouraging this policy, and declares that she will protect her subjects in this individual appropriation of the land. Mr. Huskisson and Mr. Addington, in 1826, in a despatch to our ministers, said: "In the interior of the territory in question, the subjects of Great Britain have had for many years numerous settlements and trading-posts. And they navigate the Columbia as the sole channel for the conveyance of their produce to the British stations nearest to the sea, &c. To the interests and establishments which British industry and enterprise have created, Great Britain owes protection; that protection will be given, both as regards settlement and freedom of trade and navigation." This is all that is material in the statement.

Sir, (said Mr. McR.,) what is this but an appropriation of land? We allowed her a temporary right of joint occupancy with us; and under this, England encourages her subjects to settle and cultivate the land, erect farms and build mills, and then tells you that her subjects shall be protected in their settlements and establishments thus formed or to be formed. Is there any difference between such a declaration, and the pledge which we make to provide for settlers in this bill? In substance, they are precisely the same. The Senator from Massachusetts says that England might also make grants of land to her subjects, which might produce collisions between persons holding adjoining farms under different titles. This is the answer: England could make no grants where she had no title. She might as well make grants upon the Potomac, as upon the Columbia. But this bill removes all tempt-tion for such a procedure, by conferring its privileges upon all residents, whether they be of Anglo-American or European blood. England, therefore, could have no cause of complaint, because such of her subjects as may have built farms, and who see proper to remain in the country and become subject to our laws and jurisdiction, would be protected, and placed upon the footing of our own citizens. This matter has been thoroughly considered; and the provisions of the bill promising to make future provision for those who have or may expend their labor or money in making farms, is founded in the highest principle of justice and philosophy.

Sir, a sense of public duty requires immediate action. By our settled policy, we have placed a numerous Indian population upon our Western borders, extending from Iowa to the line of Texas. They are now at peace with us; but they are the shattered fragments of a hundred hostile tribes, and are composed of the very elements of war. Being on the frontier, they are liable to be influenced by those who have been, and again may become, inimical to us. I need not stop here to tell the Senate from what source all our Indian wars have proceeded, or whose hands first kindled the hostile fires; the world knows all this, for the history of it is written in blood.

What plan could so effectually remove the temptation to war on the part of those tribes, as also of the tribes still more remote, as to have a population in their rear sufficient to overpower them?

The natural element of the Indian is war. He is taught it from his mother's lips in the wigwam, and sees it practised and cherished as the highest virtue of his tribe. We must counteract as far as possible this dangerous propensity of his being; we must remove the temptation; we must provide guards for protection; and the settlement of the Oregon with an efficient population would accomplish all this, and would create a moral power which, in time, would extinguish their war fires.

The Territory of Oregon, to which our right is indisputable, extends from the 42d to the 49th degree of north latitude, and from the Pacific ocean to our territory east of the Rocky Mountains. This comprises a fertile region 700 miles wide at one extremity, and 500 at the other, running through seven degrees of latitude, and embracing nearly two hundred millions of acres—enough to form three or four new States. Hitherto it might have been thought we had territory enough, and that for some generations at least we would not have use for more. But the late census, as well as those preceding, shows that we may count upon our population being doubled every twenty-three or four years. Here is the table showing our increase:

In 1800 - - - -	5,305,941
In 1810 - - - -	7,239,814
In 1820 - - - -	9,654,596
In 1830 - - - -	12,866,020
In 1840 - - - -	17,068,666

By this ratio we may expect to have a population of fifty-two millions in 1880, and at the close of the present century at least ninety-two millions. We lay claim to nothing but what belongs to us by right. By the mode proposed in this bill, we can accomplish this without any reasonable ground of offence towards any other Government. We have to act for those who are to succeed us; and our neglect of their interests, at the critical moment when it is our duty to place them on a permanent foundation, will be wholly inexcusable.

That duty is now to assert our rights—to extend our laws over the country—to encourage the occupation of our own territory by our own citizens—to give them temporary protection in their emigration; and, in less than ten years, your hardy citizens transplanted to this new section of our Union will be able to defend and protect themselves.

Sir, I want to see no more of this delay—no more procrastination.

> "To-morrow, and to morrow, and to-morrow,
> Creeps in its petty pace from day to day
> To the last syllable of recorded time;
> And all your yesterdays have lighted men
> The road to dusty death."

The great interests of the country require action—speedy and determined action; and I appeal to political opponents as well as friends to unite with us, and give an undivided support to this bill. Other nations will take warning by it.

If our right to Oregon can be settled only by war, then my constituents, and I believe the whole country, will unite with me in saying, Let it come. That territory belongs to us, as I have this day demonstrated; and I hold it one of our highest national duties to assert that title, let what may come. Give us a decisive vote in both Houses of Congress. Unanimity upon the question is all that is now necessary; it will settle it as effectually as the sword.

SPEECH OF MR. WOODBURY,

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

In Senate, January 24, 1843—On the Oregon bill.

Mr. WOODBURY asked if no legislation had taken place as to the Territory of Iowa or Florida, whether a bill like this, in respect to them, could be deemed objectionable? When our citizens had been plundered and murdered in numerous instances in a part of the country claimed to be our own, should we—would we—not protect them? All the bill proposed was, to do this; and he believed the Territory of Oregon to be ours, as incontestably as that of Florida or Iowa. This bill merely interposed the shield of American legislation over Americans there, authorized forts for their safety, and held out promises of land to insure settlers, and supplies to our own forts and vessels. But there were objections to such a measure. If legitimate, they must arise from some doubts connected with our right to the territory, or with the expediency of legislation in this manner, and at the present moment.

It will simplify the inquiry to see if there be any just ground for such doubts. He could not concede that there were.

First, as to the right. Every Senator who has spoken on this question has either attempted to prove, or has conceded, our right to the soil and sovereignty of the Territory of Oregon, independent of the treaties with England in 1818 and 1827. Who will now, in this chamber, deny or question that right? After the discovery by Captain Gray in 1788–'9; after the cession to us of Louisiana in 1803; after the explorations by Lewis and Clarke in 1805; after the occupation up to the war of 1812, and the restoration of the fort at the mouth of the Columbia in 1818 to this country; after the grant to us by Spain, in 1819, of all her claims north of the 42d degree of latitude; after the relinquishment to us, by Russia, of all claims south of the 54th degree,—I ask if any one here is prepared to doubt our right? I speak in an American Congress, and to American citizens; and do not propose to detain the Senate by going into this branch of the question, as regards the old claims of either England or the rest of the world. She herself may feel some confidence in them; but she has admitted that, while she claims some rights there independent of, and prior to the treaties of 1818 and 1827, yet that they are subject to negotiation; and are to be exercised subordinate to our possession, as well as our claims.

Hence in 1818 (Feb. 14th) Mr. Rush says: (4th vol. Gales and Seaton's State Papers, p. 853:) "It is proper, at this stage, to say that Lord Castlereagh admitted, in the most ample extent, our right to be reinstated, and to be the party in possession, while treating of the title."

It is, then, manifest that, our rights being clear to ourselves, and our possession being admitted to be proper by England during any negotiation as to their title, independent of the treaties before named, we can properly pass this bill, and fully occupy the territory, unless this would conflict with those treaties. If it would, far be it from me to urge the passage of the bill. I would respect the faith of treaties as strongly as any one. How stands the case, then, under them? for no claims beyond those treaties exist in any other nation or power, which England can set up against this measure. So says Lyman, (Diplomatic Cor. p. 99.) So says Baylies, in his report to the House of Representatives in May, 1826. Nor do I acknowledge her guardianship over other nations to enforce their claims, if they possessed any. We have had quite too much of her professed championship for the rest of the world; and especially in respect to our keeping a squadron on the coast of Africa.

When we attempted to negotiate a treaty of commerce with the King of Siam, her agents on the opposite side of the globe interposed there to thwart us. Again at Muscat they intermeddled, and failed.

When Mr. Monroe, in 1823, made his noble declaration against any new colonization by Europeans on this continent, again she interfered with that. If we shall hereafter attempt to hunt the seal, or chase whales on the coasts of the Antarctic continent, discovered by our enterprising vessels, I suppose we are again to be meddled with there. So be it; and so be its natural consequences in due time. But though in 1818 Russia and Spain may have had some claim to parts of the Territory of Oregon, they have both been since extinguished; and all those of France disappeared long ago, with the cession to us of Louisiana.

Whose claims, then, but her own, does the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CHOATE] seem to apprehend she can interpose? No European power can have any; and if the sovereigns of any of the South Sea islands, or the Emperor of Japan, have any, whose canoes or junks were ever blown on the Northwest coast, I believe they have not yet been hunted up by any of the indefatigable agents of British domination.

Do I make these remarks in derogation of her right to take care of her own interests, and, at proper times and places, to enforce her own claims? On the contrary, I respect her the more for standing by what belongs to herself; but abhor her officiousness in behalf of others, and the arrogant assumption, at times, (by herself, or others for her,) that she must dictate to the whole circle of civilized mankind.

Let us scrutinize, then, the origin and object of the treaties of 1818 and 1827, in order to see whether the present bill militates against the provisions of either of them. If it does not, even the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CHOATE] avows a willingness to support it.

Those treaties, it will be seen, originated in measures to adjust the commercial relations between England and the United States. The first one (of which the other is but a prolongation) took place, not at the peace—settling boundaries, extent of territories, jurisdiction, title to soil, powers of government, and all that;—but it was entered into some years after; and as a second commercial convention with England since the peace. The other (in July 1815) related to the rights of trade in settled parts of the two countries—and this, chiefly to the rights of fishing, hunting, and trading, in some unsettled parts of both countries: for one clause of it gives us access to acknowledged portions of her seaboard at the northeast, to dry fish, until the country is settled; while another—and that, the clause under consideration—secures to each, free and open access to the Territory of Oregon for ten years, evidently for objects of trade, the fisheries, and the chase.

These are the main objects of the conventions, though some matters not technically commercial may be provided for in parts of them. That this article now in question is a commercial one, is to be inferred from the particular language, no less than the occasion and general object of the treaty. The language is, not that the country west of the Rocky Mountains shall belong, in its soil and sovereignty, to both parties, or be governed jointly by them; but that "the same be free and open, for the term of ten years," "to the vessels, citizens, and subjects of the two powers." The natural import of this is, that neither party shall be excluded by the other from fishing, hunting, and trading there, during that period; but the same shall remain free and open to each, for such objects.

So far from this having been intended to suspend or forbid any rights of soil, or government, which either party might claim, or choose to exercise, it proceeded expressly to provide "that this agreement is not to be construed to the prejudice of any claim which either of the two contracting parties may have to any part of the said country."

If the treaty meant merely to stipulate that the commerce in and over the country should be free and open—leaving the title to it, and the sovereignty over it, and its government, in the mean time, as it was, or might be by virtue of other rights—then it is a natural arrangement, and not a novel one. Thus—to take a common case, for illustration—had we, by the other commercial treaty, as to the settled portions of the two countries, made New York a free port, and open to English subjects,—is there any pretence that the words free and open would have conferred on them any right of soil there, or any territorial authority?

Many similar treaties apply merely to commercial intercourse; and that between England and Russia, made in 1825, contains an example in point with the illustration just given. In the 8th article, it is provided that "the port of Githa, or Novo Archangelsk, shall be open to the commerce and vessels of British subjects, for the space of ten years," &c. But this, of course, could not affect the right of soil, or government. In other parts of that treaty, providing for mutual access to a certain tract of country, and with a view, doubtless, to shun any equivocal or doubtful expressions, it uses different language from our treaty, (but obviously with the same idea,) and says the parties "shall mutually be at liberty to frequent, without any hindrance whatever, all," &c., "for the purposes of fishing and trading with the natives." And, where a stipulation is made to let either party have power to colonize, or govern, it uses words different still, and speaks of making an "establishment"—and not merely of the country being free or open to vessels and subjects, or there being to both parties mere "liberty of commerce." So, in the treaty between us in Russia, in 1824, similar language is employed—almost verbatim, literatim. It also refers to the prevention of illicit trade, as the object of some of the provisions; and that was a prominent design in some of the articles in the Nootka Sound treaty of 1790—which last treaty was the prolific source of all provisions of this character since. The difficulty in that case grew out of the persevering attempts by England to push her commerce into every nook of the habitable globe, and procure new markets for her manufactures, even at the expense of the colonial systems of Spain or France.

Hence the message of the King of England, (28 Par. Hist., p. 763,) asking for additional means to resist the conduct of Spain in seizing her ships, speaks of it in a commercial view more than one of sovereignty. Hence, also, most of the articles in the Nootka Sound treaty relate to commerce, and provide new and stronger guards against illicit trade, wherever Spain had before occupied the country. They even push all British vessels ten sea leagues from any part of the coast already occupied by Spain," when three leagues is the usual distance. And the fifth article, which resembles and was the basis of our treaty of 1818, allowed new settlements only far north of Oregon, and then only in places not occupied before April, 1789; and to them, by whichever power made, "the subjects of the other shall have free access, and shall carry on their trade without any disturbance or molestation. (See 28 Par. Hist., p. 916) But this did not allow, nor mean to allow, each a title in the soil, or a right to govern the country. It was intended to be access for trade, and trade alone. In short, the debates on that treaty speak of the controversy as being commercial in its origin and bearing; and little seems to have been settled clearly by any part of the treaty, and nothing by this part of it, except the rights of trade.

The similar arrangement between Russia and England is classed by McCulloch under the head of commercial treaties. Sometimes such treaties go further, and regulate settlements. But then they use different and clear language, as before shown in the Russian treaties. So, by one article of the Nootka Sound convention, (where, at the southern part of this continent, the parties were, under the treaty, expressly allowed to erect buildings in places not before occupied,) it is still carefully provided that they must be "for the purpose of their fishery," and be mere "huts, or other temporary buildings, serving only for those purposes."

Under a like caution in this treaty of 1818, in the article allowing us to dry fish on the unsettled parts of British America at the northeast, clearly belonging to England, it is provided that, "so soon as the same, or any portion thereof, shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such portion so settled, without previous agreement for such purpose with the inhabitants," &c. Thus we see that, in no other treaty is the right of settlement, or of soil, or of government, regulated without using explicit language to that effect, and language entirely different from that employed in our treaty of 1818.

As another evidence that no intention existed in the last instrument to grant or regulate any claim, or exercise of claim, to the title and the sovereignty, except to prevent them from being so used as to interfere with freedom of trade to both parties during the stipulated period, we have already cited the reservation in the treaty itself, that it should not injure or prejudice such claim.

The reservation in the convention of 1827 is still stronger. It is, that "nothing contained in this convention," or in the third article of that of 1818, "shall be construed to impair, or in any manner affect, the claims which either of the contracting parties may have to any part of the country westward of the Stony or Rocky Mountains."

But, if these treaties are to be construed to prevent us from taking possession of the country, in a territorial point of view, which we claimed the right to before 1818, and which England herself conceded, then it is manifest they are construed so as both to affect and impair our claim to the country. They suspend it, interrupt it, and, for the time being, destroy it.

In 1812, we were, by our citizens, in actual possession of a part of the country—with a fort and occupants at the mouth of the Columbia. After the war, and before this treaty, that fort was restored to us officially and formally, as a duty under the treaty of peace. And Lord Castlereagh, in a letter from Mr. Rush before cited, appears to have "admitted, in the most ample extent, our right to be reinstated, and to be the party in possession while treating of the title." The occupants of the fort considered themselves there, not for sovereignty, but for "commercial pursuits." (See 4th vol. Gales & Seaton's State Papers, page 856.) And they well understood the difference between that, and occupation for government; as they inquired whether they would be indemnified if they were ejected or disturbed "prior to the final decision of the right of sovereignty to the country between our respective Governments." (State Papers, letter October 6, 1818.) This view also prevailed in England, as well as in Oregon, with the British ministry since, as well as before, the convention of October 20, 1818; for, in the negotiations which preceded the second convention, they proposed to extend the time fifteen years, and to introduce provisions "that neither power should assume or exercise any right of sovereignty or dominion over any part of the country during that period." (See Greenhow's Memoir, page 184.) But why this provision, if, under a fair construction of the old ones, both parties were restrained from exercising any such right? Why this, if the treaty of 1818 was intended to relate to other rights than those of trading, fishing, and hunting? If neither party could, in the opinion of England, exercise acts of sovereignty or dominion there, without violating the stipulation in the treaty of 1818, why wish to interpose a new provision to that effect?—and why did we reject it as we did, except under the conviction that of right we could, at any time, extinguish Indian titles, colonize the country, establish forts, erect territorial governments, and grant lands, notwithstanding any provision in the treaty; taking care, however, while the treaty existed, to allow all the freedom to trade, fish, and hunt, which it contemplated? All we should have looked to then, and all we ought to look to now, in acting on this subject—being convinced of our right to act—would be the expediency and duty of settling the country, under the exigencies and demands of the whole case.

As a mere matter of right, then, under the treaty of 1818, the Oregon could have been occupied and governed by us the next day after that treaty was ratified, as well as a year and a day after we give notice, under the convention of 1827, to terminate the existing arrangements.

Another circumstance, which has misled some as to the design and effect of that treaty, is the impression that it provided, in terms, for a joint occupation or possession of the country; or that, at least, such was its necessary operation. But we have already cited the arrangement, and seen that no such words as joint occupation, or joint possession, appear in either of the treaties; nor do they appear in any similar treaties which preceded or followed this with other nations. We have already attempted to show, likewise, that the necessary and natural operation of all these arrangements was commercial, rather than territorial. We now go further, and maintain that a joint occupation or possession of a territory by two Governments, for purposes of title to the soil, or government, or sovereignty, is full of absurdities and peril. Must there be joint laws?—joint judges?—joint grants?—joint legislatures?—a joint executive? But, on the contrary, if the treaty is construed to admit both parties to freedom of trade, that is natural, common, and practicable; and where nations mean to go further, and control possession, title, and sovereignty, they use different and clear words of that import. The misfortune has arisen from employing terms in speaking, not used in the treaties themselves, and not applicable to the transaction, and calculated to mislead as to the true extent of the arrangement. The analogy of two parties having some concurrent rights in the fisheries of the grand banks, comes nearer to that of free trade. But even that is not joint occupation or joint possession; and that has been found so difficult and dangerous in practice as to lead, in the end, usually to practical divisions. (28 Par. Debates, page 943.) Nor is a joint occupation or possession necessary to the enjoyment of free trade in any country. Unless a country is savage, or semi-barbarous, ambassadors and consuls, and especially the latter, are sufficient to protect it from within, without any territorial rights. But when a ruder state of society prevails, this, factories and forts answer as substitutes. But even those have nothing to do with the title to the soil, or the governing of the country. They are mere commercial securities.

While this treaty and its object were fresh in the councils of the country, this view of it must have prevailed with the Executive, or something tantamount; else President Monroe could never have recommended, as early as 1824, the actual erection of forts, and occupation of the territory. The idea that such a step violated the treaty of 1818 seems never to have been entertained by him—though the erection of a military fort by a Government is a much stronger act of sovereignty over a country, than promising land; on which last provision in this bill so much stress is now laid. But the bill which passed the House of Representatives in 1838, by a vote of two to one, provided also to extinguish 900 square miles of Indian title; and neither in that House, nor in the Senate, where the bill was laid on the table by a majority of only two, does any member appear to have dwelt on that as a violation of the treaty.

The next year, Mr. Adams officially renewed the recommendation of his predecessor; and the able reports of Mr. Baylies, which followed, are directed entirely to the great importance of the territory, and our clear title to the soil and government of it, rather than to any apprehended objection by England under the treaty of 1818. These may all be deemed cotemporaneous constructions, fortifying the views entertained by myself, or at least favorable to the right to pass a bill like this, without impugning any treaty stipulation. I have all these messages, reports, and speeches before me, though it is not deemed necessary now to detain the Senate by reading quotations from them. But reasons of expediency operated then against the measure, in the view of one branch of Congress, though the conclusions of the other branch and of the Executive were different. Some such reasons undoubtedly still exist against it; but I think, on examination, that most of the old reasons in this respect have lost much of their force, and that the balance will be found clearly in support of passing a bill like this at the present moment.

The question, then, and the only remaining question which I shall discuss, is the expediency of exercising the rights we clearly possess, in the manner now proposed.

The paramount reason for extending the operation of our laws into that territory, is, in my view, the protection of our own citizens within its limits. They consist of settlers, traders, hunters, mariners, and travellers. So far as regards us, they are now lawless and defenceless. Hundreds of them have with impunity been pillaged and murdered there within the last twenty years. But they are American citizens no less than we—they are on American soil no less than we—they are pursuing legal employments no less than we. It seems to me, then, a burning disgrace to our institutions and character to leave them longer in this condition; and it would be far more creditable to renounce the country forever, than allow it to remain in this disreputable position, and still be a portion of the American Union.

The reasons for forts there are of a like character—protection and security. At the mouth of the Columbia, they are needed also for refuge to our whalemen and navy, when crippled by accident on the Western and Northwestern seas. The interests of the fisheries and commerce are great in those regions, which might thus be aided; but I shall not now fatigue the Senate by particulars as to their amount.

The reasons for promises of land to settlers are alike cogent. For many are not likely to expose themselves and families at such an immense distance, and among barbarians, without peculiar inducements; and without more settlers obtained there by such inducements, supplies cannot be furnished to the forts, nor to the vessels of the navy and our whalemen, without great additional expense. Plant forts and settlers there, and throw the shield of your laws not only over them, but over the commerce there; and an increase of our trade within the territory will likewise commence at once.

Some of the islands of the Pacific are becoming civilized, and the authorities of one are this very winter knocking at our doors for a recognition of their independence. The coasts of China, too, are now opening to European, and I trust, American enterprise; and both of these circumstances, from the greater contiguity of the Northwest coast to them, will give new impulses to business in that region. This is no sectional question. Our merchants are all directly or indirectly interested in this; our shipbuilders are interested; our fishermen—our enterprising and emigrating farmers are all interested, as well as our hunters and furdealers.

Beside this, the character of the whole nation is implicated, if we do not protect the whites, and adopt this or some other course to introduce civilization among the Indians in that territory. We ought to improve the lot of those who are thus placed under our national guardianship. If we claim the country, we must take it with its aboriginal inhabitants. We cannot neglect them, and be justified to the moral judgment of the rest of mankind. We must try to teach them arts and letters. We must protect them, as well as our own people, from aggressions and outrages; such parts of their title as have not been fairly extinguished by individuals, we should amicably purchase from time to time, as we need it, and as they are willing to part with it. Our right, then, to the country being clear—our right to pass a bill like this being clear, without any breach of treaties—our interest to do it being clear—and our duty equally clear, as well as imperative—why halt? Why hesitate? An omission to act now, will throw distrust over the sincerity of our whole claim. The world, as well as England, may well infer that if, under all these circumstances, we longer delay to exercise our rights, to protect our interests, and fulfil our duties, it must arise from some misgiving as to the validity of those rights.

If we have not already slept over our claims quite a quarter of a century, it is certain we have not enforced them. A measure like this failed as long ago as 1825, by only two votes in the Senate, though passing the other House by two to one. It failed at that time, apparently, not from doubts as to the title, but from motives of expediency. It is certain that all the leading objections on that score then, have since lessened or disappeared. The outrages committed there, and demanding the prompt application of our laws, have occurred since, in far greater numbers. The encroachments and assumptions by English subjects there, have since multiplied tenfold. The importance of our fisheries and commerce in the Pacific to be aided there, has much enlarged since, beside the new prospects developing in China. The population in the West has since approached nearer, so as to aid more readily in defence. Our ability to send out emigrants has nearly doubled; and last, though not least, the distance (which was by many considered so great as to prevent a representation here, and to lead to a loss of all the capital and people sent there) has almost vanished under the improvements since, in steam. The 4,700 miles from the mouth of the Columbia to Washington, which it was then urged was the distance, and would require all the time of a Representative in Congress to travel over, leaving none for legislation, could ere long probably be passed in one or two months, or in as short a period as the delegates from Louisiana and Mississippi once travelled to and from the seat of Government.

But other and still more formidable difficulties start up. Our occupation of the country, it is said, may endanger peace with England. I reply—not so, either necessarily or probably. I have already shown, that rightfully it cannot; and if not rightfully, is it just or charitable to suppose her more willing than ourselves to bring on a war wrongfully? Does not she need and wish the moral sanction of the world in her movements, as much as we? But it may be said, that though she will make no complaint under the treaty, she may still fall back on her reserved and prior claims, like us, and resist our settlements and jurisdiction. So she may—so she always may to the end of time; and this argument will be as good against our legislation half a century hence, as now; and in this way we never shall be able to take any steps to enforce our rights.

If we give notice to abandon the treaty, our position in regard to this argument will be no stronger. For then, as now, the prior reserved rights will start up, like the sown dragon's teeth, into armed men. If this is to be her course, delay, instead of proving useful, will increase the importance of the country and of the controversy. It was so with the contested boundary in the Northeast; and if a question is to be made as to the title, the sooner the better. But, in my view, it will not be her course to resort to violence; for, as before shown, she has admitted our right to be in possession of the country while negotiating. Let us, then, take possession. If that be complained of, negotiation follows. If unable thus to agree, let a third power arbitrate between us. If she refuse that, then we are in possession, and can defend it, and defend our rights against all encroachments, with such means as God and nature have endowed us with. Then, and not now, will be the time for larger expenses and more magnificent plans. Then, and not now, I will consider of the 50,000 rifles to be sent there by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. TAPPAN.] Then, but not now, I will talk with my friend from Arkansas [Mr. SEVIER] about his railroad to the mouth of the Columbia. Then, but not now, I will calculate with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] about the expense of supplying large armies and fleets in that region by either power.

But now, England has no right to complain of our possession, leaving her commerce free; nor any interest in declining negotiation or arbitration, if unable to agree amicably. What occasion, what sufficient inducement can she have to plunge into a hasty and bloody war with us, her best customer, for that naked and remote territory? As a hunting-ground and trading-post for her Hudson Bay Company, which has been almost its only use to her heretofore, its importance becomes less yearly. As an outlet to her sparse population, it is not wanted, in addition to her millions of acres beside in both hemispheres and in all the zones—in the Canadas, India, New Holland, New Zealand, and the West Indies. As a market for her manufactures, it is trifling, and will continue to be so till occupied by a white population.

If she expends capital there, it will be without remuneration in the end likewise; as, in time, the whole inevitably falls, (as the Senator before me remarked,) like a ripe peach, into our hands.

We are its neighbors, and our institutions are more attractive, and the laws of colonization and empire and conquest are fixed as those of the solar system; and she, no more than any other nation, can claim an exemption from their destiny.

But, though in favor of the present bill—on the ground of right, interest, and duty—yet, as before remarked, I should not deem it either our interest or duty to enlarge the measure now, as some suggest, and to incur any expenses not immediately demanded by the necessities of the case.

In the present condition of the treasury—with a deficit of six to eight millions staring us in the face, on the Secretary's own report for the next year and a half, if he redeems the temporary debt, as has been pledged and promised; and with the prospect of a revenue still more diminished than he estimates, by two or three millions,—I surely would not run into any expenses not required by national duty and honor. But those thus required I would vote, at all hazards, and in all cases. Nor is it necessary that even the expense contemplated by this bill should be incurred, till a survey is made for the site of forts, and, if the Executive or Congress pleases, a notice given to end the treaty, and the stipulated time of a year finished, before actually erecting them. All apprehensions of any pretence being made by England of a departure from the treaty, by adopting the measure in the bill, could thus be removed, and yet the bill pass. But I do not feel so much inclined to travel out of the way to conciliate that haughty power by any over-caution, as some may. Nor do I justify my vote, however easy it might be, by any of her previous laws or encroachments in respect to this territory. On the contrary, I shall vote for it under a sense of duty towards our own territory, our own citizens, and our great national interests, without any reference to foreign misbehavior or foreign menaces. I would not wish for hostilities, nor commit a wrong; but, in the path of doing right—armed strong in honesty—I would move onward, from my own impulses, my own feeling; and neither halt nor turn aside, from dread of wrong and violence by others.

By such a course, under all the circumstances before mentioned, there is much less real danger of national collision and war, than by keeping up such a state of things as exists at present—two warlike nations, with numerous tribes of savages grouped together in one and the same country; two if not three sets of claims to territory and sovereignty; jealous, and vindictive, and rival subjects together in pursuit of the same game and trade; no territorial laws or magistrates; no boundaries; weekly plunder and murder. This is the worst possible condition, to last longer; and is unworthy the civilization, prudence, and intelligence of either nation.

Though our own people, in many quarters, are impatient to make a more secure lodgment within the territory, I do not entertain such fears from this, or the interests of many of the old and new States, as many do. Instead of the old States being depopulated by it—or the new, as some seem to fear—the distance, dangers, and privations will make the progress of emigration slow, and rather relieve both the old and new States from some of the most restless of their population, than strip them either of much capital or industry. Many of our fathers came, originally, to the Atlantic coast, to better their condition; and our sons, going to the Pacific from the same motive, will no more injure us than they injured their former homes. The emigration of the former here has not weakened England, or France, or Germany; nor will that of the latter weaken us. Indeed, they will still remain on American soil; and the stars and stripes of our flag will still wave over them, it is hoped, to the end of time.

Nor do I dread any danger to the Union, or the relative power of the East and West, or of the South and North, by this measure. I have no gorgeous and sudden hopes on this subject. The progress of settlements will not be rapid. The land bounty will, of course, be withdrawn the moment there is population enough there for safety and supplies. In the last century, our people have, to be sure, spread from Albany to St. Louis; and thence nearly to the western borders of Missouri and Iowa. But even now our permanent settlers are six or seven hundred miles from the crest of the Rocky Mountains, and thousands of miles from the mouth of the Columbia. We are not Tartars enough to wander much faster or further than the axe and the plough can clear the way. And if, a half century or a century hence, it becomes a question—which I hope never will be the case—whether the Union shall not protect all between the Atlantic and the Pacific, and where the division line shall be drawn, I am not now to be deterred from a support of this bill by any fear that it may hasten that remote catastrophe, or throw the line west to the Rocky Mountains, or the Mississippi, or the Alleganies; rather than south, to the Potomac, or elsewhere, between the South and the North. I go into no such speculations; nor am I fearful as to events so remote, and, it is believed, so improbable. On the other hand, if really probable in the natural course of civilization, it is vain for us to attempt to shun or delay them by such an impotent measure as neglecting longer to legislate suitably for our own territory, and the protection of our own subjects.

SPEECH OF MR. M. BROWN, OF TENNESSEE.

In the House of Representatives, January 3, 1843—On the bill to repeal the bankrupt law.

Mr. MILTON BROWN addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: It is neither my purpose nor desire to enter the wide field of general politics unexpectedly opened by this debate, but to confine myself strictly to the pending question of repeal. No law has ever been more misrepresented or misunderstood than the bankrupt law passed at the extra session. Provisions not contained in the law have been ascribed to it; while those it does contain have been so perverted and misrepresented as to make a false and delusive impression on the public mind. In its enactments, in its general provisions, and in its details, in its spirit and meaning, in its tendencies, and in its practical influences upon the morals and general welfare of society, it has everywhere been misrepresented, and almost everywhere misunderstood. Its plain provisions, calculated and designed to protect the rights and advance the best interests of both debtor and creditor, saving the former from oppression and the latter from fraud, have been represented as adverse to all the best interests of the community. A thousand popular prejudices have been most unjustly waked up, having no just foundation in the provisions of the law itself, but springing from a desire of politicians to operate on pending popular elections. This is to be regretted—deeply regretted—as calculated to mislead the popular mind, and prevent a fair and calm decision of the people.

Before the late presidential election, both political parties professed themselves in favor of a bankrupt law, and stood committed before the country for its passage. The proof of this is clear and positive, and is to be found in the recorded votes, the debates, and general history of the times. General Harrison and Mr. Van Buren, the candidates of the respective parties for the Presidency, while in the Senate of the United States, had declared, by their votes and speeches, that they were in favor of the passage of a bankrupt law, with only this difference: Mr. Van Buren thought it should embrace merchants and traders only; while General Harrison contended that it ought equally and without distinction, to extend its benefits to all classes of society. Which of these plans is preferable, is not my purpose now to examine; certainly, however, it may be safely assumed that the plan advocated by General Harrison was then, and is now, most conformable to popular sentiment. It is my sole purpose, at present, to show that both General Harrison and Mr. Van Buren were the open and avowed advocates of a bankrupt law. Mr. Van Buren was a member of the committee that reported the bill of 1826; and, in his remarks in the Senate on that bill, avowed himself strongly in favor of a bankrupt law, and declared he was in its favor, (to use his own language,) "not only because he was satisfied that a great proportion of his immediate constituents desired it, but because he believed their claim upon Congress, for the exercise of its constitutional powers in this respect, could be sustained on the ground of policy as well as justice." Mr. Van Buren, on the first vote taken, voted against the bill—not on account of the general principle, but on account of a feature contained in it which he objected to; but, on the other friends of the bill agreeing to remove this objection, he voted for the reconsideration, and he and General Harrison, side by side, voted for the bill on the question of engrossment for its final passage.

Mr. Tyler and Col. R. M. Johnson, the candidates for the Vice Presidency, were also in favor of a bankrupt law, and have since reiterated their opinions—the former in a message to Congress, the latter in a published letter. With these candidates for the Presidency and Vice Presidency, all avowedly and openly in favor of the passage of a bankrupt law, did the respective political parties enter the contest which resulted in the Whig victory of 1840. If the question was not fully discussed before the people, it was because, both parties being in favor of the measure, it was not made a matter of controversy. Politicians, then, of all parties, saw wisdom, beauty, good policy, and humanity, in a bankrupt law. It was inscribed on every banner; and the unfortunate, and the friends of the unfortunate, (who were, and I hope now are, far more numerous than the unfortunate themselves,) were told that, no difference where victory might perch, the passage of this measure, at least, was safe.

But the proof that both parties in that contest were for a bankrupt law, and stood pledged for its passage, does not stop here. There is still behind clearer and more unanswerable evidence, not only that both parties were the avowed advocates of the measure, but showing, also, what were the principles and proposed provisions of that measure. For this I refer to the Congressional Globe and Appendix of 1840. Two bills, each providing for a uniform system of bankruptcy, were reported to the Senate, emanating from the two political parties. Mr. Benton, speaking of these two bills, (see Appendix to Congressional Globe, page 502,) said:

"Three members of the Judiciary Committee have reported one bill; two members have reported another; and these two bills emanate from the two political parties which, under whatsoever names, have existed in this country for fifty years."

These two bills were reported, one by Mr. Clayton, (Whig,) the other by Mr. Wall, a leader of the Van Buren party. After giving his objections to Mr. Clayton's bill—objecting to it on the ground that it was, as he alleged, partial and unequal, not extending its benefits alike to all, and limited to two years' duration—Mr. Benton then turned to Mr. Wall's bill, and said:

"The other (that is, Mr. Wall's bill) is a general bill, looking to the rights of creditors as well as to the relief of debtors—intended for the future as well as for the present and past—applicable to corporations as well as to persons—embracing the compulsory as well as the voluntary feature—and making provision for those who are not, as well as those who are, technically merchants and traders."

Another prominent objection urged by Mr. Benton against Mr. Clayton's Whig bill, and reason why he preferred Mr. Wall's Democratic bill, may be seen by the following extract of his speech:

"There is to be (said Mr. Benton, referring to his objections to Mr. Clayton's bill) a line of division between the debtors—a horizontal line; those above the line are to have relief—those below it are denied it. This results from the amount which the debtor must owe in order to entitle himself to the benefits of its provisions. The bill provides for an amount, and leaves the sum in blank. Will the reporter of the bill, said Mr. B., (addressing himself to Mr. Clayton of Delaware,) name the amount which it is proposed to insert?

"Mr. Clayton said he had not been instructed to move a particular sum, but five hundred dollars had been mentioned in the committee.

"Mr. B. continued. Five hundred dollars. That was the sum mentioned in the committee, and no other sum is mentioned here. Five hundred dollars must be considered, then, as the amount necessary to be owed, to entitle a person to the relief of this act. Now, this is arbitrary and unequal; it cuts off the small dealers, the persons of little property, the laborers; it cuts them off from the benefit of the act, and operates as an encouragement to people to go largely in debt, as the large debtors are to be relieved, and the small ones not. It makes the act exclusively for large dealers; and this, contrary to the principle of equality which is professed in the bill, and without any foundation in reason and justice. The weight of debt is relative, not absolute. It depends on the amount of the debtor's property, and not upon the amount of the debt. To one man, a debt of one hundred dollars is as much as a hundred thousand or a million is to another. To one man five hundred dollars is as much as five hundred thousand is to another; and, beyond question, the most numerous class of debtors in the United States are those who owe less than the minimum proposed in this bill. But these small debtors, numerous as they are, are disregarded and overlooked by the bill. They are to work out their debts in sorrow and in misery, carrying their endless load to the grave; while the dashers, the large debtors, clear out theirs by a declaration and surrender."

Again: Mr. Benton said, speaking with reference to the coming presidential election:

"I do not think the present session the propitious one for beneficial action on this subject. Five hundred thousand voters, demanding the passage of a law on the eve of an election, must have an influence on the hopes and fears of the lawgiver, as well as on his judgment and conscience. Since they have waited so long, I should have preferred a delay of a few months more. Still, the subject is before us, and we are here; and I am willing to act, and to do what I believe to be my duty. I am ready to assist in framing an act which shall be general in its provisions, and just in its application; which shall do justice to the creditor as well as the debtor; which shall apply to trading and money-dealing corporations as well as to trading and money-dealing individuals; which shall be compulsory with regard to traders and dealers, whether natural or artificial; which shall be optional with respect to other classes of the community, and which shall distinguish between misfortune and misconduct."

Again, in another place, he adds: "The bill of the minority (Mr. Wall's bill) furnishes the true basis for the enactment of a bankrupt system."

Now, Mr. Speaker, here is the direct testimony of Mr. Benton on two points: First, that Mr. Wall's bill originated with, and emanated from, the Van Buren party, to which he and Mr. Wall belonged; and, second, that it furnished the true basis for the enactment of a bankrupt system. He says: "These two bills emanate from the two political parties, which, under whatsoever names, have existed in this country for fifty years." He also says that Mr. Wall's bill, emanating from, and put forth to the country by the Van Buren party, furnished "the true basis for the enactment of a bankrupt system."

Now, sir, it is material, in tracing the standing of parties on this question, to know what were the Democratic features of this Democratic bill reported by Mr. Wall, and held forth to the anxious hopes of a suffering country by the Van Buren party, during the pendency of the presidential election. What were its features? Did it embrace the past as well as the future? Did it discharge contracts made before the passage of the law? Did it, in a word, contain any or all the provisions that have been urged as objections to the law of the extra session? The original bill is now before me. Its provisions may be seen, and I invite investigation. It was reported in April preceding the presidential election, by Mr. Wall, as the organ of the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary, and is Senate bill No. 324. What does Mr. Wall himself say of this bill, which, according to the then opinions of that party, was the true basis for the enactment of a bankrupt law? Mr. Wall says: (Appendix Globe, 462:)

"It is intended to act both retrospectively and prospectively. It looks upon the past, not to condemn, but to relieve. The whole land is strewed with the wrecks of bankruptcy, and we cannot look in any direction without perceiving the jetsam et flotsam of trade cast upon the shores. All must admit the fact, however much they may disagree as to the causes, that the state of things has resulted from the contractions and expansions of the currency; and that the fluctuations growing out of it have impaired all business depending on prices, the hazards and vicissitudes incident to commerce and trade. The best energies of the country have been paralyzed; the brightest visions of gain have disappeared; and the wisest and most prudent schemes, uniting public improvement with individual interest, have perished, as if by magic, in the universal revulsion that has desolated the country. This bill proposes to cast the mantle of oblivion over the past conduct of the debtor, over his acts which may have been compelled, or the preferences which may have been extorted, in his vain struggles to prolong his existence in the marts of trade. All that it demands from the debtor who seeks its benefits, is, that he should honestly surrender what is left, however small, for the general benefit of his creditors."

Now, Mr. Speaker, with the lights thrown upon this subject by Mr. Benton and Mr. Wall, and with the bill itself before us, let us compare its features with the one passed at the extra session, against which so much prejudice has been excited; and, to effect this the more clearly, let us trace the leading objections raised to the bill passed at the extra session, and which have been seized upon to render it unpopular.

The first and chief objection to that law has been its retrospective operation—that is, its operation on contracts entered into prior to the passage of the law. Did Mr. Wall's bill contain this feature? Mr. Benton and Mr. Wall settle this in the affirmative. Mr. Benton says "it was intended for the future, as well as the present and past." Mr. Wall says "it was intended to act both retrospectively and prospectively;" that it looked to "the past, not to condemn, but to relieve;" that it proposed "to cast the mantle of oblivion over the past conduct of the debtor;" and that all it demanded from the debtor was, "that he should honestly surrender what is left, however small, for the general benefit of his creditors."

It is certain, therefore, that this plan of a bankrupt law, emanating from the Van Buren party, and promised to a suffering country, in the event of the continuance of that party in power, did embrace past transactions; it was designed to wipe out debts contracted before the passage of the law.

It is true that Mr. Benton was a little afraid that so many voters, who were unfortunately ruined, and now demanding relief, might, on the eve of an election, have an undue influence on the "hopes and fears," as well as the "judgment and conscience" of the lawgiver; and he preferred, that as they had waited so long, and suffered so long, they would wait on, and suffer on, until after they had given their votes at the then approaching presidential election. But after they had given their votes, and the election was over, and the danger of the "judgment and conscience" of the lawgiver being improperly influenced by the "hopes and fears" growing out of that election had passed, then these unfortunate men were to have relief. Yes, relief! And that, too, at the hands of the Van Buren party. Not relief from debts that might be contracted after the passage of the law; not from future debts—for in this, these unfortunate men had no more concern than others; but from present and past contracts—from debts contracted before the passage of the law. And this promise to the unfortunate was not allowed to hang on general and vague declarations; but the bill itself, Democratic in all its features, and emanating from the hands of the Van Buren party, was held up to the hope of those whose fortunes had been wasted by the sad reverses of the times, and who had nothing left but their good names, and their votes and influence at the ballot-box. Mr. Benton even then declared his readiness to act, and to act promptly; and others declared the same; but it so happened that nothing was done. The subject was left open, both parties professing to be for the measure, and standing pledged for its passage. Did we then hear of the demoralizing consequences of a bankrupt law? Did we then hear anything of this effort now making all over the country to degrade and dishonor those who ask relief? Nothing of all this was heard. It was then regarded by all as right, virtuous, and honorable, for the unfortunate to ask relief; and a constitutional, virtuous, and patriotic duty in Congress to grant it. Seeing this, Mr. Webster rose and congratulated the Senate and the country that this subject "did not connect itself with any of the party contests of the day;" and spoke of it "as a green spot in the midst of the fiery deserts of party strife."

This, sir, is the manner in which this subject was treated by all parties before the presidential election.

And here let me pause, and ask a question obviously suggested by these facts. I invite a response from the candid and honest of all parties. Seeing that both parties, during the presidential canvass, had promised relief to the unfortunate, and given assurances of the passage of a bankrupt law; seeing that all the candidates for the Presidency and Vice Presidency had inscribed this promise on their banners, and none objected to it; seeing that two plans, emanating from the two political parties, both retrospective in their operation, had been held out as rivals for popular favor,—was not the extra session of Congress bound to conclude that these facts had given undoubted evidence of public opinion on the subject? Add to this, that a flood of petitions rolled in from every quarter of the Union, signed by men of all parties—by those who were insolvent and by those who were rich—and presented here on this floor by members of all parties, with scarcely a petition or other evidence of popular opinion on the other side—was it not reasonable to arrive at the conclusion, that the public judgment was in favor of a bankrupt law? Sir, this was the impression made on my mind; and I doubt not was made on a majority of the House at the time. Sir, it cannot be concealed that the reason why many, very many, of the opposition on this floor voted against the law, was not because of their convictions against it; but because of a determination, founded in party policy, to throw the responsibility of all measures on the Whigs. But to return.

Another objection to the law of the extra session is, that it embraces not only the compulsory, but the voluntary feature also. Mr. Wall's bill did the same; for which we also have the direct testimony of Mr. Benton. He says it embraced "the compulsory as well as the voluntary feature."

Another objection to the law of the extra session is, that it includes those who are not, as well as those who are, merchants and traders. Mr. Wall's bill did the same. It included all classes—none were left out of its provisions. Mr. Benton said it made provisions "for those who are not, as well as those who are, technically merchants and traders."

Another objection to the bill of the extra session is, that it extends down to sums too small. Mr. Wall's bill extended to all sums, and Mr. Benton lauded this as a most Democratic feature; it was, indeed and emphatically, the poor man's bankrupt law—not for your large debtors and "dashers" merely, but for small debtors also. Yes, sir; and I venture to say, that if the law of the extra session had failed to include small debtors, and had been confined to large ones, it would have been pronounced a most odious discrimination, designed to favor large and reckless speculators.

Another objection to the law of the extra session is, that it discharges the debtor without the consent of the creditor. Mr. Wall's bill did the same. The debtor's discharge depended not on the consent of a part or of all his creditors, but on the decision of a court and jury.

Again: it has been objected that the provision under this law of the extra session, allowing the bankrupt an amount, at the discretion of the court, not in any case to exceed $300, was too liberal. Mr. Wall's bill went much beyond this. It allowed the bankrupt his clothes, &c., his tools of trade, household and kitchen furniture, two cows, &c., and also all that was allowed by the insolvent laws of the respective States. Not only this; but he was to be allowed one dollar a day for attendance before the court, and also not exceeding three dollars per week for each member of his family, for their support for a time not exceeding two months. And if, on final discharge of an appeal, the bankrupt's estate paid fifty cents in the dollar, he was to be allowed five per cent. of his estate, provided the per cent. did not amount to over $500. Mr. Wall's bill was, therefore, far the most liberal in its allowance. If the bill of the extra session in this respect was wrong, Mr. Wall's bill was still worse.

Another objection urged to the law of the extra session is, that it discharges the obligation existing between security and principal. Mr. Wall's bill did the same. Besides, this law is far better guarded against fraud, than that proposed by Mr. Wall and his political friends. This law excepts out of its benefits defaulters to the Government—that did not. This law excepts out of its benefits delinquent executors, administrators, guardians, trustees, &c.—that did not.

I might trace the parallel between these two bills further; but it is useless. My purpose has been to show—what is the fact—that every feature in the law of the extra session which has been deemed exceptionable, and has been seized upon and perverted for the purpose of making it unpopular, for political effect, is to be found in the bill reported by Mr. Wall, and held forth by the Van Buren party, before the late presidential election, as the bow of promise to a country deluged by revolutions and disasters. I might do more. I could, by pursuing the parallel between these bills, show that, while that of the extra session contains no feature deemed objectionable which is not to be found in that of Mr. Wall, it is far better guarded against frauds. But this I leave for those who may be curious to pursue the subject; repeating, however, that I invite investigation.

The chief, if not the only, distinction in principle, between these bills, is, that Mr. Wall's included banks and other corporations; and that of the extra session does not. But all will agree, that the law of the extra session, if unpopular, does not owe its unpopularity to this. Besides, it will be seen that the provision in Mr. Wall's bill on this subject would have been entirely inoperative. It provided that any State might release its banks and other corporations from the operations of the law. This rendered its provisions unequal and not uniform, and therefore unconstitutional. It made it inoperative and useless, because the States would generally, if not always, grant the exemption, and render the law of Congress powerless.

Having tried to explain, with as much clearness and fairness as I could, the standing of all parties on this question, and shown that all, in some form or other, have declared in favor of a uniform system of bankruptcy, I come to the direct question—ought this law now to be repealed?

The power to pass the law is engrafted into the Constitution, and comes to us by the sanction of the wisdom of our fathers. This power was conferred on the Federal Government by a vote of all the States but one. The opinions of Washington, of Madison, of Marshall, and a host of others, constituting a large majority of our greatest and best men, living and dead, stand recorded in favor of the wisdom and policy of a bankrupt law. We have the example, in some form or other, of every commercial nation on earth. Should we not then pause before we hastily, and under an excitement raised by misrepresentations and misunderstandings of its spirit and object, erase this law from the statute-book, leaving behind it prejudices deep and lasting against all laws on the subject, that will, perhaps, in all future time, cause this wise provision of the Constitution to remain a dead letter? If the law is defective, ought we not to amend, rather than destroy it?

The leading, if not the only popular, objections to this law, have been drawn from its retrospective action—its operation on past contracts. Nearly all have declared in favor of a law to operate on future contracts. This bill for repeal, in the form it is likely to pass, retains the retrospective, and only repeals the prospective feature—that is, it retains the part supposed to be unpopular, and repeals that which is a favorite with all!

The first operation of the law is its retrospective feature, which is favorable to debtors: its second operation is its prospective feature, which is favorable to creditors. Why allow it to operate in part, and then repeal it? The law was designed as a system looking to the future, as well as the present and the past—looking to the rights of creditors, as well as debtors. Why allow it to operate in favor of one class, and then, by repeal, prevent its operation in favor of the other? This law, by this repeal bill, is in danger of mutilation—in danger of being rendered useless, if not injurious, by cutting asunder parts essential to the value and vitality of each other.

It is not designed to repeal the bankrupt law as a whole, but to repeal one-half of it only; and the part proposed to be repealed is that which is objected to by no one. This is a strange state of the question. An excitement has been gotten up, and, for political effect, this law has been misrepresented, and distorted, and denounced, all over the country, as partial in its operation, and discharging debtors without any corresponding benefit to creditors. Creditors, looking only at the first operations of the law, have been induced erroneously to suppose it injurious to their interests; and now, before that part which is unquestionably beneficial to them can be brought fairly into exercise, and fully understood by the country, it is to be repealed, and the law is to be prevented from vindicating its own wisdom by time and experience.

Sir, in these times, so sadly out of joint, when a temporary triumph in a popular election is more looked to than the permanent good of the country, and when patriotism in the breasts of many is extinguished by motives of party and personal elevation, it is not remarkable that this law should have been misrepresented. Though blessed with but little foresight, I foresaw and foretold this in the remarks I made on the bill before its passage at the extra session. I hope I shall be pardoned for reading from my printed speech what I then said. After giving my general views on the subject, I said:

"I know that it takes time to develop the operation of any system. The people have to learn and become accustomed to it, in order properly to appreciate its value. I know this system will go out like a stranger, who must not expect to gain full confidence before he has formed his acquaintance in the community. I know, sir, that a thousand prejudices will be raised against it. But if the people will sustain it until it has passed its day of trial, as I believe they will, the consequences will be happy and glorious. The silent but potent influence of this system in regulating society, and in improving the morals of the country, may not at once be seen; but in the end it will be developed, and its powerful influence will be universally acknowledged.

"Every important change in our social condition must meet with opposition. It breaks in on previously-formed opinions and long-established habits of thinking, and must therefore be for a while viewed with distrust, and regarded by some as a troublesome intruder. It is this that gives me the only uneasiness I feel about this measure, in the event of its passage."

Sir, after listening, with the most anxious desire for the truth, to all that has been said against this law, I have an unchanged opinion, that, if sustained by the people, and allowed to remain unrepealed, until it shall have been tested by time and experience, it will do much permanent good.

This law, in its prospective operation, is calculated to prevent fraud, by cutting off fraudulent conveyances and dishonest preferences. It aims a deadly blow at all conveyances designed to defraud creditors. It subjects the debtor who makes them to its compulsory process, and gives to the honest creditor a most efficient and effective remedy against fraud and concealment.

Again: it not only furnishes the most powerful weapons against dishonesty, but it holds out the strongest inducements for honesty. In this it will improve the morals of the country, and save many a cheek from the blush of guilt. The man who has been in affluence, but finds himself scathed by a stroke of misfortune, too often finds an excuse to his own conscience for concealing, in the hands of his friends, something to give bread to those who are helpless and dependent on him. This is wrong; but many will do it as long as the law allows no final relief or discharge. If the creditor gives up all, still he is in bondage. The little he may earn by the sweat of his brow, to supply the wants of those dependent on him, is subject to be taken. In this condition, he yields to the temptation, and conceals his property. This, I repeat, is wrong. But, I ask, is not the law wrong that leads him into this temptation? Is it not better to say to him, Give up honestly and fully all you have, and you shall go free? Will he not give up all? Will he not be saved from temptation? And will not his integrity be preserved? And, I will add, will not creditors, under the operation of this motive, acting on debtors, get more than they otherwise would?

This law provides for equality in the distribution of the debtor's property, and forbids unfair and unjust preferences given to favorite and confidential creditors. This cuts up by the roots the largest and most fruitful source of fraud and injustice. Go into your courts of chancery and of law, and inquire what opens the most extensive harvest in the field of litigation; and you will find that it is the permission which the law has heretofore given to debtors to divide out their property among a portion of their creditors, to the total exclusion of all others. A man, for example, doing an extensive business, finds himself in sinking circumstances, and immediately determines to save his friends—and that, perhaps, with the secret understanding that they shall save him from the danger of wanting sufficient means to play the gentleman upon. An assignment, a mortgage, or a deed of trust, is executed, by which all his property is at once transferred to those confidential creditors and friends, appointing some one in the confidence and under the control of the debtor as trustee. And it is very common for the trustee and creditors to commence operations by appointing the debtor himself their agent to conduct the business and wind up its concerns. Other creditors, seeing this, and feeling the injustice done them, go to law for what they conceive to be their rights; but, in the end, they are generally turned out of court, having learned, to their cost, that the law tolerated these mortgages, assignments, and deeds of trust; and that it was within the sovereign pleasure of the debtor to give his property to either of his creditors, though it might be a father, a brother, or a son.

Take another example of frequent occurrence. A man—a merchant, for example—in casting up his accounts, makes the unwelcome discovery that his debts exceed his credits—that he is unable to meet his engagements. He is willing to give up all at once, if that would discharge him; but the State laws do not allow this. Though nine-tenths of his creditors should agree to his discharge, the others may hold him in bondage to the day of his death. Having, therefore, nothing to gain, and much to lose, by bringing his business to a close and making a full surrender to his creditors, he becomes desperate, and resolves to go on and put every thing to the hazard of a bold enterprise, and risk his fortune and future hopes on a single adventure. In the language of a distinguished orator and statesman of South Carolina, "If he should succeed, he is saved; and if he fails, he can only perish; which, as ruin already stares him in the face, will not render his condition much worse than it is." Being driven by the force of circumstances to this determination, the means of executing it are at hand. He has friends; the banks are open to them; loans are obtained by means of endorsements of men in good credit, under a solemn pledge that, come what may, there shall be no departure from the modern code of honor, which makes it the most sacred of duties to secure the friendly endorser, no matter at whose expense, or at what sacrifice of feeling or principle. With a fictitious credit, thus created and thus supported, the debtor engages boldly in a species of commercial gambling. The luck is against him, and his doom is sealed. But though he must perish, he resolves to fall with honor. He goes into the market, and, on the strength of the credit obtained by the countenance of his friends, possesses himself of the goods of others; then fails, and assigns his whole estate, including the goods thus obtained, to these very friends, and leaves all others to their fate."

This picture every one of observation will recognise as true to the life. This power of preferring confidential creditors is the author of a thousand gambling speculations, gotten up by persons in sinking and desperate circumstances, and sustained by fictitious credit. It is the source of the splendid failures which dazzle and astonish the commercial world with the magnificence of the bubbles that have bursted, and which exhibit such a vast disproportion between debtors' property and the amounts of their indebtedness. Not only this; but it opens the widest door for all manner of fraud and imposition on the honest and unsuspecting, who are but little acquainted with the games of deception that can be played off by the dishonest and fraudulent gambler in commercial adventures.

This law, in its prospective operation, is calculated, in a great degree, to check this growing and swelling tide of evil, which is pouring its bitter waters over the land. It provides for equality in the distribution of the debtor's property, forbids unfair preferences, and protects the mass of honest and unsuspecting creditors from the cunning and devices of the few who usually engross all the debtor's property. How often has it been seen that a large estate, by the magic concealment of mortgages, deeds of trust, and secret conveyances, has been swept into the hands of confidential friends, (perhaps the near relations of the bankrupt,) or into the grasp of banks and other moneyed corporations, to save endorsers, while the mass of creditors get nothing? Debts contracted to raise the means of wild speculation are paid; while those contracted for the produce of the "sweat of the brow" of the farmer and mechanic go neglected. Not only this; but it often happens that the cotton, the tobacco, the corn, and the wheat, obtained on a credit from the planter and farmer, go to save endorsers or confidential friends, while those who raised the produce from the soil go unrewarded—and that, too, in many instances, where these very endorsers and confidential friends had given to the bankrupt a fictitious credit, and enabled him to purchase the property of the unsuspecting, under the cover of this deception. Is this not wrong? This law is designed to put an end to this, and place confidence and credit on surer and juster foundations. That the speculator and money-dealer should oppose this, is not so remarkable; but that the mass of the people should, when they rightly understand it, is impossible. They may for a while be deceived—and that, too, by those who, on other occasions, and when no political capital was to be made, have eulogized the law; but they cannot long remain deceived. Truth, crushed for a while, will re-establish itself; and the good sense of the people, when they understand the matter rightly, will discover their own best interests.

It will, in its prospective operation, restrain that system of suretyship which, while it seldom does good, or benefits any one, has been the destruction of thousands. Cut off the flattering promise of mortgages and deeds of trust and other preferences, in the event of the debtor's failure, and you give to the surety or endorser a good reason for keeping his name off his friend's paper; or, if he puts it there, it will be upon the confidence that his friend can meet all his engagements. It will operate as a restraint upon debtors, and hold them within the circle of that legitimate credit which is the soul and life-blood of commerce and trade, by first taking from them the means of building up false credit; and, secondly, by giving to the creditors, through the compulsory process of the law, a timely check on their wild extravagance, fraud, or folly.

Again: this law, in its prospective operation, will restrain excessive credit. Mortgages and deeds of trust are the very pillars on which false credit rests. The only legitimate credit which is safe, and should be encouraged, is that which rests on a confidence in the ability of the debtor to pay all his debts. That is false and delusive which rests on mortgages or deeds of trust, or the promise of them, giving a preference to part, thereby impliedly acknowledging an inability to pay all. The secret promises and expectations of trusts and other preferences in favor of confidential creditors, are most powerful elements in the production of excessive credit, and, combined with other causes, its unhappy fruits may be seen in the desolation that now overspreads the land. This law, much abused as it is, affords the best remedy for this disease, and will do more good than all the nostrums with which the country is flooded. The evils of excessive credit furnish a theme for every politician's tongue; and yet the remedies they offer, both for prevention and cure, generally strike at the branches, and not at the root of the evil. Let the causes of excessive credit, to which I have adverted, be checked and controlled by wise legislation; and then let a curb be placed on the irregularities and fluctuations of the currency; and you will do much to prevent a recurrence of the revulsions and disasters in commerce and trade, which have distinguished the last ten years as a most unfortunate and remarkable epoch in our history.

I might refer to other arguments connected with the prospective operation of this law; but, having spoken on the subject once before, my object now is brevity. I voted for this law on its passage, because I thought it right, and because I believed, from all the lights I had, that my constituents were for it. On a former effort to repeal it, not having heard anything from my constituents to the contrary, I voted against the repeal; and now that it has gone into operation, and had its effect only in part, I feel bound, for still stronger reasons, to vote against its repeal. A repeal in the manner in which it is likely to pass, as I have already said, would only operate on that part of it which I have nowhere heard objected to. If the law is defective, let us amend it. I will go heart and hand with those who desire that. If it does not in all things conform to the opinions of the people, let us change it until it does; but, for Heaven's sake, let us not tear a law from the statute-book, and repudiate principles which we have all, without distinction of party, in some form or other, in times past, warmly advocated.

SPEECH OF MR. BARNARD,

OF NEW YORK.

In the House of Representatives, January 25, 1843—On the Executive plan for a board of exchequer.

The report of the Committee of Ways and Means, with a resolution adverse to the President's plan of an exchequer, being under consideration—

Mr. BARNARD, spoke nearly as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: If I supposed that the action of this House on the subject of the currency was to end with its vote on the resolution now before us, I should not feel desirous of submitting any remarks whatever to the House at the present time. I should be content to record my vote, and refer, as I should do with pride, to the general reasoning of the able report, presented by my friend and colleague, [Mr. FILLMORE,] and which concludes with this resolution, for my justification; though, at the same time, it is proper, perhaps, I should say, while making this reference to the valuable report of the Committee of Ways and Means, that, if the direct question before us were now upon the report instead of the resolution, I should find it necessary to dissent from some of its positions and arguments.

But, sir, I trust we are not to stop when we have disposed of the exchequer plan of the Executive by the adoption of this resolution. It is right and proper that we should do that; but then we should do something more if we can. And I believe we can, and ought, to agree upon a plan of relief for the Government and country. The rejection of the Executive plan by the adoption of this resolution will dispose effectually, not only of the plan in the particular form given to it by the bill submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury, but of the plan in the form into which it has been moulded by the manifestations of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] and in every other form in which the substance of the original conception might be embodied. Such, at least, will be the meaning of the vote hich I shall give; and such, I have no doubt, will be ie meaning of the vote of the House, nearly unanious as it will be. This done, I hope the House ill proceed promptly to consider the subject in Comittee of the Whole on the state of the Union, taking p for that purpose the bill introduced by the gentlean from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] not certain with any idea that the House would even entertain at particular bill, except as affording a convenient ode of coming to the consideration of some one or her of the plans which have already been submitd and proposed as substitutes for it. The plan us submitted by myself a few days ago, I shall feel to be my duty to urge upon the notice of the ouse; and, for this purpose, if the gentleman from lassachusetts does not move to go into committee the subject, I shall, and that at the earliest practable moment.

This Congress has twice presented to the Presi nt a measure of their own, on the subject of finance nd currency; and twice has the President rejected eir measure. The President, in turn, has presentd to us his plan; it received the silent veto of Conress at the last session, and now we propose to give our true constitutional veto. And one advantage, t least, will follow from this proceeding; and that is, at the President and his friends in this House will arn by it, (what they do not seem to have yet reamed of,) that if the President is a "fixed constitunal fact," as the gentleman from Massachusetts as said, Congress is a "fixed constitutional fact" lso. This much being done on the one side and n the other, the decks will then be clear; and we an all look about us, to see how we shall steer and ail the ship for the residue of this present voyage. We know—every intelligent man knows—that nothng can be done between Congress and the President n the general subject before us, upon the basis either f our plan, which is a bank, or of his plan, which is board of exchequer. The sooner, therefore, we et clear of both, for the present Presidential term, he better. We may then proceed to consider some lan different from either, to serve our common obcts for the time being, if one has been, or shall, r can be offered worthy of our consideration; nd adopt or reject it, as it may seem to deserve. It ill be the object and tendency, I hope, of the observations I now propose to submit on the exchequer cheme, to prepare the way for a favorable considerion by the House, of a plan for relieving the treasuy, and at the same time supplying to the country a ational currency, to which I have already referred, nd which has lately been laid on the tables of embers at my instance. The first step is to dis ose effectually of the exchequer; and I proceed to ubmit some observations upon it.

When we had a bank of the United States in exstence and operation, it was found to perform cerin important functions for the Government and he country. It was a capital fiscal agent for the overnment. It was a safe and convenient deposiory for the public moneys; it kept them, transferred hem from point to point as required, and disbursed hem as directed. It was our commissioner of loans, nd our pension agent. And then, in the course f its own appropriate business as a corporation ealing in money for profit, it furnished the country ith a sound and uniform national currency, and ith cheap exchanges; checking, at the same time, by n easy and natural operation, the State banks, nd keeping them in a healthy condition and movement. We (the majority in this Congress) thought hat another bank of the United States, better guarded than the last, and rendered perfectly safe, might ave been established, with all the advantages which he country had experienced from the last. The "fixed constitutional fact" of the President's conscience stood in the way; and we have been obliged to ield. What, then, was to be done? The employment f State banks as fiscal agents, and as the means of upplying national currency and exchanges, in the manner once adopted and tried by General Jackson, ad been discarded and abandoned; and Mr. Tyler had o idea that there was any other mode, or terms, in which they could be advantageously employed. But he was of opinion, after discarding both a bank of the United States and the State banks, that there was still another kind of agency by which all the benefits and services of a bank of the United States could be attained; free, at the same time, from all constitutional and other difficulties and objections. And he undertook to devise such an agency. It was not to be a corporation—least of all a bank; yet it was to be an agency, with some sort of independent existence; it was not, at any rate, to be the Government itself, but a creature of the Government, made to serve the Government and the country just as a corporation or bank would.

Well, sir, the President has offered us what he calls a board of exchequer, with its agencies; and it is just what every man of sagacity knew, beforehand, it must be. It is no independent agency at all, though carefully named and described as if it was. It is simply a plan by which the Executive Government itself undertakes to perform all the functions of a bank of the United States. The Executive Government is to keep, transfer, and disburse the public revenues, to receive the money of individuals on deposite, to supply paper for currency and commercial exchanges, and to regulate the State bank currency.

For, what is this board of exchequer and agencies? Why, an Executive department, or a bureau or branch of an Executive department, composed of, and conducted by, officers of Executive appointment, according to the constitutional mode of appointment. It is to be established "in the Treasury Department." It may be considered a part of that department, or independent of it: this is immaterial. It is either a new Executive department, or it is a branch of a department already existing; and it is, in its relations to the Government, just what the Post Office is, or the General Land Office, or the War or Navy Department. And, considering some of the functions which it is to perform, it certainly offers to our consideration something quite new, not only in this Government, but in any other that I have ever heard of. I have before heard of Governments dealing with individuals, in money and other things, on Government account; but this is the first time, I think, it was ever proposed that a Government should formally enter into the business of dealing with individuals, in money and commercial exchanges, on individual account; only for the convenience and benefit of individuals in the trading and commercial community, and for a profit to the Government! I shall have occasion to advert again, before I conclude, to the question of the competency of this Government to enter upon any such enterprise. In the mean time, I wish the House to understand precisely what this board of exchequer and agencies is, and what it is to do.

The board of exchequer, with its agencies, then, is an executive department of this Government; and it is contrived to act in two very distinct capacities, which it is important to note.

In one capacity, it is an executive treasury with sub-treasuries. This is for the transaction of Government business—of business on Government account.

In the other capacity, it is an executive commercial bank of deposite and exchange. And this is for the transaction of business wholly and exclusively on individual account, and for the accommodation of the trading public.

Let us pass by the bank for a few moments, while we look at this executive treasury—for an executive treasury is a very different thing from that "treasury of the United States" which was established under the law of 1789. Under that law, a treasurer was charged with the duty of providing for the safekeeping of the public money—not with the keeping of the money in his own personal custody. Such a construction of his duty was never dreamed of in the pure days of the Republic, and no corrupt practice of that sort was ever attempted. But this is the precise object of this executive treasury scheme. Executive officers—officers appointed by the Executive, and indebted to him for their places—are to be the personal holders of the public treasure. Instead of one treasurer keeping the public funds, by a safe system of deposite in banks, there is to be a legion of treasurers, with commissions from the Executive, holding the money in their own hands. And this is the main purpose of the exchequer, so far as it is designed for the transaction of business on Government account.

Let us look a little at the history of this question of the mode of keeping the public money.

In the first session of the first Congress under the Constitution, (1789,) the Treasurer of the United States was charged with keeping the public moneys, under the general superintendence of the Secretary of the Treasury, as the head of that department. How or where the money should be kept, was not then prescribed by law; nor afterwards, till 1816. The Treasurer was left to choose his own mode of keeping it, on his own responsibility, subject only to such control of the Secretary as was due to his office, to which belonged the general administration of the finances.

The Treasurer at once adopted the mode of keeping all moneys in State banks, of which some three or four were then in existence. Neither he, nor anybody else, at that day, dreamed of any other way; it was a matter of course, and must have been so understood when the law was passed.

In the next session of the same Congress, the first Bank of the United States was established, and that bank and its offices were immediately employed as depositories, though not to the entire exclusion of State banks. The Treasurer was not required by law thus to employ this bank; it was a matter of course that he should do so.

In 1794, a committee was appointed by the House of Representatives to examine into the condition of the treasury, and the mode of keeping the public moneys adopted by the Treasurer. The committee, by Mr. Baldwin, its chairman, made an elaborate report, showing that the whole subject, in all its bearings and aspects, had been thoroughly investigated; setting forth, in minute detail, the whole plan of keeping and managing the public revenues, and fully approving of it. I will read a brief extract from that report:

"The Treasurer, pursuant to general directions from the Secretary of the Treasury, keeps the public moneys under his control in the several banks. Formerly, the banks of North America, New York, Massachusetts, and Maryland, were places of deposite. At present, the public moneys are kept in the Bank of the United States, and its several offices of discount and deposite at Boston, New York, Baltimore, and Charleston, and in the Bank of Providence. The Treasurer has never any public money in his possession or custody, which is not, in fact, deposited in bank, from the moment his possession or custody commences, till it ceases, by the disbursement of it, for public purposes; except in the case of bank bills, orders upon individuals, &c., heretofore enumerated, or remittances from the supervisors of the revenue and collectors of the customs, to the Treasurer; and those, also, immediately after the receipt of them, constitute deposites in bank, to the credit of the Treasurer: The Secretary of the Treasury, or any other officer of the department besides the Treasurer, never has the possession or custody of any of the public money, &c. And the possession or custody of the Treasurer is, as already stated, exercised through the banks."

Sir, when the charter of the Bank of the United States expired in 1811, the Treasurer did not change the mode of keeping the money, except that State banks were employed, as they had been before that bank was created. He had now nearly one hundred banks to select from; and before another Bank of the United States was created, he had about two hundred and fifty to select from. This embraced the period of the war; and during this period all the State banks south of New England suspended specie payments. And yet all this while these very suspended banks, in common with others, were made the depositories of the Treasurer; for those thus used by him were known to be just as solvent after their suspension as before; and all this while no new legislation took place on the subject. Congress and the country well knew, and were well satisfied to know, that he still employed banks as depositories, as he had done from the beginning.

On the incorporation of the Bank of the United States in 1816, it was one of the privileges conferred on that institution that it should have the public deposites; of which it could only be deprived by an order of the Secretary of the Treasury, and for reasons which should be promptly submitted to Congress. This was the first act ever passed by Congress which designated any particular place for the public moneys; and yet it will be perceived that the mode of keeping was still unchanged. It was no part of the policy of this law to interfere with the duty of the Treasurer as to the mode of keeping

This was a contract with the bank, in consideration of the services required of it, and the heavy bonus which had been exacted of it; and the Treasurer executed this contract by making the bank his principal depository.

In this situation things remained till 1833, when, by the direct interposition or order of the Executive, the public moneys were removed from the vaults of this bank, and were placed again in the State banks. Here, still, so far as the law was allowed to operate, the moneys were still in the charge of the Treasurer, and kept on deposite. Certain it is, nobody else was appointed by law, or allowed, to keep the moneys, but the Treasurer. The removal, however, took place under strange and alarming circumstances; and it was deemed necessary, in order to reduce the possession of the moneys once more to the certain custody of the law, and reclaim them from the violent seizure of the Executive, to prescribe the terms and conditions on which State banks should be selected and employed as depositories. This was done in 1836. There was then a very large surplus in the treasury, which was eagerly sought after by the banks, to be used in their business; and it became a source of immense political influence and corruption in the hands of the Executive. By this act, it was designed to hold the Secretary of the Treasury directly responsible, not to the Executive, but to Congress and the country, for the proper selection of depositories which he was to make, under the restrictions imposed by the law; whilst all deposites were still to be made, as before, to the credit of the Treasurer, who was still, by the act of 1789, the sole official keeper of the public money.

In 1837, at a session of Congress specially called to take care of the Government in the emergency which had then arisen—for there was again a general suspension of specie payments—Mr. Van Buren proposed to change entirely, in principle and in fact, the mode of keeping the public money which had prevailed, without an hour's exception, from the origin of the Government. He proposed to place the public moneys in the personal custody of officers appointed by the Executive. This recommendation finally prevailed in the last year of Mr. Van Buren's administration, and his plan was established by law. Upon this measure he was defeated as a candidate for re-election to the Presidency, and a complete political revolution was effected. The law establishing the sub-treasury was then repealed—having been in existence about one year from the 4th of July, 1840. The act of 1836 was also repealed; and the custody of the public money again stood upon the act of 1789, where it stands to this day. The Treasurer is still charged with this important duty, and banks are now employed as depositories, according to the ancient and approved practice of the Government. A report made by the Secretary of the Treasury at the last session, at my instance, names the banks in which the moneys are now kept, (or were at that date,) and the terms on which they are employed. As always heretofore, the public funds are deposited in the banks to the credit of the Treasurer, from which they can be drawn only by warrant of law. The banks perform, if required, the duties of commissioners of loans and pension agents, and they transfer the funds wherever they may be required, and all without charge to the treasury.

This recital, sir, shows what the system of keeping the public money now is, and that it is just what it has been from the beginning of the Government, with the single exception of one year in Mr. Van Buren's time. Why should Congress be asked to change the mode now, when it had prevailed for fifty-two out of the fifty-three years that the Government has existed? Above all, why should we be asked to give up this mode, for that which was adopted under the late administration, and which was so signally and promptly condemned and rebuked by the people?

Mr. Speaker, if we were now at the beginning of this Government, and if the question were put to us now for the first time, How shall the public money be kept? The answer of every man of sense would be, Let the Government keep its money just as any prudent and discreet individual in private life would keep his money. It is prudent and safe for the Government to do in this matter, just what it would be prudent and safe for any such individual, or for any well-conducted public or private body or corporation, to do under the like circumstances.

Now, sir, there is in this country a practice on this subject of almost unbroken uniformity, which goes far to settle at once what is wise and what is unwise in regard to it. It is impossible, on a question of this nature, appealing so directly to the highest pecuniary interests of those who have to act in the premises, and in a manner to rouse all their faculties to the utmost vigilance and caution—it is impossible that there should be, throughout this whole country, and in all departments of business, public and private, a particular practice, settled by common and universal consent, though with nothing like actual concert, without establishing in every right-thinking mind the conviction that that practice is founded in true wisdom.

Sir, such a practice may be said to have, in some sort, the sanction which belongs to the settled maxims of the common law—the sanction of general assent founded on general experience. It has, in truth, a still higher sanction, not altogether unlike that which belongs to the principle of morality itself; for though it have not a common sentiment and feeling in its favor, like that which determines the right from the wrong in a moral question, it is confirmed by a kind of instinct, which is scarcely less shrewd and discriminating where a question of pecuniary interest is concerned. No intelligent and well-informed man in this country, even now, with the general distrust of banks which prevails, intrusts the keeping of his surplus cash to individual hands—unless it be to some individual banker of high repute and of established wealth—when he can find a convenient bank of tolerable credit to receive it. And the same is true of private and public bodies and associations.

I have stated already what the practice of this Government has been from its organization. I will not speak positively as to all the States, though I do not believe there is one where the practice is not substantially the same as under this Government. If there be an exception, gentlemen can name it. As a general rule, the treasurers of States, of counties, of cities, and towns, of societies and associations, literary, charitable, and political, the treasurers and cashiers of corporate bodies other than moneyed corporations are never intrusted, from choice, with the personal custody of the surplus moneys under their charge. As to individuals and firms in business, or retired capitalists, it is a thing quite unknown for them to keep any considerable sums of surplus and unemployed money on hand, or in the personal custody of their agents, when they can find a convenient bank of fair repute to receive it for safe-keeping. The same practice prevails with all our judicial bodies, in relation to money paid or brought into court.

And what earthly reason is there why this universal practice, this rule of good sense and sound discretion, should be departed from in the case of this Government? Are the officers and agents of this Government likely to be better selected, and more honest and trustworthy men, than the treasurers and other money agents selected by States, societies, corporations, and individuals? All fact and all experience are against such a supposition.

To say the least, this Government has had its full proportion of unfaithful and dishonest men employed in its service. There is not a State in the Union which would suffer in the comparison with it in this respect; nor scarcely a company or corporation, much as is said about dishonesty, fraud, and embezzlement among such. I doubt if the late Pennsylvania Bank of the United States itself was worse served, in the article of faithful and honest agency, than this Government has been for the last twelve or fourteen years. Corruption, peculation, and fraud, have crept in everywhere. Sir, it is not the best description of men who apply for office, nor the best of those who apply who receive office; it is not uncommonly the worst of all the candidates for a particular place that succeeds. It is the brazen, the obsequious, the unprincipled, the broken in fortune and reputation,—these are the sort of men to be the successful candidates for Government favor and patronage. And they are successful oftentimes without any particular fault on the part of the appointing power, which—in modern times, at least—is apt to surround itself, or to be surrounded, with selfish and fawning flatterers and false friends, who practise towards it every species of systematic deception and cajolery. There is in this country a growing, restless, morbid anxiety to get into public office. As sure as a man shows himself unfit to manage his own affairs, or to get a living by his profession or his trade, so sure is he to become an applicant for office. And I doubt if there be a worse school of morals than is found in public office under this Government, this side the penitentiaries of the country. Many an honest man is matriculated in office, who is graduated a rogue; and if a rogue takes office, he is ten times a rogue before he leaves it. Scarcely any man's morals are improved by his experience in the administrative places of the Government; though some, no doubt, retain their integrity in spite of all temptations. It is not an uncommon feeling among those who seek and obtain these offices, that the public and the Government are fit subjects of plunder, and that he is a fool who, once within the pale, does not enrich himself and escape with all the valuables he can lay his hands on.

No; the Government of the United States should be the last to intrust its money for keeping to the hands of individual agents selected and appointed by itself. Others may make good selections; Government in these times cannot. The very qualities which it requires to win its favor—the qualities which have made or may make the candidate useful to the administration—are not such as are apt to constitute, or to consist with high character. Government officers ought not, on every principle, to be intrusted with public money for one farthing beyond what is absolutely unavoidable. And this is precisely the rule of wisdom, which, under the lead of the wise and pure men of the Revolution, has prevailed uniformly under the Government, with the exception of the single condemned experiment to which I have before adverted.

Besides, sir, it is a safe rule to intrust the keeping of large sums of money to no individual hands, where it can be avoided. There is something in the very touch which seems to contaminate. Say what we will of human virtue, men are not to be trusted with the personal custody of large amounts of other men's money; it is a cruel experiment, let it be tried when and where it will. Suretyship cannot make it safe, with all the cruel vicarious suffering which that system inflicts on the innocent. Nor can penal enactments make it safe—though that is the best security, perhaps, the case admits of—any more than the sight of the penitentiary and the gibbet can deter from other crimes.

No; the best and safest system of keeping money which the wit of man has devised, is that of deposite in banks. This involves a system of suretyship, which, without any personal responsibility of stockholders beyond their respective shares, is as complete as it is possible to make it, without being unjust to anybody. A corporation is a person that cannot run away; its officers and agents may embezzle and fly, but the corporation remains, and its whole capital stands pledged to answer for the faith and integrity of all in its employ. And it is certainly true, that even this whole capital may be exhausted by fraud and peculation, and the corporation itself may fail. But it is equally true, as shown by a public document from the Treasury Department, that of the hundreds upon hundreds of millions of public money deposited in banks from 1789 to 1837, only half a million was ever lost by the insolvency of the banks; while in the same period, of the collectors and others, officers of the Government, receiving and disbursing public money, 2,760 became defaulters, and about five millions were thereby lost to the treasury.

Mr. Speaker, this executive treasury is just the old condemned sub-treasury over again; and this plan of placing the public funds in the hands of Government officers for personal keeping, is the substance and main feature of both. But this now proposed is vastly the most objectionable of the two, considered solely with reference to this question of keeping the public money.

Under Mr. Van Buren's sub-treasury, his officers were to keep only the ordinary surplus revenues of the Government. The officers of the present sub-treasury are to have the handling and keeping of vastly greater sums. They begin with the surplus revenues amounting (say) to three millions. Then they are to have in possession a redemption fund in specie of five millions, for the fifteen millions of treasury notes issued to creditors—all which notes, by the way, must first pass through their hands. Here would be eight millions in hand, under the operation of the exchequer, if confined strictly to Government business. But then come the banking powers, under which the Government is to deal with individuals on individual account. And here there is to be another redemption fund of five millions of specie, for the fifteen millions of certificates of deposite issued to private depositors. Then there will be the habitual surplus on hand, of cash received for exchange sold—amounting, perhaps, to three millions;—all the money amounting to one hundred millions in a year, more or less, for exchange sold having, in the mean time, passed through the hands of the officers of the exchequer. And, finally, there will be the amount habitually on hand, of the proceeds of five millions of stock, issued to supply the exchequer with capital to be employed in the purchase of exchange; this amount may be (say) two millions. Of course, I do not pretend to give more than approximate sums in any of these cases. They are near enough to show that this treasury and sub-treasury scheme contemplates the actual and habitual keeping, by personal manual possession of executive officers, of an amount of cash (principally gold and silver) not less than some fifteen, eighteen, or twenty millions of dollars! The improved plan of the gentleman from Massachusetts contemplates the keeping of twenty millions of hard cash for a redemption fund alone! And, besides the capital and surplus moneys habitually on hand, these exchequer schemes enable and require these executive officers to handle and possess, receive and pay out, in the business of deposite and exchange which they are to transact, it may be a hundred, it may be a hundred and fifty millions of dollars in a year; for every dollar of which the Government and people are responsible, and for which they can have no security beyond a few thousand dollars of doubtful suretyship and the honesty of their officers! Sir, whoever else may be in favor of such a scheme, I am not, and never can be.

Mr. Speaker, it is a cardinal Whig doctrine, that all unnecessary increase of the executive power of this Government, already vast, overshadowing, and corrupt,—I speak plainly, and mean to,—must be opposed. But, for myself, sir, though a Whig, I shall never be found opposing any manifestly necessary or useful measure, merely because it involves an increase of patronage. And I am free to avow that, were there no other difficulties in the way, I should not oppose the President's exchequer, merely because it involved the necessary increase of executive officers. The Government cannot be carried on without administrative agents, and a great many of them; and I would never stop one essential wheel in its vast machinery, simply because it requires an agent to watch and tend it, and the appointment of that agent is so much added to executive patronage.

But, in the present case, it is to be remarked, that there is something more to be considered than barely the number of new officers to be appointed, and the amount of their salaries to be paid. These officers are to hold the most delicate and seductive of all public trusts. They are to come into possession of large sums of money, not merely to handle and hold, but actually to trade and traffic upon;—of this I shall have something more to say shortly. There is something in the very fact of an officer being known to be intrusted with the personal possession of heavy sums of money by Government, which gives him importance, and weight, and sway in the community, and over the popular mind; even though it be well known, at the same time, that he cannot legally use or employ a dollar of it for his own or others' advantage. His opinions on public affairs have something of the solidity and weight, in popular estimation, of the pondrous money bags and chests on which he sits. And before I can ever consent to authorize the creation of a large number of executive officers of this description, I must have strong proof of the vital, the almost indispensable, necessity of the measure which calls for their services.

But there is another objection to this executive treasury, on the score of political principle, of a still higher and stronger kind; which I advert to, lest, by omitting all allusion to it, I should be deemed to acquiesce in the argument by which it is sought to be obviated. By placing the public moneys in the manual keeping of officers of executive appointment, as proposed by this measure, I do not say there is an actual union of the purse with the sword in executive hands; but I do say that that union is approximate, and that the thin legal partition which is interposed may be very easily broken down. It is true, according to the law, that "the President cannot touch a dollar of the public money, by his own authority, nor change its custody;" and that "whoever shall come to the exchequer for money, must show the law of Congress under which he comes; and no payment can be made but in compliance with such law." All very true; and yet all this is no answer to the rule, which requires that neither the executive nor his officers shall have the personal custody of the public money. In one important sense, their custody is his custody; and so it has been expressly claimed to be by high political authority in our own day. And the rule referred to is precautionary; it looks ahead, to some alarming conjuncture in our public affairs, when some bold, popular chief and President, having his army in the field to meet a threatened war, or, perhaps, at the close of a contest, in which the commander-in-chief has covered himself and his army with glory, shall be tempted to try his hand at the establishment of an imperial dynasty in his own person and family; when he might call on his brave soldiers, shortened in pay, perhaps, and suffering injustice at the hands of an ungrateful country, which they had defended and saved by their valor and their blood—like the American army at the close of the Revolution; when he might call on them to follow him, their companion in arms and commander, to conquer by their swords that justice for themselves which was denied them by their country. It is to a state of things like this, that the rule referred to looks forward, when nothing shall be wanting to consummate the ambitious designs of the bold and unprincipled leader, but the ways and means—the money for the enterprise; and when he might find the public moneys—all that belonged to the public treasury, whether five or twenty or fifty millions of good gold and silver—not deposited in independent banks, which would refuse to yield it up to his demand, but in the hands of his own officers and agents, appointed by his authority, devoted to his interests, and ready to do his will.

But, Mr. Speaker, I must hasten now to say a word or two about this exchequer board and its agencies, considered as an executive commercial bank of deposite and exchange. The earnestness with which the original report, made to Congress in behalf of the exchequer, denies and protests that this is no Government bank—a course which has been followed with more than equal earnestness and zeal by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING]—demonstrates plainly enough that the friends of this measure regard a Government bank as exceptionable and indefensible, and that they would not dare openly to advocate before the country any such proposition. This is well, and it argues a deference to the Constitution and to popular sentiment, in these quarters, which may yet prove the salvation of the country.

Now, sir, on this important matter of fact, I take issue with these gentlemen, one and all; and I confess myself not a little astonished when I consider what intellect and what learning have been applied to the question, that even doubts, much more that positive opinions, should have been expressed from such quarters against the idea that it was any part of this exchequer scheme to establish a Government bank. The point is too plain for argument or opinion. It is a thing palpable to every vision, standing out in bold relief on the face of the scheme, and cannot be taken or mistaken, either for nothing or for anything else. It is not a bank, because it makes no discounts! And it is not a bank, because it is not a joint-stock company! Well, let those who argue thus, enjoy their opinions; thank God, there is little danger that such opinions can be propagated.

I affirm that this scheme does propose a Government bank, with all the elements essential to a bank. The bank is to be conducted, too, by Government, as a corporation, just as other corporations conduct their banking operations—through the agency of officers and clerks of its own appointment. It is to deal with individuals, on individual account, as any other bank; and, though it may not be sued, yet it can sue in the name of the corporation—namely, the Government.

I put out of consideration here, the issues to creditors; these are made on Government account, and this may be a legitimate business for Government to transact. Besides, these issues belong not to the bank, but to the sub-treasury part of the scheme. And this, by the way, constitutes the only essential difference between this sub-treasury and that of Mr. Van Buren. The latter contemplated the use of coin only, as the sole currency to be used between the Government and its creditors and debtors; though, as is well known, this feature in the plan failed utterly in practice, and bank paper and bank checks were used instead, almost exclusively. The sub-treasury offered to us, provides for the use of Government paper to be issued to creditors, and to be receivable for all public dues.

I also put out of consideration here all dealings in exchange on Government account. All this belongs also to the sub-treasury part of the exchequer. The power to buy and sell exchange, for the transfer of the public revenues, has been often exercised, and it was part of the authority expressly given under the sub-treasury of Mr. Van Buren. All this Government has done, and may do; though it is a power subject to great abuse, and liable to strong objections.

I desire, then, that it may be distinctly understood that I do not charge that this exchequer scheme includes a Government bank, because the board and its agencies are to receive deposites of public money, or revenue; nor because it is to issue convertible paper in payment to the public creditors; nor because it may draw drafts, or buy and sell exchanges, for the transfer of Government funds for Government use. These are operations analogous to banking operations; but it is not on account of these operations that I find a Government bank in the powers conferred on the board of exchequer and its agencies. Nor, on the other hand, does the fact that these operations have been carried on, and may be carried on (if they may) by the Treasury Department, tend to prove—which was the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,]—that whatever other commercial operations analogous to these, in mere matter of form, but totally distinct in substance, object, and character, the Government may carry on, yet it will not conduct the proper business of a true commercial bank. The gentleman from Massachusetts says this cannot be a Government bank on account of the exchequer receiving deposites, because the treasury always receives deposites; nor on account of its issuing paper for currency, because that the Treasury Department has done, and may do; nor on account of its buying and selling exchange, because that also has been done by the Treasury Department when it was no bank. But all this is arguing (if there be argument in it) without advancing us one step towards a conclusion. It is, in effect, declaring that Government may establish an agency of Government officers to conduct all the operations of a commercial bank—not on Government account, but wholly on individual account, just in the manner of any private bank or banker; and yet that agency cannot be a Government bank, because it is the Government, or a part of it.

But let us see what this Government machine is to do, and then let us determine whether it be a bank or not.

And, first, it is to carry on the business of receiving on private deposites money, gold and silver, "the property of individuals, to be held, as in other cases of deposites made by individuals, for convenience and security;" and for these private deposites it is to issue certificates of deposite, charging a premium therefor not exceeding the one-half of one per cent. The certificates outstanding at any one time must not exceed fifteen millions of dollars, and they are to be prepared so as to circulate as bank money, or currency.

Now this is precisely the business transacted by the Bank of Amsterdam; and this was its principal, if not its only business. It was not a bank of discount; it did not loan a dollar of money; it did not deal in exchanges. The original subscribers deposited their coin, which was of short weight, and received a credit on the books of the bank equivalent to the intrinsic value of the coin; and these credits were bank money; and all payments of considerable sums were made in this bank money, by the transfer of credits from the name of the debtor to that of the creditor. The bank also received on deposite the money of individuals, placing an equivalent of bank money to the account of the depositor, with a small deduction only for profit and expenses, and giving him a receipt payable to bearer. This was the sum of the business of the bank; and was the Bank of Amsterdam a bank, or was it not? The Bank of Hamburg operates in the same way to this hour; and is the Bank of Hamburg a bank, or is it not? And if they are banks, why is not this board of exchequer—conducting this identical business in the same form, wholly on individual account—why is this exchequer not a bank?

But the exchequer is to deal in exchanges, solely on individual account. It may buy exchange, restricted only to bills running from State to State, and to such as shall be payable in thirty days from date or from sight. With these restrictions only, it may purchase exchange to an amount limited only by its means, and the offers which shall be made. And it may discount also the bills which it buys, only taking care that it do not take more than eight per cent. for both interest and exchange. And all this it may do, not in any manner on Government account, or connected in the remotest degree with the management of the proper revenue and funds of Government; but solely and exclusively on individual account, and for the accommodation of the trading and business community.

And then the exchequer may sell exchange to any amount for which a demand may exist—receiving the money of individuals, and furnishing to them commercial bills, just as other banks and bankers furnish such bills; and all this, not for the Government, or on Government account; but for individuals, and on individual account. The only restriction is, that the premium charged for this business shall not exceed two per cent.

Such, and so vast, is the business to be done by this bank, under the powers conferred on the board of exchequer—all of it a legitimate banking business, precisely such as is commonly transacted by banks and bankers, and all to be done on individual account—and yet, this is no bank!

And this is no bank, because, after all, it is only receiving deposites and giving paper for them; or it is only selling or buying exchange. And all this the Treasury Department has done, and may do again, and yet be no bank. But has the Treasury Department ever received private deposites, "the property of individuals, to be held, as in other cases of deposites made by individuals, for convenience and security," and issued paper to circulate as currency upon such private deposites? And has the Treasury Department ever dealt in exchanges, buying and selling bills, for the sole purpose of accommodation to individuals, and to enable such individuals to anticipate or transfer their funds? If this Government, or any other Government, had ever attempted a business of this sort before, there might be something in the argument. But what is it to the purpose, when we charge that, if the Government deals in private deposites, and in bills of exchange wholly on individual account, it conducts the proper business of a bank—what is it to the purpose to reply, that the Government does deal, or has dealt, and may deal, in deposites and exchanges on Government account, and for the management of its own proper revenues and funds? Does it follow, therefore, that the Government may deal in deposites, and exchanges on individual account; and that, in so doing, it does not conduct the proper business of a bank?

Sir, this sort of reasoning leads to very strange conclusions. The Government sets up an official agency to deal in money and exchanges, just after the manner of a bank, and in no manner or degree for Government account; and that agency is not a bank, because the Government may and does deal in money and exchanges in its own proper business. Well; the Government buys and sells real estate, and buys and sells merchandise for Government account, and in the transaction of its own proper business: can Government, therefore, establish an official agency for dealing and trading in real estate, or in merchandise, in no manner or degree for account of Government, and yet deny that it is a speculator or a trader?

Mr. Speaker, there can be no plainer proposition than that this exchequer scheme includes a regular, out-and-out Government bank—an executive commercial bank of deposite and exchange—to be conducted by this Government as a corporation, through its own officers, wholly on individual account, and precisely in the manner of any other bank. It may transact a banking business in a single year equal to a hundred millions of dollars. In discounting paper in the form of bills, in buying exchange, and in selling exchange, though terms are prescribed, yet there is latitude enough to enable the Government—the administration for the time being—to distinguish, among its customers, between its friends and its enemies; bestowing favors upon some, and imposing hard or uncomfortable terms upon others. It may discount paper on easier terms than its neighbor banks; it may buy exchange at a higher premium, and may sell exchange at a lower premium, than the market price. And it is the Executive Government that is to do all this; and we, the Representatives of the people, are to give the authority. The Executive, through officers deriving their places from him, is to deal and trade in money and commercial paper to the tune (it may be) of a hundred millions a year, with individuals all over the country, and with the whole trading and commercial community. Liberty! Liberty! what has become of that jealous spirit which once made the American people so watchful for freedom, and filled them with alarm and indignation at the slightest encroachments, or the offered blandishments of Executive power!

But, Mr. Speaker, it is time to ask soberly and seriously after the power of this Government to deal, as a banker, in money and exchanges, in the way and manner proposed. I should be glad to hear some gentleman rise in his place and maintain the naked proposition, that this Government has the constitutional authority for this kind of business. I should like to hear the argument, that I may understand in what particular clause in the Constitution the authority is found, or from what particular or what general power it is derived. A power to deal and trade in money and commercial paper, as here proposed, is a substantive power, in no manner incident merely to some other power, so far as I can discover. This Government has full authority, of course, for the management of its own revenues and funds; and it may manage its revenues and funds itself, by its own proper officers, or it may create a bank or a fiscal agent for that purpose. If it create a bank for this purpose, it may give to it all the ordinary powers of a bank, to enable it to maintain an independent existence as such. It may authorize the bank to receive private deposites, to discount paper and loan money, to issue currency, and to deal in exchanges. All these powers are appropriate to a bank, and some or all are essential to its existence as a bank. It cannot be a bank without them, or some of them. It must have an independent corporate existence; it must have capital; and it must transact business enough in its proper line to live upon. But does it follow, therefore, that the Government itself may turn banker, as a corporation; set apart a capital to trade upon; and conduct all the various and complex business and operations of a bank? These operations are appropriate and essential to a bank as a fiscal agent; but they are in no manner appropriate or essential to the Government, in the management of its own revenues and fiscal affairs by its own officers. It is not necessary that the Government should deal in money and exchanges on individual account, to enable it to keep, transfer, and disburse its own money, or even to enable it to put forth its own paper for currency. This it may do by issues to its own creditors, and for money borrowed. These would be issues on Government account, and not a trading in money or paper by the Government on individual account. This Government, by an express authority, establishes post offices and post roads. If necessary for carrying the mail on a particular route, the Government may set up a line of stages of its own for the purpose, and, as incident to the carrying of the mail, perhaps it might carry passengers. This has actually been done by the Post Office Department in former times. It was done on the route between this city and Baltimore. But what would be thought, because the Government sometimes carried the mails with passengers in its own post coaches, if it should undertake to set up lines of post coaches all over the country, for the carrying of passengers without the mails? And this may serve to illustrate the distinction between the transaction of business on Government account, or as incident to the proper business of Government, and the transaction of the same business wholly on individual account. In the same way, the Government might, if necessary for the transportation of the mails, construct roads or railroads, or build and own steamboats; and, perhaps, the carrying of passengers might be connected with the carrying of the mails. But nobody, I believe, would think that the Government might, therefore, by its own official agency, construct railroads and build steamboats, solely for the accommodation of the public in the carrying of passengers, without any connexion with, or reference to, the carrying of the mails whatever. And yet, is not this, in substance and principle, precisely what this exchequer scheme supposes the Government may do? The Government may keep its own money; therefore it may keep the money of of individuals. The Government may buy and sell drafts for the transfer of its own funds; therefore it may do the same thing for the transfer of the funds of individuals. The Government may issue paper, as the evidence of its own proper debts contracted in its own proper business; therefore it may issue paper wholly on dealings with individuals, and solely for the accommodation of such individuals and the commercial community in general. The Government may create a bank as its fiscal agent, not because a bank is necessary, but a fiscal agent is; and may authorize such bank, while performing the duties of fiscal agent, to conduct the ordinary operations of a bank, as necessary to its support and existence; and, therefore, the Government, being its own fiscal agent if it choose to be, may also conduct the ordinary operations of a bank, though those operations are in no way connected with its management of its own funds and fiscal affairs;—at any rate, in no way essential, or even important, to such management. It cannot facilitate, or tend to facilitate, the operations of the board of exchequer and its agencies, in receiving, keeping, transferring, and disbursing the proper public money of the Government, or in paying the public creditors in treasury notes instead of gold and silver, that it should also receive the money of individuals on private deposite, furnishing currency therefor, or that it should buy and sell exchange for the accommodation of the commercial community. It must create embarrassment, rather; at any rate, additional labor, care, and expense. These banking operations are separate and distinct, and are so regarded in the plan itself. "The board of exchequer and its several agencies," says this plan, "shall keep separate and distinct sets of books, for the purpose of entering and recording, in one set, all transactions respecting the collection, keeping, and disbursing of the public revenue, and transmitting the public moneys from place to place, for the service of Government; and, in another, all transactions and accounts arising from dealings in exchange, and other transactions not on Government account." And these "dealings in exchange and other transactions not on Government account," are as distinct from the duties required of the exchequer "for the service of the Government," as they could be if they had been assigned to a separate board—a distinct agency.

And I repeat, that the banking operations here proposed seem to me to require some substantive and direct authority in the Constitution to sanction them, inasmuch as they do not appear to stand in any manner essentially connected with the operations of Government, under any of the substantive or granted powers relating to the revenue or the management of the public finances. If any gentleman on this floor is prepared to maintain that this Government may, by constitutional warrant, as a political corporation, through its own officers, set up a commercial bank of deposite and exchange, with a proper banking capital, to deal and trade in money and paper, and in commercial bills, solely on account of individuals and for the accommodation of the commercial community, and without the slightest necessary connexion with the management of the proper funds and finances of Government,—if any gentleman will do this, I shall, for one, be gratified to hear him; and I shall expect to get some new light in regard to the constitutional powers of the Government. Until I am enlightened in this way, I must hesitate to give my sanction to the powers now proposed to be exercised; and I must leave it to those to support this proposition, from the President down—strict constructionists—who can find no warrant of authority whatever in the Constitution for a bank as a fiscal agent of the Government, because such bank, if created, must, or may be, authorized to deal in money and exchange! On all this subject it is enough for me to say, at present, that this is a Government bank—demonstrably so, and not the less so because it is denied; and that, by the plain admission of the originators and friends of the exchequer scheme, power or no power, a Government bank ought not to exist in this country.

Mr. Speaker, my opinions, in part, at least, both of this new executive treasury and sub-treasury, and this executive bank, are, I think, by this time, pretty well understood. The support they have received from a particular quarter, which has commanded at all times, and on all great questions of public interest, my profound respect—that support, and nothing else, could ever, for a moment, have made me doubtful about the true character of this measure, or made me hesitate to express that condemnation of it which I have believed it merited;—I may say, that utter abhorrence of it which I have constantly felt.

Mr. Speaker, at the last session, feeling it to be the duty of the majority here to do something—whatever they could, without any sacrifice of principle, which should promise relief, I proposed a substitute for the bill reported from the Select Committee, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING.] That substitute contemplated the issuing, by the Government, of fifteen millions of convertible paper, or notes, to be issued to creditors, or to those who should lend the Government their cash—redeemable on demand, in specie, at the Treasury in Washington, or at an agency of the Treasury in the city of New York. Of course, no issues were to be made, except on Government account; there was to be no sub-treasury, and no board of exchequer, for no such board was required; any more than the like machinery was or is required for the issue of inconvertible treasury notes.

This measure was offered by me, that it might be considered whenever the exchequer plan should be brought forward. It expressed my ultimatum in regard to paper for currency, to be issued directly by this Government, which I hold to be a practice always liable to abuse, and to be avoided as far as possible. In truth, I should, at any time, have given my own proposition a reluctant support; though, if the subject had come up, it should have had from me a firm support as an antagonist measure to that proposed by the Executive.

The House is aware that a few days since I offered another measure, referred to by me at the commencement of my remarks, as a substitute for the exchequer scheme, which, at my instance, was laid on the table and ordered to be printed. This measure I greatly prefer to the former one submitted by me; and it is my purpose, as I have already said, to urge it at a proper time upon the consideration of the House. If gentlemen have not turned their attention to it, I beg they will do so. It will explain itself. It is perfectly simple, and to all parties concerned, as a pecuniary transaction, perfectly safe; and it is as little liable to exceptions from political considerations, as any plan for the same objects could well be. While it will enable the Government to borrow cheaply, at home, fifteen millions of dollars, it will afford the means, not of creating, but of adopting fifteen millions of sound currency, which, by the act of adoption, will be made to put on the character of nationality. I am not permitted now to enter further into this plan, as the time allowed me is just about to expire. A further opportunity, I trust, will be afforded me when the House shall go into committee on the bill of the gentleman from Massachusetts, which I hope it will do very soon; and, in the mean time, I beg leave again earnestly to commend to the attention of gentlemen on all sides of the House the measure and plan to which I refer.

BRITISH TREATY.

SECRET SESSION.

SPEECH OF MR. BUCHANAN,

OF PENNSYLVANIA.

In Senate, August 19, 1842—On the ratification of the treaty with Great Britain.

Mr. BUCHANAN rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT: It is now manifest that the treaty under discussion is destined to be ratified by a large majority of the Senate. The news of this ratification will spread joy and gladness throughout the land. It will be hailed by the country as the pledge of a lasting peace between two great nations; and those who were instrumental either in its negotiation or ratification, will be esteemed public benefactors. Beyond all question, such will be the first impression upon the public mind. Amidst this general joy, it will be a subject of surprise and astonishment that some eight or ten Senators should have separated themselves from the mass, and voted against the ratification of this treaty. The first impulse of public feeling will be to condemn these Senators. Now, sir, as I shall be one of this small number, I rise to make my defence before the people of the country in advance, not doubting but that the justice, if not the generosity of the Senate, will remove the injunction of secrecy from our proceedings, and enable me to publish my remarks.

There is no Senator who has felt more anxious to vote in favor of this treaty than myself. I am conscious of all the happy effects upon the country which might result from unanimity in this body; and I may say, in all sincerity, that I have endeavored to agree with the majority. Nay, more—I was disposed to distrust my own judgment, believing that it might have been prejudiced by the zealous and persevering efforts which I had formerly made, both as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and as a Senator on this floor, to sustain the rights of Maine against what I believed to be the unjust pretensions of the British Government. I have, therefore, earnestly endeavored to keep my mind open to conviction until the last moment; but after all, I cannot vote for this treaty without feeling that I had violated my duty to the country, and without forfeiting my own self-respect. In the emphatic language of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] I believe it to be a treaty unjust to Maine, and dishonorable to the whole country; and thus believing, if it depended upon my vote, it should be rejected without regard to consequences. These I would leave to that superintending Providence which has ever been our shield in the day of danger. Even if war should be the result, (which I do not by any means anticipate,) I would rely with perfect confidence upon the courage, patriotism, and energy of my countrymen, for the defence of their rights.

When the mission of Lord Ashburton was first announced, I hailed it as the olive branch of peace and friendship, presented by England to this country. The auspices were all favorable. I believed then, and I believe still, that she was sincere. Her revenue was insufficient for her annual expenditures; she had experienced reverses in the East, where she was waging two expensive, unjust, and bloody wars; a large portion of her own population was almost in a state of open rebellion, and she had signally failed in her darling policy of extorting from France a ratification of the quintuple treaty, which would have given her the right of searching all European vessels on the coast of Africa. Such was the condition of England when Lord Ashburton arrived in Washington, "having been charged with full powers to negotiate and settle all matters in discussion between the two countries." When I make this declaration, I employ the very language used by Mr. Webster himself, in the very first sentence of his first diplomatic note, dated on the 17th June last. His Lordship's powers were not confined to the Northeastern boundary question, which is the only disputed question settled by the treaty; but they would have enabled him to terminate all the vexed and dangerous questions which still remain open to disturb the harmony and threaten the peace of the two nations.

Not only did a crisis then exist in the affairs of England eminently calculated to predispose her to a fair and amicable adjustment of all the disputed questions; but the British Government well knew that these questions were of such a distinct and varied character, that some one of them had strongly enlisted the feelings of each portion of our country; and, when combined, that they would unite the American people almost as one man in demanding justice. There was the Northeastern boundary question, which peculiarly interested the Eastern States, as did the Northwestern boundary the Western States, whilst the Creole question had deeply affected the sensibilities of the Southern and Southwestern portions of the Union. Redress for the Caroline outrage, and an abandonment of the right of search, were questions of national honor, in which every man with an American heart, throughout the broad extent of our country, felt the deepest interest. The varied wrongs of England had united us together in an adamantine chain, no link of which ought ever to have been broken until these wrongs had all been redressed. I believe in my soul that the propitious moment had arrived for settling all these questions upon just and honorable principles. Feeling this to be the case, I declared, on the floor of the Senate, at the period of Lord Ashburton's arrival, that our motto ought to be—All or none. This I did, because I felt that all could be adjusted. I believe still that all might have been adjusted; although I knew it would be the policy of the British Government to obtain a cession of that portion of Maine necessary to consolidate her power in North America, and leave the other questions—particularly that of the Creole—for "a more convenient season." This Creole question, from peculiar causes, which I need not explain, was the weakest, except in point of justice, of all the questions in dispute; whilst the prejudices of the British people were most strongly enlisted against its fair and honorable adjustment. Lord Ashburton has succeeded in obtaining all that his Government most desired, and in postponing for future negotiation all which was most desirable for the American people. Until within the last few weeks, we had every reason to believe that all matters in dispute would be adjusted by the treaty. I appeal to Senators whether they have not heard, over and over again, throughout the negotiation, that the only obstacle in the way of settling all our difficulties was the obstinate adherence of the Maine commissioners to the line of the treaty of 1783. I often made inquiries concerning the Creole question, believing that its adjustment would be the most difficult; and was as often informed that there would be no difficulty in providing for the future, although Lord Ashburton might not be able to grant indemnity for the past. I believed that all things were in successful progress; and never have I been more astonished and disappointed than when I first learned that the Maine question alone had been settled by the treaty, and that all the rest of the disputed questions had merely been made the subjects of a diplomatic correspondence.

Had all the questions been adjusted between the two countries, a career of happiness and prosperity would have been opened to both, on which the imagination of the philanthropist might love to dwell. Time might have soothed, or even obliterated, the memory of the successive wrongs and insults which we have suffered from England since she first acknowledged our independence; and we might have forgotten those unfriendly feelings towards her, which, unquestionably, now pervade the great body of the American people. Senators on this floor may speak of the two nations as the mother and the daughter, and may please their fancy by such epithets of mutual endearment; but, in the opinion of a large majority of our countrymen, England has ever acted as a harsh and severe stepmother towards this country. I had fondly hoped that this unnatural relationship would end with the termination of Lord Ashburton's mission; and, had all the questions been settled, I was prepared to yield much for the sake of such a happy consummation.

I shall now proceed to discuss each of the subjects separately, involved in the correspondence and the treaty. And, first, I shall refer to the question of impressment. The two last letters of the series relate to this subject. On the 8th of August, (the day before the termination of the special mission,) Mr. Webster addressed a letter to Lord Ashburton, which presents a clear and striking view of the arguments which have been heretofore urged against the impressment of American seamen; and suggests to the British Government the propriety of renouncing the practice hereafter. His Lordship replied to this letter on the next day, (the 9th of August;) and, with this letter, his mission terminated.

This letter of Lord Ashburton is a fair specimen of his whole correspondence. It shows his Lordship to be a shrewd, sagacious, and practical man. The British Government could not have made a more fortunate selection of a minister. Whilst all his letters abound in general, and, I have no doubt, sincere professions of anxiety to establish perpetual friendship between the two countries, he never yields any of the pretensions of the British Government. He praises much the superior ability of the American negotiator; and (to use a cant phrase, common at the bar whilst I was a member of the profession) is content that Mr. Webster shall have the argument, provided he himself gets the land. He never commits himself, or his Government, on any particular point; and yet there breathes throughout his whole language such a spirit of conciliation, that, until you examine it particularly, you incline to the belief that he is disposed to grant all you desire.

In this letter, I ask, does he abandon the odious claim of the British Government to impress seamen on board of American vessels? Does he yield to the unanswerable arguments presented by Mr. Webster? No, sir; no. On this subject, he is not merely non-committal. He comes up to the very point which has always been at issue between the two countries;—asserts the principle of the perpetual allegiance of all British-born subjects in the strongest terms; and justifies the practice of impressment in cases of necessity. Nay, more: he informs Mr. Webster that we ourselves would resort to the same practice, if our geographical position did not render it unnecessary. Let me quote a few sentences of his own language, to establish my position.

"The principle is (says his Lordship) that all subjects of the Crown are, in case of necessity, bound to serve their country; and the seafaring man is naturally taken for the naval service. This is not, as is sometimes supposed, any arbitrary principle of monarchical government, but one founded on the natural duty of every man to defend the life of his country; and all the analogy of your laws would lead to the conclusion that the same principle would hold good in the United States, if their geographical position did not make its application unnecessary."

It is true that he concludes with the expression of a vague hope that some satisfactory arrangement may yet be made upon the subject—meaning nothing, and amounting to nothing.

I confess, sir, I did not anticipate that the subject of impressment would form any part of the negotiations between Mr. Webster and Lord Ashburton. This question ought never to have found a place in the correspondence, unless, from the preliminary conferences, it had been ascertained that England was prepared to renounce the practice forever. Its introduction has afforded Lord Ashburton the opportunity of insisting upon a claim to which we can never practically submit, without being disgraced and degraded among the nations of the earth. We declared war against Great Britain thirty years ago, to protect American seamen from impressment; and she, and all the world, ought to know that we shall declare war again should the practice ever be resumed. If the stars and the stripes which float over an American vessel upon the ocean cannot protect all those who sail beneath them from impressment, no matter to what land they may owe their birth, then we are no longer an independent nation. Whenever any British officer shall dare to violate the flag of our country on the ocean, and shall seize and carry away any seaman from the deck of an American vessel, no matter what may be the pretence, (unless instant reparation should be made by his Government for the outrage,) our only alternative will then be war or national dishonor. We are deeply, solemnly pledged before the world, to avenge such a wrong without a moment's unnecessary delay. Such an act would, in effect, be a declaration of war against us; and Great Britain knows it well. She claims the right of impressment, as a belligerent right only, and when she shall go to war with France, or any other nation, she will then count the cost to herself which may result from this practice. She may refrain, from the conviction that it would convert us from being a neutral, into her most deadly enemy. No, sir; no. This is not a question for holyday negotiation, but for war, inevitable war, should the occasion ever unfortunately arise. But Great Britain will have a care how she provokes such a conflict, in violation of every principle of national law, although she may refuse formally to renounce the practice. War must be the necessary result of impressment, or our national character must become a subject of scorn and contempt for all mankind.

I proceed next to the case of the Caroline. There was nothing easier in the world than to settle this question satisfactorily. The British Government had only to acknowledge that Captain Drew and his band of volunteer desperadoes were in the wrong when, under the auspices of Colonel McNab, they had invaded our territory, burnt the Caroline, and murdered an American citizen; and then do all they could to repair this wrong, by indemnifying the owner of the steamboat for his loss of property, and providing for the family of the murdered Durfee, if he have a family. To acknowledge the wrong, and repair the injury as far as he can, is the first dictate of every just and honorable man, at the moment he becomes convinced of his error. Such ought to be the conduct of every just and honorable nation. But has Great Britain pursued this course in the case of the Caroline? Has she either admitted the national wrong, or repaired it by making compensation to those who were its victims? Neither the one nor the other. We have been told, indeed, by the Senator from Virginia, (Mr. RIVES,) that this old and haughty nation, proud in arms, has submitted to ask our pardon for the outrage; and he considers this a great triumph. But is this the fact? Let the letter of Lord Ashburton to Mr. Webster, of the 28th July, be carefully examined by any Senator, and he must arrive at a directly opposite conclusion. I assert that this letter contains an able and elaborate justification of the attack on the Caroline, and a vindication of the British officers who planned and conducted it. How could it be otherwise? Has not Colonel McNab been knighted, and Captain Drew pensioned, for this gallant exploit against unarmed men, who vainly believed that the American flag upon American soil was a protection against British outrage? Have we not seen, within a few days, that a public dinner at which a noble Duke presided, has recently been given to Sir Allen McNab in London, where he received such honors as will encourage him again to violate our territory, whenever interest or feeling shall again prompt to a similar outrage? I ask the Senator from Virginia to point to any portion of the letter where the conduct of McNab and Drew has been condemned; nay, more, I ask him to point to any portion of the letter where it has not been justified. It is very true that Lord Ashburton, whilst he earnestly maintains "that there were grounds of justification [for the Caroline outrage] as strong as were ever presented in such cases," declares "that no slight of the authority of the United States was ever intended;" and although this service was necessary, yet, as it involved a violation of our territory, he would deprecate its recurrence. In the very sentence to which the Senator from Virginia refers, in which his Lordship regrets "that some explanation and apology for this occurrence was not immediately made," he still continues to justify the capture and destruction of the Caroline on the plea of necessity. The whole substance of this letter may be summed up in a very few words, thus: Although the violation of your territory, and the destruction of the Caroline, were absolutely necessary and entirely justifiable, and as such have received the approbation of the British Government; yet I am extremely sorry that any such necessity existed, and hope it may not again occur. I also regret that such an explanation and apology for this occurrence as I have just made, had not been tendered to your Government immediately after the event. A man runs me through the body with a sword; and afterwards explains and apologises to me, by assuring me that his act was both necessary and justifiable, but yet he is extremely sorry that any such necessity existed. This is Lord Ashburton's apology for the Caroline outrage. The President vainly indulged the hope, in his annual message at the commencement of the present session, "that the British Government would see the propriety of renouncing, as a rule of future action, the precedent which has been set in the affair at Schlosser." This was a vain hope. So far from renouncing the affair as a precedent, it has been justified and approved by that Government throughout. Let an insurrection again occur in Canada, and we shall reap the bitter fruits of this precedent. The military officers of the British Government, will send expeditions across our frontier, which may plunder and murder our citizens, under pretence of defending their Canadian possessions against the attacks of the insurgents. This will be done, if for no other purpose but that of displaying their zeal and devotion to their sovereign; and thus purchasing the honors and rewards which have been so profusely bestowed upon the McNabs and the Drews who planned and conducted the Caroline expedition. A necessity to justify such attacks will always exist whenever they are deemed expedient; and if, after four years' negotiation, the British Government should express its sorrow—not for the outrage itself, but because a necessity existed for its perpetration—then we must be satisfied, if we should consider the Caroline precedent as binding hereafter.

After all that I have said, it would be vain to ask whether Lord Ashburton has granted indemnity to the owner of the Caroline, or provided for the family of the murdered Durfee. It does not appear that Mr. Webster ever demanded any such indemnity, or even alluded to the subject. He may possibly have adverted to it in his private conferences with Lord Ashburton; but if he did—my life upon it—the answer was, that the attack on the Caroline was justifiable, and therefore not a subject of indemnity. You have thus permitted this steamboat, owned by an American citizen, whilst under American colors, and moored in an American port, to be destroyed by the British authorities, without even asking them to indemnify the owner. Does not justice require that you should indemnify the citizen whom your own soil and your own flag could not protect, and for whom you asked no indemnity? I shall not at present attempt to answer this question. On the files of our executive documents, there is to be found a memorial from the citizens of Buffalo, presented in March, 1838, which places the claim of Mr. Wells, the American owner of the Caroline, in a very strong light; and as we have not even asked any satisfaction for him from the British Government, it will be a serious question whether we are not bound to indemnify him ourselves.

But Lord Ashburton, in this extraordinary letter, is not content with acting on the defensive. In the conclusion of it, he becomes the assailant. Referring to the case of McLeod, he complains that "individuals have been made personally liable for acts done under the avowed authority of their Government;" and he inquired whether the Government of the United States is now in a condition to surrender those engaged in such enterprises as that of the capture of the Caroline, without subjecting them to trial.

Mr. Webster replied to this letter on the 6th of August, and informs his Lordship that the President is satisfied, "and will make this subject, [the capture of the Caroline,] as a complaint of violation of territory, the topic of no further discussion between the two Governments." And thus ends the Caroline question.

But not so the McLeod question. Mr. Webster admits, as he had done in the beginning, that McLeod ought to have been surrendered, without trial, on the demand of the British Government. He graciously explains the reason why this could not be done, and casts the blame "upon a State court, and that not of the highest jurisdiction," which "was embarrassed, as it would appear, by technical difficulties." He says, however, that the Government of the United States holds itself not only fully disposed, but fully competent, to fulfil its acknowledged obligations to subjects of England, who may hereafter engage in such enterprises; and informs his Lordship that the attention of Congress "has been called to the subject, to say what further provision ought to be made to expedite proceedings in such cases."

His Lordship must, indeed, have been difficult to please, if all these assurances were not satisfactory. In what, then, has the Caroline outrage resulted?—that outrage, so eloquently described by the Secretary himself, in his letter to Mr. Fox, as to make the blood tingle;—that outrage perpetrated on the Caroline "in the darkness of the night, while moored to the shore, and while unarmed men were asleep on board, killing some and wounding others, and then drawing her into the current, above the cataract, setting her on fire, and, careless to know whether there might not be in her the innocent with the guilty, or the living with the dead, committing her to a fate which fills the imagination with horror." We have settled this outrage upon our territory without any acknowledgment from the British Government that the act itself was wrong and unjustifiable, and without any indemnity to the injured individuals. Nay, more; Mr. Webster has yielded to Great Britain, while she still continued to justify the act and approve the conduct of the officers of the expedition, an assurance that we would surrender, without trial, all persons who may hereafter be engaged in similar enterprises. And, to cap the climax, the Senate have already passed what I solemnly believe to be an unconstitutional bill, which, if it should receive the sanction of the House, and be approved by the President, will deprive all State courts of jurisdiction over the foul murders which may be committed within their territory by lawless bands of desperate men sent over the lines from Canada by petty provincial officers, and will discharge the criminals from confinement in a summary manner, by a gross perversion of the writ of habeas corpus. Surely we have done everything we could to appease the British Government for the trial of McLeod before the courts of New York. I repeat that Lord Ashburton must be a most unreasonable man if he be not entirely satisfied with the settlement of the McLeod and Caroline questions.

I now come to the Creole question. And here we, who are opposed to the treaty, have been told that this is peculiarly a Southern question; and that, if the Senators from the South are satisfied with the manner in which it has been adjusted, we ought not to complain. Sir, this is not a mere Southern question, but it is a question which deeply affects the honor of the whole country. I might here repeat what I have said upon a former occasion—that all Christendom is leagued against the South upon this question of domestic slavery. They have no other allies to sustain their constitutional rights, except the Democracy of the North. I do not mean to insinuate that the Whig party of the North are generally abolitionists. Far from it. But this I will say: that Whig candidates most generally receive the support of the abolitionists; and, therefore, the Whigs, as a party, are careful not to give them offence. Far different is the conduct of the Democrats. In my own State, we inscribe upon our party banners hostility to abolition. It is there one of the cardinal principles of the Democratic party; and many a hard battle have we fought to sustain this principle. Whilst the Democrats of the North are opposed to slavery in the abstract, they are ever ready to maintain the constitutional rights of the South against the fierce and fanatical spirit of abolition. I, therefore, claim the right of discussing the Creole question. It was my anxious desire and confident hope that this question, at least, might have been settled by the treaty. I firmly believe that the propitious moment for adjusting it on honorable terms has passed away forever. The British Government might have consented to accept the bitter with the sweet; and to have done us justice on the Creole question, for the sake of obtaining that portion of Maine which they so ardently desired. But we have not improved the golden opportunity; and now what are we told? Why, that a great advance has been made towards the settlement of this question by the correspondence before us.

And what is a diplomatic note? What statesman ever dreamed of adjusting an important question, well calculated to impair the harmony and destroy the peace of two great nations, by a diplomatic note? A treaty is the only mode known to the law of nations by which such questions can be settled. Now, sir, if the letter of Lord Ashburton, of the 6th August, had even contained every stipulation which we could desire in regard to the Creole question, to what would it amount? It might possibly bind the honor of the present British cabinet; but after a change of ministry, would it bind their successors? No man will pretend it. A new ministry would say to us, Why did you not secure your claimed rights by treaty? We are not bound by a mere diplomatic note, written by Lord Ashburton in behalf of a former ministry. And more especially are we not bound by it, when that minister himself, in the very first sentence of the note on which you rely, disclaims all authority from his Government to enter into any formal stipulation on the subject; and in a subsequent part of it, refers "to great principles too deeply rooted in the consciences and sympathies of the British people," which might cause a disavowal of any engagement into which he might enter for the purpose of settling this question.

But even if the engagement contained in this note of Lord Ashburton were solemnly inserted in the body of the treaty itself, it would be wholly ineffectual. It is contained in two sentences, which I shall read:

"In the mean time, (says his Lordship,) I can engage that instructions shall be given to the Governors of her Majesty's colonies on the southern borders of the United States to execute their own laws with careful attention to the wish of their Government, and that there shall be no officious interference with American vessels driven by accident or by violence into those ports. The laws and duties of hospitality shall be executed, and those seem neither to require nor to justify any further inquisition into the state of persons or things on board of vessels so situated, than may be indispensable to enforce the observance of the municipal law of the colony, and the proper regulation of its harbors and waters."

Now, sir, when we consider the nature of our grievance, we shall perceive at once how wholly inadequate his Lordship's stipulation will be to afford a remedy. American citizens, in transporting their slaves by sea, from the Atlantic States to States on the Gulf of Mexico and on the Mississippi, must pass through the Bahama channel. If their vessels are driven into any British port along this channel, by storms, or are carried there in consequence of mutiny and murder, the slaves, who can escape to the shore by any means whatever, are instantly free. Such is the law of England, which will most probably never be changed. But whilst the slaves remain on board of an American vessel, they are, in the contemplation of the law of nations, on American soil. Now, if his Lordship had stipulated that the British authorities should prevent the slaves on board of vessels driven into port by storms, or carried there by mutiny, from making their escape to the shore, there would have been some efficiency in the engagement. This would have been a stipulation to do a positive act, which would have retained and secured the slaves in the possession of their masters. But the engagements of Lord Ashburton are all merely negative. The British colonial governors are not themselves to be instrumental in releasing the slaves,—they shall not officially interfere with American vessels driven by accident and by violence into those ports,—they shall not make any further inquisition into the state of persons or things on board of vessels thus situated, than may be necessary to enforce the municipal laws. All is negative, and is intended merely to prevent the British authorities themselves from becoming actors in violating our rights! The people of any of these colonies, without violating his Lordship's engagement, may interfere to produce the escape of the slaves from any such vessels. That they will hereafter act in this manner, there can be no doubt, judging from their past conduct.

In justice to Mr. Webster, I must say that he has placed this whole subject in a most clear, forcible, and striking light. He has proved conclusively that we ask no engagement from the British Government but what they are clearly bound to perform, under the law of nations, without any treaty stipulation whatever. What I complain of is, that while he always demonstrates his propositions, they never produce any practical effect for our advantage. Lord Ashburton does not attempt to answer his arguments, because they are unanswerable; and yet, in general terms, his Lordship declares that some of them have rather surprised and startled him, though he will not pretend to judge them. His object was to transfer the negotiation concerning the Creole to London; and in this he has succeeded. Our object ought to have been to settle the question in Washington, and to connect together, in the same treaty, the Creole question with the Northeastern boundary. I most sincerely hope that I may be mistaken, but I now believe none of us will ever live to see the day when the Creole question will be settled on terms honorable and satisfactory to this country.

One remark I feel impelled to make—and that is, that this Senate deserves to be famous not only for passing abstract resolutions, but for our willingness to surrender them whenever we are called upon to carry them into effect. We have unanimously resolved and re-resolved in favor of our title to the disputed territory; and we have pursued a similar course in relation to the principles involved in the Creole question. I hope that we shall hereafter desist from such vain and idle proceedings.

On the 15th of April, 1840, we resolved, by a unanimous vote, that our ships on the high seas, in time of peace, were, according to the law of nations, under the exclusive jurisdiction of our country; and further, that, when forced by stress of weather, or other unavoidable cause, into the ports of a friendly power, they, with their cargoes, "and persons on board, with their property, and all the rights belonging to their personal relations, as established by the laws of the State to which they belong, would be placed under the protection which the laws of nations extend to the unfortunate under such circumstances." These propositions have been demonstrated by the Secretary of State. And yet, after our clear rights, under the law of nations, have been repeatedly outraged by the British authorities and people, all we have obtained for their security is a diplomatic note containing engagements which will have no practical effect whatever, and which may be recalled at pleasure by the British Government. So much for the case of the Creole.

I now approach the treaty itself, and shall first discuss the eighth article. It stipulates that each of the contracting parties shall maintain on the coast of Africa a naval force of not less than eighty guns, to enforce, separately, the laws of each country for the suppression of the slave-trade; "the said squadrons to be independent of each other, but the two Governments stipulating, nevertheless, to give such orders to their officers commanding their respective forces, as shall enable them to act most effectually in concert and co-operation, upon mutual consultation, as exigencies may arise, for the attainment of the true object of this article; copies of all such orders to be communicated by each Government to the other, respectively."

Now, sir, the first remark in regard to this most important article, which must strike every mind, is, that it has become a part of the treaty, without any correspondence whatever between the two plenipotentiaries in relation to the subject. We are left entirely in the dark as to the motives which influenced the negotiators in forming this article, except from the obscure hints which may be collected from the President's message which accompanied the treaty. And here I would remark, that this correspondence throughout presents a singular spectacle, which, I trust, may never be exhibited again in any important negotiation with a foreign power. Everything had been previously arranged in verbal conferences, without any note or memorandum of what had transpired at them, before the date of the letters communicated with the treaty; and these letters were evidently intended merely to present results in such a form as might best satisfy the people of both nations. The original pretensions on the one side or the other—the manner in which they were resisted—the means by which they were modified and received their present form—all, all are buried in oblivion, so far as this Government is concerned. The tracks of the negotiators were made upon the sand, and the returning tide has effaced them forever. Such is the case in relation to this Government; but not so, I shall venture to assert, in regard to England.

The first duty of every responsible minister engaged in the negotiation of an important treaty is, to communicate to his Government a faithful history in detail of all his official conferences. The British Government, beyond a doubt, have been accurately informed, from day to day, of the progress of this negotiation; and though the despatches of Lord Ashburton may not, for many years, see the light, yet they will be a great diplomatic curiosity whenever published. Instructed to settle all the questions in dispute between the two countries, the means will then appear by which he succeeded in baffling the American negotiator, and evading the settlement of any of these questions, except such as were for the advantage of his own country.

But, sir, I trust that no other American minister may ever follow the example of Mr. Webster in this particular. Such a mode of negotiation can only be tolerated between absolute sovereigns; but under a Government where every public agent is responsible to the people, either directly or indirectly, our most important affairs with foreign nations ought never to be concluded without a record of the conferences which led to the result. I myself negotiated an important treaty with Russia; and I felt it to be my imperative duty to write down, before I retired to rest, the substance of every conference with the Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs, and afterwards transmit it to my Government by the very first opportunity.

These observations, sir, will account for the remarkable fact, that, although Lord Ashburton arrived in Washington, and was presented to the President in the beginning of April, and his mission did not terminate until the 9th of August, yet the whole correspondence in relation to impressment, to the Caroline question, and to the Creole question, took place within the last week or ten days of its termination. All had been agreed upon beforehand in private conferences; and the correspondence was only making up the record for public view. What Mr. Webster originally proposed, what he insisted upon, and what he retracted, can now only be known to himself and to the British Government.

But, in regard to this eighth article of the treaty, we have not even any formal record made up, nor any explanation whatever. There it stands in the treaty; but how, or why it got there, we are left to conjecture. We bind ourselves to England that we shall maintain a naval force of eighty guns on the coast of Africa; whilst the condition of our treasury is so deplorable, that we have been compelled to reduce our small army, and leave our fellow-citizens beyond the Mississippi exposed to the attacks of the numerous savage tribes transported to that region by our own policy. Did the British Government demand this sacrifice at our hands? Was it necessary to appease the wounded pride of England at the disappointment she experienced when France—our ancient and faithful ally—refused to ratify the quintuple treaty, and identified herself with us in resisting the right of visitation and search? All is obscurity—all is darkness. We do not know, and we never shall know, what passed between the negotiators on this subject in their private conferences. Under a Government where every public minister is responsible, we find a most important article inserted in a treaty, and know not even by whom it was proposed.

Now, sir, in common with all America, I abhor the slave-trade. Our duty both to God and man requires that we should prevent it from being conducted under the American flag. For this purpose, we ought to send a naval force to the coast of Africa, whenever this may become necessary for its suppression. This course we have always hitherto pursued. But why should we yield up the exercise of our own free will, at the dictation of England? Why should we bind ourselves in bonds to her that we shall do our duty? The Father of his Country, while he advised us to cultivate peace and friendship with all nations, at the same time warned us against entangling alliances with any. We have hitherto acted upon this wise and salutary maxim; and the present is the first entangling alliance we have ever contracted with any nation, since the date of his solemn warning. Hereafter, whether it be convenient or inconvenient to us—whether it be necessary or not,—we have solemnly pledged ourselves to England, that, at all times, and under all circumstances, during the period of five years, we shall keep eighty guns afloat on the coast of Africa: and she, of all others, is the nation which will exact a strict performance of this pledge. There is no reciprocity, except in name, in this article of the treaty. The naval force of Great Britain is so large, that, without any engagement whatever, she would keep a greater number than eighty guns on the African coast. In the face of all these objections, and in this moment of our depressed finances, we agree to expend $700,000 per annum, to enable England to present to Christendom this new trophy which she has won in the cause of universal emancipation. I take my estimate of the expense from the Senators from Missouri and New Hampshire, [Messrs. BENTON and WOODBURY,] who state that the cost of each gun at sea (including ship-building and all) amounts to $9,000.

But, sir, much as I dislike this article in the aspect in which it has already been presented, I dislike it still more when viewed in another light. To me, it appears, under all the circumstances, to be the price paid to the British Government for a relinquishment of its claim, during the continuance of the treaty, to the right of visiting and searching American vessels on the coast of Africa. On this subject, we must grope our way in the dark—having no light to direct our steps, but what appears on the face of the article itself, and the intimations contained in the President's message.

We have the declaration of the President, "that the treaty obligations subsisting between the two countries for the suppression of the African slave-trade, and the complaints made to this Government within the last three or four years, (many of them but too well founded,) of the visitation, seizure, and detention of American vessels on that coast, by British cruisers, could not but form a delicate and highly important part of the negotiations which have now been held." We thus learn, from the highest authority, that the right of visitation and search on the African coast did form a delicate and highly important part of the negotiations. This was all conducted in private conferences; as nothing on the subject appears in the correspondence. Mr. Webster must unquestionably have complained to Lord Ashburton of the outrages committed upon our flag by British cruisers; and his Lordship most probably replied that these were necessary to suppress the slave-trade in American vessels. How was the question to be compromised? By a stipulation, on the part of the United States, that they would keep a sufficient force on the coast of Africa to visit and search their own vessels, thus rendering unnecessary their visitation and search by British cruisers. In this inference I am sustained by the language of the President. He says that "the examination or visitation of the merchant vessels of one nation, by the cruisers of another, for any purpose, except those known or acknowledged by the law of nations, under whatever restraints or regulations it may take place, may lead to dangerous results. It is far better, by other means, to supersede any supposed necessity, or any motive, for such examination or visit. Interferenee with a merchant vessel by an armed cruiser, is always a delicate proceeding, apt to touch the point of national honor, as well as to affect the interests of individuals. It has been thought, therefore, expedient, not only in accordance with the stipulations of the treaty of Ghent, but, at the same time, as removing all pretext, on the part of others, for violating the immunities of the American flag upon the seas, as they exist and are defined by the law of nations, to enter into the articles now submitted to the Senate." These articles, then, were entered into for the purpose of removing all pretexts, on the part of the British Government, for examining and searching our vessels on the coast of Africa. These articles are the price which we have agreed to pay for the privilege of not being searched by British cruisers. But the eighth article of the treaty may be annulled, at the pleasure of either Government, at the end of five years; and if it should be, what will then be our condition? All the arrogant and unjust pretensions of the British Government to visit and examine American vessels will then revive; because the treaty contains no renunciation whatever of these pretensions. The parties will then be remitted to the condition in which they were placed before it was concluded. Nay, more; the claim of Great Britain will be strengthened by the fact, that we have agreed to purchase a temporary exemption from its exercise, at the price of maintaining a squadron of eighty guns on the coast of Africa during a period of five years.

The President has referred to the stipulations contained in the treaty of Ghent as one reason for the adoption of this eighth article. The tenth article of that treaty declares as follows: "Whereas, the traffic in slaves is irreconcilable with the principles of humanity and justice, and whereas both his Majesty and the United States are desirous of continuing their efforts to promote its entire abolition, it is hereby agreed, that both the contracting parties shall use their best endeavors to accomplish so desirable an object."

The whole world knows how early, and with what persevering energy, the United States have exerted themselves to suppress this odious trade. They were the first, a few years after the treaty of Ghent, to denounce it as piracy under their laws; and other nations have followed their example. They have faithfully complied with the treaty of Ghent, in using their best endeavors for the suppression of this trade. But will any person pretend that the tenth article of this treaty imposes any obligation upon them to make a new and distinct treaty, abridging their liberty of thinking and acting for themselves in accomplishing this desirable object, and compelling them to maintain a squadron on the coast of Africa, to act in concert with a British squadron, for this purpose? Surely Lord Ashburton never set up any such pretension. The tenth article of the treaty of Ghent is complete in itself, and contemplated no new stipulation between the two Governments.

Senators say that the two squadrons are to act independently of each other; and no danger now exists that American vessels will be visited and examined by British cruisers. I trust that the facts may justify their prediction. But the treaty itself provides that the two Governments shall "give such orders to the officers commanding their respective forces, as shall enable them most effectually to act in concert and co-operation." The British squadron on the coast of Africa will necessarily be larger than the American; and it will be commanded by an admiral, or other officer of high rank. Although no direct orders may be issued from the British commander to an American officer; yet, when the two squadrons are bound to co-operate with each other, influence will, probably, be substituted for command. The American squadron will thus, in effect, become a mere subsidiary force to that of England. Upon a review of all the considerations involved in this subject, I feel deeply solicitous that the pending motion should prevail, to strike this eighth article from the treaty. There is not the least danger but that it will be ratified by England without this article. The honor of the nation requires that we should make this amendment. After all that has passed, we should stand upon that sacred principle of the law of nations, that the American flag—waving at the masthead of an American vessel, shall protect her from visitation and search by British cruisers. In what condition do we place France by yielding to the demands of England,—that France, whose people have been ever ready and ever willing to stand by us in the day and hour of danger? It is known to us all that England, by her persevering solicitations, had obtained from the Governments of France, Russia, Prussia, and Austria, a treaty yielding the right of search on the coast of Africa; and she expected to extort this concession from us, through the moral influence of these nations. The treaty had not yet been ratified by France, when our minister at Paris interposed. His powerful protest against it aroused the French people to a sense of their danger. They took the alarm, and, like their fathers in the Revolution, they united with us in asserting the independence of their flag and our flag. Such a storm of indignation was thus raised, that the French Government withheld its ratification from the quintuple treaty. And yet, after all this, we have deserted our ancient ally—we have framed a treaty with the British Government, by which they not only do not renounce the right of search, but have obtained from us an implied acknowledgment of the existence of such a right, by our engagement, in consideration of the temporary suspension of its exercise, to maintain a squadron of eighty guns on the coast of Africa for five years, to act in concert and co-operation with the British squadron. Surely, surely, the Senate will not ratify this article of the treaty. Surely, surely, the Senate will not ratify the unjust claim of the British Government to be the supreme protector of the rights of humanity, either on the ocean or on the land.

I have now reached the Northeastern boundary question; and I have, on former occasions, written and spoken so much in support of our title to the disputed territory, that I shall trouble the Senate with but a few observations on this branch of the subject. I entirely concur in the opinion formerly expressed by Mr. Webster, that the claim of the British Government "does not amount to the dignity of a debatable question." The Senate unanimously adopted a resolution on the 4th of July, 1838, reported by myself, as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, declaring, "That after a careful examination, and deliberate consideration of the whole controversy between the United States and Great Britain, relative to the Northeastern boundary of the former, the Senate does not entertain a doubt of the entire practicability of running and marking that boundary in strict conformity with the stipulations of the definitive treaty of peace of seventeen hundred and eighty-three; and entertains a perfect conviction of the justice and validity of the title of the United States to the full extent of all the territory in dispute between the two powers." The distinguished predecessor [Mr. CLAY] of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] then a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, cordially approved both of the report and of this resolution; and, upon his motion, the latter was considered and adopted on the anniversary of our independence. He said that there was a peculiar fitness in resolving to maintain the integrity and independence of the old thirteen United States on the anniversary of that memorable day on which our independence was declared. I can never, then, admit that our title to the disputed territory was even doubtful.

Dr. Franklin, and the other American commissioners who negotiated the definitive treaty of peace, in 1783, were wise and sagacious men. They knew that, in every delineation of boundary, it was all important clearly to fix the starting-point; and that all future disputes might be prevented," to use the language of the treaty, the northwest angle of Nova Scotia was established as the place of beginning. At the date of the treaty, this was a well-known point, at the intersection of the western line of the province of Nova Scotia with the southern line of the province of Quebec; and although these two lines had never been actually run and marked upon the ground, yet their position was so clearly described by royal proclamations, by acts of Parliament, and by the commissions granted to the Governors of Nova Scotia and Quebec, that our commissioners deemed it impossible that any serious difficulty could arise in discovering this angle. Nothing more was necessary than to follow upon the ground the due-north line, plainly marked upon Mitchell's map, from the source of the St. Croix to the line of highlands dividing "those rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence, from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean;" and at the intersection of these two lines, the northwest angle of Nova Scotia must be found with mathematical precision.

All admit that Mitchell's map, published in 1755, was the map used by the commissioners in designating the boundaries of the United States. Until the year 1763, the northwest angle of Nova Scotia was the point where the line marked upon that map, as the dividing line between Nova Scotia and New England, struck the river St. Lawrence. In February, 1763, Great Britain acquired Canada from France by treaty. Under the King's proclamation of October, 1763, which created the province of Quebec, and afterwards, by act of Parliament, in 1774, this province was extended south of the St. Lawrence, "by a line from the bay of Chaleurs, along the highlands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea, to a point in forty-five degrees of northern latitude, on the eastern bank of the river Connecticut." The bay of Chaleurs on the north, in latitude between 48 and 49, and a point on the Connecticut, in latitude 45, were to be the two extremities; and the intermediate southern line of the province of Quebec was to pass between these two points along the highlands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the St. Lawrence, on the one side, from those falling into the sea, upon the other. The definitive treaty of peace adopts the language of the act of Parliament of 1774, and describes the northwest angle of Nova Scotia to be "that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the source of St. Croix river to the highlands" "which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean." Now, sir, let any Senator cast his eyes upon Mitchell's map, and follow the well-marked due-north line from the source of the St. Croix; and he will find that it crosses the river St. John very little north of the 47th degree of latitude, and does not arrive at the highlands from which rivers empty themselves into the St. Lawrence, until north of the 48th degree of latitude. And yet, in the face of all these official documents of the very highest authority, I was astonished to find that Lord Ashburton, in his letter to Mr. Webster of the 21st June last, declared "his settled conviction that it was the intention of the parties to the treaty of peace of 1783, however imperfectly those intentions may have been executed, to leave to Great Britain, by their description of boundaries, the whole of the waters of the river St. John." In order to entertain this conviction, he must believe that the southern boundary of the province of Quebec, under the royal proclamation of 1763, and the act of Parliament of 1774, extended not merely to the dividing highlands whence streams flow into the St. Lawrence; but about a hundred miles south of these highlands, embracing a region of country watered by a large river, (the St. John,) and its numerous tributaries, which flow, not into the St. Lawrence, but into the sea. And Dr. Franklin and our other commissioners, with Mitchell's map before them, and the St. John with all its tributaries in full view, in the opinion of his Lordship, intended to bring the northwestern angle of Nova Scotia down to Mars Hill, one hundred miles south of those dividing highlands; from the opposite slopes of which, rivers flow on the one side into the St. Lawrence, and on the other into the ocean. With this map before them, they were wholly ignorant of the language which they had employed when clearly and distinctly fixing the northwest angle of Nova Scotia in this dividing range of highlands, and intended to fix it in highlands one hundred miles south, which divide not the sources of streams falling into the St. Lawrence and the Atlantic ocean, according to the description of the treaty, but the sources of streams falling into the St. John on the north, and the Penobscot on the south.

In opposition to this treaty line, so clearly defined by Dr. Franklin, and to make Dr. Franklin contradict himself, the copy of an old French map by D'Anville has been produced, the original of which was recently found by Mr. Sparks in the office of Foreign Affairs at Paris, among 60,000 other maps. It is dated in 1746; and upon its face there is a line traced, in red ink, running along the highlands which divide the head waters of the Penobscot and Kennebec on the south, from the tributaries of the St. John on the north. Much importance seems to have been attached to this map by the Secretary of State. It was communicated to the Committee on Foreign Relations in great confidence, and with an air of solemn mystery; and serious apprehensions were expressed lest Lord Ashburton might obtain information of the existence of so precious a document. The dreaded inference was, that this must be the very map which had been marked by Dr. Franklin for Count Vergennes, at his request; and that the red lines upon it were the boundary lines of the United States, according to the treaty, traced by the hand of its chief negotiator. In plain English, that, notwithstanding Dr. Franklin had signed the provisional treaty on the 30th day of November, 1782, defining the northeastern boundary of the United States to be a line drawn due north from the source of St. Croix river to the highlands, and thence along the highlands dividing the rivers which flow into the St. Lawrence from those which empty themselves into the Atlantic; yet that, only six short days thereafter, he had marked this very treaty line upon a map for Count Vergennes, as a line not running north at all from the source of the St. Croix, but running west; and not separating the head-waters of the tributaries of the St. Lawrence from the rivers which fall into the Atlantic ocean, but dividing the tributaries of the St. John from the head-waters of the Kennebec and the Penobscot. To credit this, we must believe either that the Doctor had a very short memory, or that he did not understand the plainest provisions of the treaty to which he had just become a party. Neither the one supposition nor the other can be tolerated for a moment. Those who attach such importance to this map, surely could not have been aware of the fact, that, previous to the year 1763, when Canada was ceded by France to England, all the French maps that were published had the dividing line between the possessions of France and England marked in this very manner. By this line France claimed against England prior to the year 1763; and it would have been "passing strange" if this old map of 1746—bearing date thirty-six years before the existence of our provisional treaty with England—should not have been thus marked. The wonder would have been to have found any map of that date in the French Foreign Office marked in any other manner.

The logic by which Dr. Franklin would be made to stultify himself is, that he certainly did mark some map for Count Vergennes with the lines of the provisional treaty; but what has become of this map, no man living can tell. An old French map of 1746, however, has been found by Mr. Sparks, among sixty thousand other maps, marked as all French maps were previous to 1763. Therefore, this must be the very map which Dr. Franklin sent to Count Vergennes sixty years ago. Quod erat demonstrandum. Such an assumption is too absurd to be assailed by serious argument.

Lord Ashburton, in his first letter to Mr. Webster, of the 13th June, appears peculiarly solicitous to free his Government from the imputation of having urged a claim which they knew to be unfounded. In order to accomplish this purpose, he attempts to prove that the claim had been asserted previously to the treaty of Ghent. Now, sir, this I utterly deny. No question was ever made, until after that treaty, but that our line extended north of the St. John. On the contrary, this fact was clearly admitted in 1797, by agents of high character, acting under the express authority of the British Government. Ward Chipman, esq., the agent of that Government, under Jay's treaty, for determining the true source of the St. Croix, expressly admits the fact. In his argument, he says that "this north line must of necessity cross the river St. John." Nay, more: he insists that, "if a north line is to be traced from the source of the Cheputnatecook, (which was eventually established as the point of beginning,) it will not only cross the river St. John, within about fifty miles from Fredericton, the metropolis of New Brunswick, but will cut off the sources of the rivers which fall into the Bay of Chaleurs, if not of many others—probably the Merramichi among them—which fall into the Gulf of St. Lawrence." Robert Liston, esq., then his Britannic Majesty's minister to the United States, in his correspondence with Mr. Chipman—and this, but fourteen years after the date of the definitive treaty—clearly admits that this north line would cross the St. John. And yet Lord Ashburton, at this late day, is firmly convinced, not only that it would not cross the St. John, but that it would stop short at Mars Hill, and turn to the west some forty or fifty miles south of that river.

Previously to the treaty of Ghent, in 1814, the British Government had discovered the vast importance of obtaining a cession of that portion of our territory in the northern part of Maine, through which the direct communication lies between their provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and the city of Quebec. The British commissioners, at the first, did not insinuate that they had any right, under the treaty, to this northern angle of Maine; but merely proposed "such a variation of the line of frontier as might secure a direct communication between Quebec and Halifax:" and for this cession they were willing to yield an equivalent, "either in frontier or otherwise." It was not until after the American commissioners had declared "they had no authority to cede any part of the territory of the United States," that the British commissioners insinuated (rather than asserted) the first doubt in regard to our title. This faint pretension was ably and promptly repelled by the American commissioners: and the correspondence on this subject ended with a note from the British commissioners, in which they declare that "the British Government never required that all that portion of the State of Massachusetts (now Maine) intervening between the province of New Brunswick and Quebec should be ceded to Great Britain; but only that small portion of unsettled country which interrupts the communication between Quebec and Halifax—there being much doubt whether it does not already belong to Great Britain." Great Britain would then, sir, you perceive, have gladly accepted this small portion of the disputed territory by cession, and granted an equivalent therefor, either in frontier or otherwise. What has she now obtained under the present treaty? Not merely the small intervening territory necessary to connect her two provinces—which was all she desired in 1814—but all the territory of Maine north of the St. John and the St. Francis, containing 2,636,160 acres, or 4,119 square miles; and, in addition thereto, a strip of territory south of the St. Francis, 110 miles in length, along the highland frontier of that State, containing 571,520 acres, or 893 square miles. No man can even set up the pretence that this strip of territory is in any manner necessary to secure a direct communication between Quebec and Halifax. It has been wrested from us for a far different purpose. Instead of yielding us any equivalent for this cession, either in land or in money, as Great Britain was anxious to do at Ghent, we ourselves have agreed to purchase it from Maine and Massachusetts, at a stipulated sum, in order that we may cede it, without money and without price, to satisfy the arrogant pretensions of this domineering nation. The King of the Netherlands, although much under the influence of England at the time he made his award, never thought of giving her more of our territory than she claimed to be necessary for a free and direct communication between her provinces. It was reserved for an American Secretary of State to surrender this territory—and that, too, the highland boundary which secured Maine against the assaults of Great Britain—of eight hundred and ninety-three square miles, in order to satisfy her rapacity. The Dutch King had never dreamed of imposing on us any such humiliating terms.

But I am in advance of my subject, and must return. Lord Ashburton, intent upon proving (as well he might be, for the honor of his country) that the British claim was not a mere unfounded pretence to extort territory from a neighboring nation, refers to the instructions of Mr. Madison to Mr. King, in 1802, and the message of Mr. Jefferson to Congress, in 1803, for the purpose of showing that the treaty highlands, at the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, could not be found upon the ground. Recent surveys have clearly established that these distinguished men were both mistaken in this particular. But no matter. Has Mr. Madison or Mr. Jefferson ever admitted, if an actual mountain ridge could not be found upon the ground, that our north line from the monument should stop short south of the St. John, and should not be extended as far north as the region where the sources of those rivers "that empty themselves into the St. Lawrence" interlock with the sources of those "which fall into the Atlantic ocean?" This will not be pretended. The fact is directly opposite; because Mr. Madison, in these very instructions to Mr. King to which his Lordship refers, declares distinctly, upon the presumption that a mountainous ridge could not be found upon the ground, that "due regard ought to be had to the general idea that the line ought to terminate on the elevated ground dividing the rivers falling into the Atlantic from those emptying themselves into the St. Lawrence." If no actual highlands could have been found, it would nevertheless remain a geographical fact not to be contested, that there exists a range of country dividing the streams which flow on the one side into the St. Lawrence, from those which flow, on the other side, into the Atlantic ocean. It was here, then, that, under the treaty, the northwest angle of Nova Scotia was to be found, and not in a range of highlands far to the south of the St. John, and far to the south of the sources of the streams which fall into the St. Lawrence. Accordingly, we find that in the second article of the treaty concluded at London, on the 12th May, 1803, between Mr. King and Lord Hawkesbury, the commissioners appointed under its authority were directed "to cause the said boundary line between the source of the river St. Croix, as the same has been determined by the commissioners appointed for that purpose, and the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, to be run and marked, according to the provisions of the treaty aforesaid" [of 1783.] You will observe, sir, that this treaty was negotiated under the very instructions from Mr. Madison to Mr. King, on which Lord Ashburton relies to defend his Government against the imputation that their claim to the disputed territory was not a mere unfounded pretence. The negotiators of this treaty of 1803, from its very terms, could have entertained no doubt but that the line between the monument and the northwest angle of Nova Scotia could be run and marked, according to the definitive treaty of peace. It is true that the treaty of 1803 was never ratified; but no objection was ever made by either party to the article containing this stipulation.

The truth is, that the present British claim was all an afterthought. It owes its origin entirely to the discovery that it was necessary, by some pretence or other, to wrest from us the territory which, if in our possession, might interrupt the communication between Nova Scotia and Quebec. They then contended that no actual highlands could be found upon the ground, such as those described by the treaty. They placed particular emphasis on the word "highlands;" and insisted that, if a mountain range could not be found, the treaty was absolutely void, for uncertainty. But, when "highlands" are spoken of as dividing waters flowing in opposite directions, is not the meaning of the term perfectly palpable? From the very laws of nature, such highlands must exist and slope off in opposite directions. Whether they consist of table-land, or even swamp, or shoot up into mountain ridges, still, if there be a height of land from which streams flow down in opposite directions, this most clearly answers the description of the treaty. It is not the elevation of these highlands, but their capacity to divide waters, which stamps upon them their character.

After the British Government had thus summarily annihilated the "highlands" of the treaty, they had still to perform other wonders. Even if this part of the description were gone, enough would still remain clearly to identify the treaty line—as Mitchell's map, and all other maps, plainly show a range of country separating "those rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean." What task, then, had they next to perform? After sinking the highlands, they contended, with all imaginable gravity, that no rivers existed in that region which fell into the Atlantic. And why? The St. John (say they) is not a river falling into the Atlantic ocean, because it has its mouth in the Bay of Fundy; neither is the Ristigouche, because it has its mouth in the Bay of Chaleurs. And what is this Bay of Fundy itself, but a part of the Atlantic ocean? A bay is a mere opening of the main ocean into the land; and you might, with the same justice, contend that the Bay of Naples is not a portion of the Mediterranean, as that the Bay of Fundy is not a portion of the Atlantic ocean. What absolute trifling it is to contend that a river does not fall into the Atlantic, because, in reaching the main ocean, it may pass through a bay. The Delaware does not fall into the Atlantic, because it flows into it through the Bay of Delaware; and, for the same reason, the St. John does not fall into the Atlantic, because it flows into it through the Bay of Fundy! By the same process of reasoning, there is not a single river in the State of Maine which falls into the Atlantic ocean. They all have their mouths in different bays. Truly, the British claim does not rise to the dignity of a debatable question. It is not even a decent pretence.

But even after the British Government had thus annihilated the treaty highlands, and proved that the St. John, whose northern tributary streams rise in these highlands, did not fall into the Atlantic, there was another description still left of the treaty boundary, against which they have never been able to utter a word. It is a settled common-sense rule of construction, that if any portion of a description of boundary fail, yet if enough remains clearly to manifest the intention of the contracting parties, this is sufficient. Now, the British Government have never pretended that rivers do not exist which empty themselves into the St. Lawrence exactly in accordance with the description of the treaty. On Mitchell's map, you perceive the river St. Lawrence running from the southwest to the northeast; whilst numerous tributaries rising to the south of it, and passing north through its valley, empty themselves into the main stream. This portion of the description remains, and would be just as conclusive in favor of our right as though the treaty had referred to nothing else. The bad does not and cannot vitiate the good.

I have said much more on this branch of the subject than I had intended, not for the purpose of establishing our right, but to show that the miserable pretexts to which the British Government have been compelled to resort in order to obtain our territory, are unworthy of a great nation, and that Lord Ashburton can never free them from the imputation of demanding that to which they must have known they had no right.

Let me now present a sketch of the history of this negotiation between Mr. Webster and Lord Ashburton, in relation to the Maine boundary, in a plain and distinct form, before the Senate. The first fact which strikes the mind with astonishment is, that Mr. Webster should have agreed, in their preliminary conferences, to waive all discussion "on the general grounds on which each party considers their claims respectively to rest," as not calculated to lead to any practical result. This appears conclusively from the very first paragraph of the first letter addressed by Lord Ashburton to Mr. Webster, on the 13th June, 1842, and his answer of the 8th July.

I may be asked what course Mr. Webster, in my opinion, ought to have pursued. I answer, he ought to have invariably insisted on our right to the disputed territory; but, at the same time, to have expressed his willingness, for the sake of good neighborhood, and in consideration of a fair equivalent in territory, to have yielded this right so far as to grant to Great Britain what her commissioners had so earnestly desired at Ghent—"such a variation of the line of frontier as might secure a direct communication between Quebec and Halifax." Nature herself seems to have pointed out these mutual equivalents. Whoever will cast his eye over the map of Maine and New Brunswick, must be forcibly struck with this truth. If the right of way over our territory between Halifax and Quebec had been alone solicited, it ought to have been conceded to Great Britain in exchange for the right to navigate the St. John. But, as the British Government earnestly desired to possess the right of sovereignty in the soil over which this way passed, the northern triangle of Maine ought to have been surrendered for the much smaller triangle belonging to the province of New Brunswick, west of the St. John. This would have established a river boundary between the two countries, from the point where the due-north line from the monument strikes Eel river, all the distance round by Eel river, the St. John, and the St. Francis, to the western highland boundary of the treaty. But what is our present condition, under this treaty? We have ceded to Great Britain all the territory she desired; and yet we have not obtained this narrow strip of territory west of the St. John She still retains it: and there an organized system of smuggling can be established; and from thence, in case of war, her troops can be poured into the very heart of the State of Maine. To preserve peace and good neighborhood between independent nations, a river or a mountain boundary has always been deemed of essential importance. And yet, strange as it may seem, we have never insisted upon this river boundary, on the east of Maine, which Nature herself seems to have established; whilst we have actually surrendered into the keeping of Great Britain the whole of our western mountain boundary.

Lord Ashburton having obtained from Mr. Webster the important concession that the right of the United States to the disputed territory should no longer be a subject of discussion, the next concession which this shrewd practical diplomatist desired to obtain seemed to follow as an almost necessary consequence. For years the British Government have contended that the whole territory of Maine north of these pretended highlands, which take a westerly direction from Mars Hill, was in dispute; and that it was impossible to ascertain the rights of the respective parties, according to the treaty. Assuming these facts, they had, over and over again, proposed to divide the disputed territory between the two countries, without granting any equivalent to us beyond its limits. When the American negotiator, therefore, in the very beginning, admitted that it would be vain for us to insist upon our rights under the treaty, it seemed to follow, as a necessary consequence, that the disputed territory must be divided between the parties, according to the suggestion of the British Government. But this was far from the opinion of the Legislature of Maine. Indeed, it does not even seem to have originally been the intention of Lord Ashburton himself to make any such extravagant demand. The Secretary of State, in his letter to Gov. Fairfield, dated 11th April, 1842, informs him that his Lordship had "officially announced to this department, that, in regard to the boundary question, he has authority to treat for a conventional line, or line by agreement, on such terms and conditions, and with such mutual considerations and equivalents as may be thought just and equitable." I would ask every Senator of this body, if, when he first read this letter of Mr. Webster, it entered into his imagination to conceive that Lord Ashburton, by these expressions, meant no more than a division of the disputed territory between the parties. Had he thus expressed himself, in distinct terms—my life upon it, Maine never would have appointed commissioners. But Maine did not leave this question in doubt. Her Legislature, on the 20th May, 1842, at the time when her commissioners were chosen, resolved, "That this State cannot regard the relinquishment, by the British Government, of any claim heretofore advanced by it to the territory included within the limits of the line of this State, as designated by the treaty of 783, and uniformly claimed by Maine, as a consideration or equivalent within the meaning of these resolutions."

It is a most curious point of diplomatic history, how, in the very face of this resolution of instructions, the Maine commissioners were led on, step by step, to give their assent to the present treaty. It will be well worth while to spend a few moments in tracing this strange history.

The commissioners of Maine had their first audience with Mr. Webster on Monday, 13th of June. On the 17th June, Mr. Webster informed Lord Ashburton that he was prepared to commence the negotiation. On the 18th June, they held their first conference; but what transpired at this conference is buried in oblivion. No record of it will ever meet the public eye. If Mr. Webster had evinced half as much skill in managing Lord Ashburton as he displayed in managing the commissioners of Maine, that State would have acquired the strip of territory on the right bank of the St. John, which she so much desired to possess.

The result of this conference was the letter of Lord Ashburton to Mr. Webster of the 21st of June. This letter, although conciliatory in its terms, is one of bold and barefaced pretension. It asserts the principle (which both the State of Maine and the General Government had so long resisted) that there must be a division of the disputed territory between the two countries, without any other equivalent to us; and it not only demands for Great Britain all the disputed territory north of the St. John and the St. Francis, but also the whole of the Madawaska settlement south of the St. John. Nay, more: his Lordship asserts a claim, of which we never had before heard, to the whole territory south of the St. Francis and west of the St. John, down to some one of its sources" in the highlands—thus intending to deprive Maine not only of her western highland boundary, but of the whole valley between that boundary and the river St. John. He seems to have well understood the policy of asking much more than he would be willing to accept. In making this demand, his Lordship resorts to the common diplomatic finesse, that he could not, in any case, abandon the obvious interests of the Madawaska settlement south of the St. John; and, to give this and other declarations the greater effect, he solemnly declares: "I have not treated the subject in the ordinary form of a bargain, where the party making the proposal leaves himself something to give up. The case would not admit of this, even if I could bring myself so to act." And yet the case did admit of this; and his Lordship did bring himself very quietly so to act, within a few days, and as soon as he discovered that the Maine commissioners had resisted this claim to the Madawaska settlement with becoming spirit; his pretended instructions to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. Webster refers this letter of Lord Ashburton to the commissioners of Maine, and reserves to himself the part of mediator between them and Lord Ashburton. In their note to him of the 29th June, they declare (page 56) that they can never surrender the Madawaska settlement south of the St. John; "and that, if the adoption of such a line as a sine qua non on the part of the British Government, the commissioners on the part of the State of Maine feel it their duty as distinctly to say, that any attempt at an amicable adjustment of the controversy respecting the Northeastern boundary on that basis, with the consent of Maine, would be entirely fruitless."

The Maine commissioners then proceed to offer to Mr. Webster a counter projet, and to propose a conventional line. And here permit me to observe, that it is a most astonishing fact, that these commissioners never even asked for a cession of the narrow triangular strip of land west of the St. John. I venture to say that no American statesman, who has ever examined the subject of a conventional line, has entertained any other idea than that this strip of land ought to be the equivalent for the tract of country north of the St. John and St. Francis. If a bare right of way was to be surrendered to England over the disputed territory, the navigation of the St. John would be the natural equivalent; but if, in addition to this, the British Government asked a cession of the sovereignty and soil of the territory north of the St. John, then the equally fair equivalent was a surrender by them to Maine of the strip of land north of Eel river, on the right bank of the St. John—thus establishing a river boundary between Maine and New Brunswick. This impression has been deeply fixed upon my mind for years. I have talked of it a hundred times, and every person with whom I have conversed has been under the same impression. This was the "general and confident expectation of the people of Maine," as we are informed by her commissioners. With a view to this, the Legislature of that State had solemnly resolved that no relinquishment of territory on the part of the British Government, within what it chose to denominate the disputed territory, should ever be considered by Maine as an equivalent for the surrender of any portion of that territory to Great Britain.

This resolution, it is well known, pointed clearly and distinctly to the acquisition of the strip west of the St. John. And yet the Maine commissioners, in their counter-projet, not only did not demand this territory, but they expressly surrendered all claim to it. And why? Because, to use their own language, "they have been assured that Lord Ashburton is restrained, by his instructions, from yielding the island of Grand Menan, or any of the islands in Passamaquoddy bay, or even any portion of the narrow strip of territory which lies between the due north line from the source of the St. Croix and the St. John river, above Eel river, (so called,) as an equivalent for any portion of the territory claimed by Maine as within her boundaries." By whom had they been thus assured? Unquestionably by Mr. Webster. By whom had they been prevailed upon to surrender the claim of their State to this strip of territory? Certainly by Mr. Webster, upon the assurance that Lord Ashburton was restrained, by his instructions, from yielding it. This was the fatal point of the negotiation for the State of Maine. It was here that the rights of that State, and of the United States, were abandoned. This territory ought to have been resolutely demanded as an equivalent for the darling object which Great Britain had for so many years eagerly pursued—that of acquiring the territory over which lay the communication between New Brunswick and Quebec. If Lord Ashburton's instructions prohibited him from surrendering this strip of territory, new instructions could and would have been obtained, had they been found necessary. If this had not been the case, I would have referred the question to another arbitrator, (an alternative to which Lord Ashburton often alludes,) or have hazarded any other consequences, rather than have tamely yielded the principle against which we had so long contended—that our right to the disputed territory was doubtful; and, therefore, because it was so, that a division of it ought to be made between the two nations. But his Lordship (according to his own declaration) never could have surrendered the Madawaska territory south of the St. John; and yet he did agree to surrender it, before it was possible for him to have obtained new instructions from England. Had the Maine commissioners insisted upon this tract of country with the same manly firmness as they had done upon retaining the Madawaska settlement south of the St. John, in all human probability it would have been attended with a similar result. His Lordship's alleged instructions would have yielded to circumstances, as they had done before; and this negotiation might have closed with honor to the country. The moment that the Maine commissioners were prevailed upon to yield this point without a struggle, all was lost. Every principle for which we had so long contended was at once abandoned; and nothing more remained than to decide how much of the territory of Maine should be conceded to the demands of Great Britain. The Maine commissioners seem themselves to have been deeply sensible of this degrading truth. They declare that, as they can obtain no equivalent beyond the disputed territory, "they feel themselves constrained to say that the portion of territory within the limits of Maine, as claimed by her, which they are prepared, in a spirit of peace and good neighborhood, to yield for the accommodation of Great Britain, must be restrained and confined to such portion only, and in such reasonable extent, as is necessary to secure to Great Britain 'an unobstructed communication and connexion of her colonies with each other.'"

They then proposed to yield to Great Britain all that had been awarded to her by the King of the Netherlands, (whose award the Senate had so promptly rejected, but which had been so eagerly accepted by the British King,) with the exception of a small portion of the territory north of the St. Francis. This proposition gave to England all the territory that was necessary to secure the communication between her provinces; but whilst doing this, it would, to a partial extent, have saved our Government from the disgrace of having, for so many years, warred against the award of the King of the Netherlands, and afterwards accepted worse terms than it proposed.

Mr. Webster, on the 7th of July, transmits this letter of the commissioners of Maine to Lord Ashburton, accompanied by a long diplomatic note. In this note he expressly recognises that his Lordship is not at liberty "to cede the whole or a part of the territory, commonly called the strip, lying east of the north line, and west of the St. John." How had Mr. Webster acquired a knowledge of this most important fact? It must have been in their verbal conferences; for Lord Ashburton had not previously committed himself by any such declaration in any portion of his correspondence. In it he has nowhere stated that his instructions forbade him to make such a surrender.

It is also worthy of remark, that whilst Mr. Webster, with the strange inconsistency between his arguments and his actions which characterizes this negotiation, is communicating to Lord Ashburton a proposition to surrender to him all that portion of the disputed territory for which England had originally contended, and although he had thus rendered it impossible that any discussion of our title could benefit his country, yet he does, notwithstanding, demonstrate the right of the State of Maine to all this territory, with irresistible clearness and power. He is equally triumphant on this question, as on the Creole and Caroline questions or in resisting the doctrine of impressment; but, unfortunately, his arguments have fallen to the ground, without producing any beneficial result.

Lord Ashburton, with that skill and address which have characterized him throughout the whole negotiation, now eagerly seized the advantage which he had obtained over Mr. Webster and the Maine commissioners. They had fatally, in advance, bound themselves to grant all that England originally sought or desired. To this extent they stood committed; and his object now was to obtain, in addition, a cession of the western highland boundary of Maine, for the purpose of covering Quebec, and of assailing us with tremendous advantage in the event of war between the two countries. He now departs from the moderate and conciliatory tone which he had assumed everywhere else throughout the negotiation. In his letter to Mr. Webster of the 11th July, he scouts the proposition of the commissioners of Maine; indeed, he treats it almost as if it were an insult. He feels himself "quite at a loss" to account for such a proposal, and he appeals to the candid judgment of Mr. Webster to say "whether this is a proposition for conciliation." He says that he need not examine the line proposed by the Maine commissioners in its precise details, because he is obliged to state frankly that it is inadmissible.

But with all this affected indignation and astonishment, he is very careful not to break off the negotiation. He was too wise and too wary thus to endanger the advantage he had obtained. He therefore suggests to Mr. Webster that the negotiation "would have a better chance of success by conference than by correspondence." He trusts more in the diplomacy of the secret conclave, where there was no ear to hear and no pen to record their conferences, than in the bold, open, manly mode in which a negotiation ought to be conducted between the responsible ministers of responsible Governments.

In this letter of the 11th July, his Lordship insists upon our surrender of the district between the St. John and the highlands west of that river, and, without disguise, declares that he wants it "for no other purpose than as a boundary." This, permit me to say, is the very reason why it should never have been yielded. These highlands were our natural boundary, as well as our treaty boundary; and we ought never to have surrendered them into the hands of the only formidable enemy we can ever have on this continent.

The prediction of his Lordship, that there would be a better chance of success by conference than by correspondence, was very soon verified. In four short days, these personal conferences produced a wonderful effect. On the 15th July, 1842, Mr. Webster proposes to the commissioners of Maine and Massachusetts the lines of the present treaty; urges them in the strongest terms to surrender the western highland boundary of Maine to England; proposes to pay them out of the treasury of the United States the sum of $250,000, as an equivalent for the surrender of this territory of 893 square miles; promises to refund the expenses which they had incurred for the civil posse they had maintained, and the survey they had made; and concludes with the expression of his "conviction that no more advantageous arrangement could be made."

Let us here pause for a moment upon the astonishing fact, that this proposition made to the Maine commissioners proceeded not from Lord Ashburton, but from Mr. Webster; not from the British envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, but from our own Secretary of State. It was a proposition previously concocted between the negotiators, and its acceptance urged upon the Maine commissioners as the British ultimatum, by the very man to whom the President had intrusted the rights and the honor of his country.

We now first hear from the Massachusetts commissioners; and their letter is truly characteristic. That State had no direct interest in the question of territorial sovereignty over the disputed territory; but merely in the right of soil. They accordingly treat it as a question not of national honor, but of dollars and cents. They say to Mr. Webster, in their letter of the 20th July: "Whether the national boundary suggested by you be suitable or unsuitable; whether the compensations that Great Britain offers to the United States for the territory conceded to her be adequate or inadequate; and whether the treaty which shall be effected shall be honorable to the country, or incompatible with its rights and dignity, are questions not for Massachusetts, but for the General Government, upon its responsibility to the whole country, to decide." They thus waive the question of national honor; but not so the question of dollars and cents. They higgle about the price to be paid for their land. They demand $25,000 more than Mr. Webster had offered. This seems to have been their sine qua non; and if the sum to be given them "shall be increased to the sum of $150,000, [instead of $125,000.] the State of Massachusetts, through her commissioners, hereby relinquishes to the United States her interest in the lands which will be excluded from the dominion of the United States by the establishment of the boundary aforesaid." It is needless to say that Mr. Webster would not stand long for $25,000, in such a bargain, especially when the money was to be paid out of the treasury of the United States.

The Maine commissioners seemed then to be abandoned by the whole world, and their position became truly embarrassing. This proposition was urged upon them, not by Lord Ashburton, but by their own Secretary of State, with the approbation of their own National Administration. That man of gigantic intellect, whose great powers ought to have been taxed to the utmost to save Maine from dismemberment, was the very man who urged them to consent to the dismemberment. They were deserted, at the most critical moment, by the commissioners of Massachusetts, who had assented to the proposition of Mr. Webster. They were induced to believe that the question of peace or war was suspended on their decision. It was proclaimed in the streets of Washington that the obstinacy of the Maine commissioners alone prevented the settlement of all our questions in dispute with England. I was myself induced to give credit to this rumor; and when I was confidentially informed, by a Senator now on this floor, of the true nature of the case, my astonishment and mortification knew no bounds.

Under these circumstances, a most reluctant conditional assent to the proposition of Mr. Webster was extorted from the Maine commissioners. It is due to them that I should read to the Senate the terms in which it is given. Their letter to Mr. Webster bears date 22d July, 1842, and concludes with the following paragraphs:

"We are now given to understand that the Executive of the United States, representing the sovereignty of the Union, assents to the proposal; and that this department of the Government at least is anxious for its acceptance, as, in its view, most expedient for the general good.

"The commissioners of Massachusetts have already given their assent on behalf of that Commonwealth. Thus situated, the commissioners of Maine, invoking the spirit of attachment and patriotic devotion of their State to the Union, and being willing to yield to the deliberate convictions of her sister States as to the path of duty, and to interpose no obstacles to an adjustment which the general judgment of the nation shall pronounce as honorable and expedient, even if that judgment shall lead to a surrender of a portion of the birthright of the people of their State, and prized by them because it is their birthright, have determined to overcome their objections to the proposal, so far as to say, that if, upon mature consideration, the Senate of the United States shall advise and consent to the ratification of a treaty, corresponding in its terms to your proposal, and with the conditions in our memorandum accompanying this note, (marked A,) and identified by our signatures, they, by virtue of the power vested in them by the resolves of the Legislature of Maine, give the assent of that State to such conventional line, with the terms, conditions, and equivalents herein mentioned."

This conditional assent casts the responsibility of the treaty upon the Senate of the United States. It is for us to pronounce, in the language of the Maine commissioners, whether this treaty is honorable and expedient, and such a one as the general judgment of the nation will approve. We must encounter this responsibility, whether we will or not.

It would be a waste of time to pursue the subject further, in detail. Mr. Webster, on the 27th July, in form, made the proposition to Lord Ashburton, which had, in substance, been previously agreed upon between them, in personal conference, before it was presented to the Maine commissioners; and which he, therefore, knew would be accepted: and the treaty was concluded accordingly.

Thus have we yielded to a foreign power that ancient highland boundary for which our fathers fought. Thus has it been blotted out from the treaty which acknowledged our independence. Thus has England reclaimed an important portion of that territory, which had been wrested from her by the bravery and the blood of our revolutionary fathers. We have restored to her not only all the land north of the St. John and the St. Francis, but also our mountain boundary south of these rivers, down to the Metjarmette portage. Along the base of these mountains she can, and she will, establish fortifications and military posts, from which she may at once penetrate into the very heart of Maine. It is a vain labor for the Secretary to prove that the territory ceded is unfit for cultivation. England did not demand it for its agricultural value. Why did Lord Ashburton insist upon its surrender with so much pertinacity and zeal? Because it not only covered Quebec and Lower Canada from our assaults, but exposed our territory to the assaults of England, without any interposing natural barrier. On the east, on the north, and on the west, Maine is now left naked and exposed to the attacks of our domineering and insatiable neighbor; and we have bestowed upon her all this territory, without having asked her to grant us even the small strip north of Eel river, on the right bank of the St. John, which would have given us, to that extent, a river boundary. These highlands, throughout their whole range, from the northwest head of the Connecticut river to the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, which divide the rivers flowing into the St. Lawrence from those which empty themselves into the Atlantic ocean, will exclusively belong to England, should this treaty be ratified by the Senate. The Alpine boundary (which Adams and Franklin and Jay had secured to their country by the treaty of Independence) has been extorted from us by our most formidable enemy. We have acted as the Roman Republic would have done, had she surrendered the Alps to the hostile nations of Gaul and Germany, and thus opened the way for the invasion of Italy. And this suicidal policy has been adopted, upon the principle, or the pretext, that our Alpine barrier and boundary were not fit for cultivation! This is the argument of Mr. Webster.

The ancient Romans worshipped a god called Terminus. He was the guardian of the boundaries of the Republic; and such was his power, that he would not yield even to Jupiter himself. Upon this principle, it was a sacred maxim both of their religion and their policy, that their boundaries should never recede. The Republic was more than once driven to the last extremities. Her capital was sacked, and ruin seemed more than once to be her inevitable destiny; but, in the midst of desolation and defeat, no Roman Senator ever dared to propose the smallest cession of her sacred soil. The boundaries of the Roman Republic never receded; and we ought to have imitated her policy in this respect, however much we may condemn her love of conquest—unless, indeed, we had obtained an equivalent cession of territory. The demand to surrender the highlands which protected our frontier south of the St. Francis, ought to have been met by an instant and absolute refusal, no matter what might have been the consequence. Instead of buying them from Maine and Massachusetts, in order that we might surrender them to England, we ought at once to have announced that we never could permit such a surrender to become the subject of negotiation.

It has been said (and probably with truth) that, in case we should ever determine to invade Canada, we would not march over these highlands. But this is not the question. Let us reverse the case, and suppose that England should determine to invade us from Canada: would she not gradually collect and concentrate her forces on the territory which we have yielded to her east of these highlands, and from thence pour her forces into Maine without obstruction? And it must have been chiefly to obtain this very advantage, that Lord Ashburton was so anxious to acquire this territory, which, forsooth, we are told is not fit for cultivation. The only crop which she desires to raise upon it, like that of Cadmus, is a crop of armed men.

And yet, to excuse this surrender, we are presented with the pretence of having obtained equivalents in lands better fitted for cultivation. What are these pretended equivalents? In describing them, I cannot do better than to adopt the language of the commissioners of Maine. "In New Hampshire (say they) Lord Ashburton consents to take the true northwest source of Connecticut river, instead of the northeast source." That is, in other words, he consents to abide by the clear language of the treaty of Independence, instead of persisting in the demand of England to substitute the northeast for "the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river." "In Vermont, he will abide by the old line which was run, marked, and solemnly established nearly seventy years ago. In New York he will abide by the same old line, the effect of rectifying it being merely to give to New York a small angular strip on the west, and Great Britain a small angular strip on the east." "These small tracts and parings" (to use the language of the commissioners) are to be the equivalents for surrendering our mountain boundary into the keeping of Great Britain, without any estimate of the value of the strip which we have surrendered to her of our undisputed territory, along the line running due north from the monument. He has thus most graciously consented not to take advantage of the very trifling mistake committed by the British Government itself, more than 70 years ago, in running and marking the 45th parallel of latitude, and under which we have held possession ever since we were an independent nation.

I shall not speak of the equivalents which the Secretary claims to have obtained in the Northwest. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] has already placed this part of the subject in so clear a light, that it would be a waste of time again to present it to the Senate. He has demonstrated that, instead of acquiring any territory in that quarter to which we were not clearly entitled under the treaty of 1783, we have actually sacrificed important territorial rights which we held under that treaty.

The only concession on the part of Great Britain, which has even the appearance of an equivalent for the 5,012 square miles of territory which we have ceded to her north of the St. John and the St. Francis, and the 893 square miles south of the St. Francis, is the navigation of the St. John. I say the appearance; for there is no reality in it. Had we yielded to Great Britain no more of the territory of Maine than that which was awarded to her by the King of the Netherlands, there would have been some plausibility in calling this a partial equivalent. But what is now the state of the case? We have surrendered to her a territory embracing the head-waters of several of the branches and tributary streams of the St. John. The moment we made this concession, the surrender of the free navigation of that river became a matter of necessity, not of choice, for England. In order to purchase a right for the inhabitants of this ceded territory on the upper St. John, and the military posts which may be established there, to navigate that portion of the river which flows through our territory, England had no alternative but to grant to us a similar right of navigation along that portion of the river below, within her exclusive jurisdiction. Hence we find in the article of the treaty relating to this subject, a stipulation on our part that "the inhabitants of the territory of the upper St. John, determined by this treaty to belong to her Britannic Majesty, shall have free access to and through the river for their produce, in those parts where said river runs wholly through the State of Maine." Thus it appears, on the very face of the treaty, that the right of each party to navigate the river within the territories of the other, is a mutual and reciprocal right. They are the equivalents of each other, and nothing more, and can be an equivalent for thing else. Without access to New Brunswick d the city of St. John through the river, the lue of our cession to her on the upper St. John ould have been greatly diminished; and she could t in conscience ask a right of navigation through ir territory, which she was unwilling to grant rough her own.

But again. Even if we had ceded no territory to gland on the upper St. John, how could the right navigate this river be considered as anything ore than an equivalent for a right of way over ir territory between New Brunswick and Canada? at we have not merely granted to her this right of ay; but all the territory on both sides of it, extend- g from the St. John and St. Francis, north to the eaty highland boundary.

But once more. This grant of the free naviga- n of the St. John is equally advantageous (to y the least) to New Brunswick as to Maine. he timber of that province on the St. John and its ibutary streams has been nearly exhausted; and e timber of Maine is now necessary, to enable e people of New Brunswick and the city of St. hn to carry on their profitable lumber trade with e mother country and her colonies. The privi- ge of transporting it down that river would have en cheerfully granted without any treaty, because gland never neglects her interest; and yet this ivilege is converted into an equivalent for yield- g to Great Britain between four and five millions acres of our territory.

Away with such pretences. They are nothing ore than mere flimsy apologies for the disgrace an unqualified surrender of our territory to ritish dictation. They are the miserable pretexts der color of which it is expected that this dis- aceful treaty shall escape from public indigna- on.

There is one fact strictly in character with this hole transaction, which deserves special notice. is this: that, under the terms of the treaty, we ve solemnly bound ourselves to Great Britain at we shall pay to our own States of Maine and assachusetts the expenses of their civil posse d their survey, and also the three hundred thou- nd dollars in consideration of their assent to the w line of boundary. On the face of the treaty, en, these two States have been restored to the otection of England, so far as the payment of this oney is concerned. England, under the treaty, ould be bound to demand and enforce its pay- ent against the United States; and thus we have aced in the hands of a foreign nation the power interfere in behalf of two States of this Union ainst their own Federal Government. Lord shburton himself thus construed the treaty; be- use, on the 9th August, he addressed a note to lr. Webster, asking him to state that the British overnment should incur no responsibility on ac- unt of this engagement; and to this Mr. Web- er assented.

Now, sir, I know full well that neither Maine r Massachusetts would ever have invoked, under y circumstances, the interposition of the British overnment to compel that of the United States pay this money; but yet, on the face of the treaty, eir right to pursue such a course is apparent. his treaty will be bound up in collections of eaties, without the accompanying correspondence; d the disgraceful fact will appear, without any planation, that we have bound ourselves to Eng- nd that we shall observe good faith towards two the members of our own confederacy. In order at we may appear fair upon the record, I shall, the proper time, move to strike out this stipula- n, which ought never to have been inserted in e treaty; and leave these States in form, as well in fact, to their remedy against the General overnment. I cannot anticipate any opposition such a motion.

Before I leave this branch of the subject, permit e to remark that I disclaim any imputation of im- roper motives to the commissioners of Maine in gard to their conduct. On the contrary, I enter- in the highest respect for one and all of them. hey have been led on, step by step, to the con- mmation at which they arrived; when I firmly elieve that, if the proposition to which they finally ave their reluctant conditional assent had been resented to them at the first, in all its naked eformity, they would have repelled it as an insult o the patriotic and gallant State of which they ere the honored representatives.

I have now reached the Northwestern boundary uestion; which is, by far, the most dangerous and important question between the two nations. When Lord Ashburton arrived in this country, as the harbinger of peace, declaring himself to have been charged with full powers to negotiate and settle all matters in discussion between the United States and England, we had every reason to believe that the boundary question, in its whole extent, both in the northeast and the northwest, would have been finally adjusted by the negotiators. In consequence of this confident expectation, my friend from Missouri [Mr. LINN] ceased to urge his bill to establish a Territorial Government in Oregon upon the attention of the Senate, lest it might injuriously interfere with the pending negotiations. But what has been the catastrophe? Our Northwestern boundary not only forms no part of the treaty, but is not even mentioned or alluded to in the correspondence. We have a correspondence on the case of the Creole, on the case of the Caroline, and on the doctrine of impressment; but Mr. Webster has never addressed a line to Lord Ashburton against the encroachments of Great Britain on that vast region of our territory west of the Rocky Mountains. The only allusion which has been made to the subject, is in the President's message transmitting the treaty to the Senate. He merely states that, "after sundry informal communications with the British minister upon the subject of the claims of the two countries to territory west of the Rocky Mountains, so little probability was found to exist of coming to any agreement upon that subject at present, that it was not thought expedient to make it one of the subjects of formal negotiation, to be entered upon between this Government and the British minister, as part of his duties under his special mission."

"It was not thought expedient to make it one of the subjects of formal negotiation!" We shall not, then, even enjoy the miserable privilege of the vanquished;—by all our sacrifices, we have not even purchased our peace. In all human probability, this question will never now be settled without a war, or without a surrender to Great Britain of the whole Oregon Territory north of the Columbia river; and it is even doubtful whether her lust of dominion will be satisfied with such a concession. Nay, more; we have not even purchased a momentary tranquillity; because the danger is impending, and before the close of the next session of Congress we shall probably determine to take possession of this territory. In that event, it will be almost impossible to prevent collision between the two powers in this remote region.

If "so little probability was found to exist of coming to any agreement on that subject at present," what ground is there for hope in the future? If Great Britain, when under the pressure of two expensive and disastrous wars in Asia, with a revenue inadequate to her expenditures, and a population on the very verge of rebellion—and this, too, at the moment she was eagerly intent on territorial acquisition from us in Maine—asserted claims so unreasonable to our territory on the Columbia as to remove all probability that they could be adjusted,—what can we expect hereafter, having surrendered the vantage ground? The prospect ahead is indeed gloomy. It matters not that our title is clear, for it is not clearer than it was to the disputed territory in Maine. It matters not that both by discovery and by cession we are entitled to all the region watered by the Columbia and its tributaries. Great Britain has fixed her heart upon it, and will now never peaceably abandon it, unless under the pressure of future misfortunes. She has already taken permanent possession of the country north of the river, through the agency of the Hudson Bay Fur Company. She has established forts, built ships, cultivated the soil, introduced domestic animals, erected mills, and done everything to indicate that she means never to abandon it. She has long been in the exclusive enjoyment of the valuable fur-trade of these regions, and has by this means acquired an influence over the Indians, which would enable her at any moment again to let them loose upon our defenceless frontiers. Besides, the mouth of the Columbia is one of those commanding commercial positions, which it has ever been her policy to acquire—peaceably if she could, but forcibly if she must. And yet we are told by the President that it was not thought expedient to make this one of the subjects of the late negotiation!

With what irresistible power might Mr. Webster have urged upon Lord Ashburton the settlement of our Northwestern boundary! He might have said to him, "You came here as the messenger of peace, to settle all the questions in dispute between us. I have consented, on your urgent solicitation, that none of these questions shall be adjusted, except that of the boundary between the two nations. But shall we not settle the whole boundary? Is it reasonable or just that we should surrender to you all you desire on the northeast, whilst you refuse even to enter into any negotiation for the settlement of the boundary on the northwest? You say that permanent peace and friendship between the two nations is your heart's desire; why, then, leave a question unsettled, which contains within itself the germs which may produce war at no distant period? This is a question of much greater importance to the two nations, and consequently of a much more dangerous character, than that in relation to the Northeastern boundary. If, therefore, you will have the Northeastern boundary established according to your wishes, we must also insist that the Northwestern boundary shall be defined. This is the only security which either nation can possess for permanent peace and good neighborhood. The settlement of the one question shall be the condition of the settlement of the other." Instead of this, we have given to England all she demanded on the northeast, where we are the stronger power; and left the boundary unsettled on the northwest, where we are the weaker. We have failed to take advantage of the most propitious moment which has ever occurred for adjusting this dangerous question on fair and honorable terms; and I fear we are destined to reap the bitter fruits of our own folly.

Besides, by dividing that portion of the territory of Maine with England, simply because England persisted in declaring that it was disputed territory, (although every Senator will admit there was no serious cause for dispute,) we have established a precedent under which she will be emboldened to make equally unreasonable demands upon us in the northwest. With nations, as with individuals, obsta principiis is a wise maxim. Resist the first encroachments with manly firmness, and future attempts will not be made. Above all other nations, this is true in regard to England, who, in her foreign policy, has never failed to make one concession the ground of demanding another. You can never propitiate her by yielding. A determined spirit and a bold front are necessary to obtain from her both respect and justice.

But what will be the effect of concluding a treaty with England, in which no mention has been made of our righteous claim to the territory west of the Rocky Mountains, of which she now enjoys the possession, especially when there has been no assertion of our right in the course of the correspondence? I shall purposely waive the discussion of this branch of the subject, with the single remark—that this circumstance must operate to our prejudice in any future negotiation. In any view of the subject, it was the duty of Mr. Webster to have insisted upon the settlement of this question, and to have demonstrated our right, not only to the territory washed by the waters of the Columbia, but to the parallel of 54° 40′ north latitude, in that clear and forcible manner for which he is distinguished when advocating the cause of truth and justice. Had this course been pursued, we should at least have been presented with the present views of the British Government in regard to the nature and extent of their claim. If nothing more could have been obtained, we might have had a correspondence on the subject, which would have shown to the people of this country what would be the probable conduct of England hereafter. Being thus forewarned, we might have been forearmed. But we are now left entirely in the dark as to the nature of her pretensions. We have received no intimation of the character of "the sundry informal communications with the British minister on the subject," to which the President alludes; and, like all the other personal conferences between the negotiators, they are buried in oblivion, without any written memorial to mark their character.

I have thus concluded all I had intended to say upon this treaty. I cannot vote for its ratification without doing violence to my own conscience and my most cherished principles. Nor am I to be driven from my propriety by the dread of war. I do not apprehend that war would be the consequence of our refusal to ratify this treaty. Lord Ashburton himself has everywhere alluded to another arbitration as the alternative of a failure of success in the negotiations. If another arbiter should even make an award as unfavorable to this country as the terms of the present treaty—an event which I should not anticipate—still we could submit to his award without forfeiting our own self-respect. There would have been no national degradation in submitting to the award of the King of the Netherlands; but very different is the case when we ourselves surrender to England even more than he had bestowed upon her, after having, for so many years, resisted this award.

But suppose war should be the inevitable result? There is one calamity still worse than even war itself; and that is, national dishonor. The voluntary restoration to Great Britain of any portion of the sacred soil "of the old thirteen," which they had wrested from her dominion by the war of independence, without any corresponding equivalent in territory, is an event without a parallel in our past history; and I trust in Heaven that our future annals may never be disgraced by a similar occurrence. We might have yielded this with honor, in obedience to the award of a sovereign arbiter, chosen under the provisions of the treaty of Ghent; but we can never yield it, without national disgrace, to the imperious demand of that haughty power. In expressing myself thus independently, I am far, very far, from intending to impeach the motives of Senators who are friendly to the treaty. I know and appreciate the purity and patriotism of their intentions, and sincerely regret that my own sense of duty compels me to differ so widely from them.

SPEECH OF MR. REYNOLDS,

OF ILLINOIS.

In the House of Representatives, January 30, 1843—On the occupation and settlement of the Oregon Territory.

MR. CHAIRMAN: The subject immediately before the committee is my proposition to appropriate money for a military survey of the route from the Council Bluffs, on the Missouri river, to the mouth of the Columbia river. In the discussion of this subject, the right of the Government to the Oregon Territory, and the propriety of occupying and settling it, must be considered. It would be ridiculous to make a survey to a country that did not appertain to the United States.

I am clearly satisfied that no part or section of the Union can be claimed and held with a more complete and perfect title than the Oregon Territory. The right and title of the United States to this Territory can be maintained and established on such a permanent basis, that I never read or heard the least doubt expressed by any American to the contrary. All the public functionaries of the country, from the days of Jefferson to the present time, and all the statesmen, no matter to what particular political party they may belong, have all, without one dissenting voice, agreed on this proposition—that the Oregon Territory, of right, is a part and parcel of the United States.

On the the 11th of May, 1792, Captain Robert Gray, of Boston, in the command of the ship Columbia, was the first civilized white man, with his ship's crew, who entered the Columbia river. He named the river "Columbia," in honor of his ship. The whole civilized world, with one accord, grant the honor to this enterprising Yankee and his companions of being the first actual discoverers of the Oregon. Various navigators may have coasted along the northwest coast of America, and have seen the land from their ships long before the discovery of Captain Gray; but none prentend to have entered the Columbia river, or to have taken possession of the country, before the 11th of May, 1792. This discovery alone, without any other title whatever, would, according to the laws of nations as recognised by the highest tribunals in the United States, give to the Government a perfect right to all the country watered by the Columbia river. In addition to this title, which of itself is valid, we have all the right and title which both France and Spain had to this same country. And either of the claims of the abovementioned nations is infinitely better than the vague and uncertain pretensions set up, of only recent date, by Great Britain to the Oregon Territory.

By the cession of Louisiana, the United States obtained all the right and title which either France or Spain ever had to the country in question. The treaty of Utrecht, which was ratified between France and Great Britain in the year 1713, established the permanent boundary between the possessions of the two nations on the west of the Mississippi, which was a line from the Lake of the Woods, extending indefinitely west on the 49th degree of north latitude. In this treaty, there was no agreement that this boundary line was to stop at the Rocky Mountains, and thus to leave the country west of the mountains subject to future controversy to settle the boundaries. The plain common-sense meaning of this treaty is, that this line, running west on the 49th degree of north latitude from the Lake of the Woods, must be extended to the Pacific ocean, and thereby separating the possessions of Great Britain on the north from those of France on the south. On the cession of Louisiana by France, the United States became a party to the treaty of Utrecht, and hold the country extending to the Pacific ocean on the south of the 49th degree of latitude, in as ample manner as France possessed the same.

By the treaty of the 22d February, 1819, between Spain and the United States, the boundary line was established from the Arkansas river, on latitude 42 degrees north, extending west to the ocean; Spain relinquishing all her claim to the territory north of this line to the United States, and reserving the country south to herself. The Mexican Government, in a subsequent treaty, recognised the said boundary line, which is the unquestioned boundary of the United States on the south.

In 1803, Thomas Jefferson, the President of the United States, recommended to Congress an exploration of the Oregon Territory to the Pacific ocean; and on his recommendation, an act of Congress was passed for this object; the result of which was, the celebrated expedition of Lewis and Clarke over this country to the ocean in 1804 and 1805. The country was taken and possessed by the United States, without any murmur or complaint to the contrary by any other nation. The whole people of the United States and the Government being fully convinced of the ownership of the Oregon Territory, John Jacob Astor, knowing this fact, in 1811 made a settlement at the mouth of the Columbia river, and was in peaceable possession of the country, with the approbation of the United States; when, in 1813 the British Government dispossessed him, and occupied the country. On the 6th of October, 1818, under the provisions of the treaty of Ghent, the Government of Great Britain, in the most formal manner, on the premises, delivered the country to the agent of the United States. In performing this solemn and official act of the British Government, there is not one word of reservation, or mention of the claim of that Government to the Oregon Territory.

Mr. Chairman, all these facts, and many more which I have not enumerated, establishing, conclusively, the right and title of the United States to this Territory, being known to the public officers of the Government, they have all unanimously arrived at the conclusion, that the Oregon Territory is an integral part of the Union. Not only have all the Presidents, including Jefferson, down to the present time, who have mentioned the subject, but also all the other high functionaries of the Government, together with the reports of various intelligent committees of Congress, with one accord, agreed on this subject; but Congress itself, by a solemn act, in 1803, authorizing the expedition of Lewis and Clarke to explore this country, has expressed the opinion of the nation on this subject, and such opinion as the people will most cheerfully maintain, even unto war, if necessary.

No other nation except the English claim any right or title whatever to the Oregon Territory; and they have only, within a few years, set up their claim, without any shadow of right.

The settlement of the country by Astor and other enterprising citizens of the United States, excited the cupidity and jealousy of the British; and then, and not before, we hear of the first English claim to this country.

It is true, that our Government, by the convention of 1818, agreed with Great Britain, "that any country that may be claimed by either party on the northwest coast of America, westward of the Stony Mountains, shall, together with its harbors, bays and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers within the same, be free and open, for the term of ten years from the date of the signature of the present convention, to the vessels, citizens, and subjects of the two powers: it being well understood that this agreement is not to be construed to the prejudice of any claim which either of the contracting parties may have to any of the said country." By a subsequent convention, the term of ten years was indefinitely extended, with the provision that either party, on giving to the other twelve months' notice, might annul the agreement.

Under this treaty, the British Government, by the agency of the Northwest Fur Company, have taken possession of the whole country, and now occupy it by various forts, plantations, and almost all the improvements that are to be found in any well-regulated community.

The following is from the journal of Mr Spalding, who passed from the Mississippi to the mouth of the Columbia, in 1837, with his wife: "Doctor McLaughlin's farm is the largest on the Columbia river, and produced last year 4,500 bushels of wheat, 4,000 bushels of peas, 1,700 bushels of barley, 1,500 bushels of oats; potatoes not gathered; corn but little; horned cattle, 750; swine, 400; with from 200 to 300 horses. He has a saw-mill and a flouring-mill." This is but one single establishment in the Oregon Territory, amongst many others that I might mention; which will show to what extent the country is occupied by a power without the least shadow of right whatever. A great number of forts is established throughout the country, and garrisoned with adequate forces.

The Northwest Company, under the patronage of the British Government, has not only monopolized the whole trade of this region of country, and occupied it to the exclusion of the Americans, but has extended over it a kind of Territorial Government by the officers and power of the Fur Company. Not content with this limited Government, an act of Parliament was passed in the reign of George IV, extending the jurisdiction of the courts of Canada over the territory of Oregon.

One encroachment after another is going on in such rapid succession in this territory, that we can scarcely keep pace with them. Not only have the American rights in soil and property been shamefully abused and trampled under foot by the British Government, but more than one thousand of our enterprising citizens, traders, and trappers, have been murdered by the English, through the instrumentality of the Indians, whom they control.

Mr. Chairman, I have stated the prominent leading facts on which the nation calls aloud for action. Are we so craven and recreant in spirit that we will remain quiet and see England rob us of our acknowledged rights? or are we wanting in patriotism and courage to defend our soil? We are compelled to act, or lose the country. If we yield to British audacity and usurpation, in the case of the Oregon Territory, where will it stop? Has Great Britain any bounds to her corrupt ambition? She would be pleased, above all things, to check the growing power of the United States, and to humble under her feet the stars and stripes of this Republic. Great Britain despises and hates the United States with the same fierce malignity which actuated her in the Revolutionary war against the Americans. That proud nation, to this day, considers us her rebels, and that the United States of right ought to be a part and parcel of the British empire. Her orators and public journals at the seat of Government proclaim aloud that "the Republic of the United States is an experiment in Government that cannot succeed. The people (they say) have not virtue or intelligence sufficient to maintain free and self-government."

But look at the acts of the British Government towards us, which speak louder than words. Compare her official conduct with that of other nations, in regard to the United States. Is there any nation who encroaches on our territory, murders our citizens, liberates the slaves of the United States, or impresses our seamen, but England? What nation, except Great Britain, would dare to excite its subjects, and the fanatics of the United States, to liberate the slaves in the Southern United

And yet, strange to say, there is a class of people in the United States, knowing all these facts, still friendly to Great Britain and the British Government. These people call the English their dear kindred, speaking the same language, and enjoying the same religion. They hail England as the mother country, which same unnatural mother has been trying for generations past to enslave and destroy her American children. Some of these Anglo-American children are so base and recreant in principle, that they would willingly sacrifice their rights and liberties as freemen to the dominion of the dear mother country. These rascals ought to be whipped naked round the world.

Mr. Chairman, delay to assert and maintain our rights in the Oregon Territory with such a nation, will secure the exclusive possession of the territory to England. A delay on this subject will either lose us the territory, or we will be forced to wrest it out of British hands by war, should England compel us to defend the Oregon Territory by force of arms. We dare not permit that nation to wrest from us any the smallest portion of the territory. No American will ever lay down his arms, while any hostile invader remains on the soil of freemen. Is it not better, therefore, to interpose the friendly remedy of timely possession, than to be forced, at a subsequent day, to take the country at the muzzle of the cannon?

If we had the joint possession of this territory with any other nation on the globe, inaction might not be fatal. But what can we expect from England? After a controversy for fifty or sixty years with this nation, for a portion of our soil in the constitutional limits of Maine, we lost it. No man in the Union believes that England had any right to the territory on the Northeastern boundary, which she has acquired from the United States in the late treaty. She was determined to have a road to connect her provinces together, and she bullied the United States out of it. She presented to the nation war, or a cession of the territory; and the Americans tamely consented to the latter. "Discretion is the better part of valor." War with England, or a ratification of the treaty, were the alternatives presented; and the latter was agreed to. Is not this a lesson on the Oregon question? At any time within the last fifty years, we might have settled the Northeastern boundary question on the same terms as it was adjusted in the late treaty. That haughty, overbearing Government yielded nothing, but held on with the same national pertinacity, the same bullying disposition, that has distinguished her character for ages past, until the American Senate, in direct violation to the will of the people, consented to the unjust pretensions of England, and ratified a treaty that is condemned by three-fourths of the people. Can we expect to adjust the Oregon question by negotiation with England? Can we expect anything from her on fair and honorable principles? or can we anticipate justice from a Government that will murder and destroy our sick and wounded prisoners, which was done in the late war? This is the same nation that, without any just cause whatever, has overrun and plundered a great part of Asia—has subdued China, and compelled that wretched and miserable race of men to pay England millions and millions for whipping them. Can we expect the Oregon to be restored to us by such a nation, on honorable principles?

Mr. Chairman, England has conquered, possessed, and colonized, vastly more territory on this globe than any other nation. Her navy is almost omnipotent, and her power by sea and land is the most gigantic that ever existed on earth. She possesses, and has under her imperial dominion, a great portion of North America. She owns great possessions in the West Indies, fronting the United States; and her territory extends on the north of the Union from the Atlantic to the Rocky mountains. Now she demands the Oregon Territory, so that her possessions may be continuous and complete from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean; and she has the unhallowed wickedness to believe her power will secure it to her.

The Oregon Territory would be to England a grand acquisition. It would, in the first place, cramp and circumscribe the growth and power of the United States, and add in the same proportion to her power, as it would detract from that of the United States. By possessing the Oregon, and planting a colony in it, England would regulate and control the trade and commerce, not only on the northwest coast of America, but that also of the Pacific ocean and the East Indies. God forbid that any American should ever see England in the exclusive possession of the Oregon Territory! This territory is in a critical situation. It is almost in the deadly grasp of the general and universal robber of nations. It is like Daniel in the den of lions; and I hope and pray that the same heavenly power that saved Daniel in olden times, may also save Oregon. Is it not right, in this perilous situation, when our own soil is within the grasp of unhallowed power, to stretch out the strong arm of the nation, and save the victim from British violation? Can any American, whose heart glows with the love of country, remain quiet, and see any nation rob him of his rights? If the United States are reduced in patriotism, and national honor to such degradation, as not to defend their own soil from British usurpation, and British audacity, they are unworthy to be considered any longer a nation of freemen. We hope for better things without despondency.

Mr. Chairman, it will violate no treaty or convention to occupy the Oregon Territory with half a million of people; if that number should be sent there, if necessary, to keep possession against the exclusive occupation of England.

The same honorable sentiment and love of justice which would induce the Americans to defend their own rights, would cause them to be exact and scrupulous in the observance of all treaties and conventions with other nations. No one individual in the whole length and breadth of this confederacy would impair, in the slightest degree, any agreement made with England; but certainly that nation cannot complain of our performing in the Oregon Territory what they themselves have done. They have occupied and garrisoned the country; they have planted a colony in it; they have made improvements of various descriptions, and have in it plantations, mills, stock, &c. They have not only the government of the Northwest Company extended over the country; but the Parliament of England has also embraced the country within the jurisdiction of Canada. What care we about their complaints, if we do justice to them? The United States having been visited by so many unkind and hostile acts from them, will care but little about their unjust complaints. The Americans, in doing justice, ought to care but little to offend England. Can it be seriously contended that the United States dare not occupy and settle the Oregon Territory, because it may offend England? This is foul slander on the American character. They dare do in courage what is within the power of man to perform. The Americans are a people young and energetic; know their rights and dare defend them, no matter what nation may be offended.

It is no violation of the convention for the United States to encourage emigration to the Oregon Territory. There is no prohibition as to the number of Americans who may occupy and settle the country. Military posts may be established in it, and the country settled and improved—as we see is done by England. Neither is it any infraction of the agreement made in 1818, between Great Britain and the United States, to grant lands to actual settlers in the Oregon. The country is "free and open" to the subjects and citizens of the two powers, so that the rights of the Americans which they have to occupy and possess the country, may be confirmed by grant of lands embracing their possessions. Possession is, of itself, a good title against unlawful intrusions, and which possession the United States would be bound to protect.

Mr. Chairman, it is impossible for the inhabitants of Oregon to exist in the air. They must occupy a space on the mother earth. This is a right—to exist and have a place on earth—an American citizen, under the Constitution and laws of the country, enjoys throughout the Union. It is also his right in Oregon, because the convention gives it to him, and because the country is an integral part of the Union. Possessing this right of location and occupation of the soil, the Government giving the settler a donation of the land embracing his location and settlement, neither adds to nor diminishes his possession of the soil. His possession is the same, and England has no grounds of complaint. What right has she to judge, or complain, if the United States have, or have not, the power to make grants of land in Oregon to actual settlers? This is a private matter between the United States and her own citizens, and no other nation has any power or right to interfere in our domestic relations. Have we any right to interfere in English affairs, and restore to the people of that country their rights, of which the Government has deprived them? I may add, moreover, that England cannot complain of the United States giving away its own soil, as the convention is express that the rights of the parties shall remain as they were before the convention was made; and, in that case, England has no right whatever to one inch of the Oregon Territory.

Mr. Chairman, I conceive it our bounden duty, on various considerations, to occupy and settle the Oregon Territory at the present time. Can the United States ignominiously abandon her rights and territory to England? and will it not promote the national honor and character of the country, to occupy and settle the Territory of Oregon? I consider the United States the asylum for the oppressed of all nations. This great Republic was not created for the few people who were in it at the Revolution, nor for the few who are now in it, in comparison to the hundreds of millions of souls who will hereafter exist in it. Am I not warranted in these statements by the unparalleled increase of population in the United States, and the unbounded prosperity and happiness of the inhabitants since the Revolution? Our population in 1790 was 3,929,827; and, in 1840, 17,068,666. This increase of 13,138,839 in fifty years, will astonish the world, and force the most incredulous to believe that this Republic is under the benign influence of Providence. If the people of the United States continue virtuous, intelligent, and energetic, as they have been—and I see no reason to doubt it—in fifty years more what will be the population of the Union? At least fifty millions of souls will exist in the United States in 1890. Will they not require the extension of the country from ocean to ocean for their comfortable existence? Is it not our duty to do all in our power for posterity? What did the fathers of the Revolution do for us? We inherited from them the finest country on the globe, and the principles of free government, imbodied in a Constitution which is the greatest work of man; and are we to do nothing for posterity in return?

It is conceded that the republican form of government of the United States will operate much better over a large territory than a small one. Our representative Government will never be so permanent and solid as when it is extended from the Atlantic to the Pacific. If I were permitted to indulge in speculations and opinions, I would say, in 1890 the United States will possess the greater portion of North America. It will embrace the British possessions on the North; and our friend the Texan Government would, by its own consent, compose a part of the South. We would then see a dense and happy population from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and the seat of the National Government in the centre. Large cities would then exist on the Pacific Ocean; and a commerce on it nearly equal to that on the Atlantic. This is, in my opinion, the onward march of the United States to her high destiny, which no foreign nation can arrest.

The occupation and settlement of the Oregon Territory will greatly advance the immediate interest of the United States. All the rich furs from the Missouri to the Pacific ocean are monopolized by England. The Northwest Fur Company import their goods direct from London to the mouth of Columbia river, free of duty; and therefore can undersell the Americans, who pay duty on their merchandise. This company—which is so powerful in wealth, numbers, and organization—expels from the country all the Americans who dare to compete with it in the Indian trade. Thus it has almost monopolized the whole trade.

This same foreign company, with its power and influence, is capable of controlling almost the whole Indian population in North America. This company is part and parcel of the British Government, and posseses an increased share of the British hatred to the United States. With its power over the Indians, and with their sincere and hearty hatred to the United States, it could, in a very short time, array in war against this Government almost all the Indians in North America. Fifty or sixty thousand Indian warriors England could precipitate on the frontiers of the United States, extended as they are, at one and the same time! This statement is not idle speculation, but it is fact. Is not this a powerful reason to induce the United States to occupy the country, and thereby save the frontiers from the fury of these savages?

Mr. Chairman, other commerce, as well as the Indian trade, will be benefited by the occupation of the Oregon Territory. Our commerce with the East Indies, Peru, Chili, and the western part of Mexico, will all be advanced and improved. That brave and enterprising class of men engaged in the whale fisheries would then have a station on the Northwest coast of America, where they could repair their vessels, and obtain necessaries to enable them to prosecute their business with more vigor and advantage to themselves. This aid from the Government is due this hardy race of men. Every possible inducement seems to me to exist to cause the United States to occupy and settle the Oregon without delay. Hundreds and thousands of the hardy pioneers of the Western country, and others, are ready to embark in this enterprise, if they are protected and sustained by the Government.

These emigrants would be sober, industrious, and virtuous citizens—not that wretched, reckless class of people who are willing to expatriate themselves, and abandon the blessings of free government for lawless anarchy. They would still remain on their own soil, and flourish under the protection of the stars and stripes of their native land. They would carry with them the Bible, the press, and the ploughshare; and the country would prosper like other sections of the Union. These settlers would anticipate from the Government what others have received under similar circumstances. They would expect the country to be protected, by military posts, from the insults and lawless depredations of the Indians. This protection is, at this time, extended to other sections of the Union. Such government and laws as exist over other similar sections of the United States, should also govern the Oregon Territory. The Territorial Government of Iowa ought to be extended to the Pacific ocean; and such laws of the Territory of Iowa, and of the United States, as exist at this time in the Territory, should also prevail in Oregon.

One other inducement to emigrants granted by the Government, and the Oregon is immediately occupied and settled. A grant of six hundred and forty acres of land to every settler who will remain on the land for five years, will be the watchword for emigration to flow into that territory in such numbers, that the country will be densely populated in a few years. The Americans are a land-loving people, and will defend it with the same energy and courage which they use to acquire it.

These donations of land are common to be made to the pioneers of all new countries. The first settlers in all the Western country had donations of land of some description made to them; and why not to those who settle Oregon? All settlers in Louisiana, at the cession of 1803, who occupied the soil, received 640 acres of land; and they were, at the cession, subjects of another Government. Our citizens emigrating to Oregon, would have more claim to the bounty of the Government, than the subjects of the French Government in Louisiana had who received these donations in 1803 All heads of families residing in the Illinois country, including Indiana and Michigan, in the year 1788, had granted to them a donation of 400 acres of land. And all militiamen who were in the same country in 1791 had 100 acres granted to them.

These donations of 400 acres remained unlocated from 1788 to 1814, and then were received in payment for lands sold at the sale of the public lands.

Donations of the same character might be made to those residing in the Oregon Territory, and permit them to be located when the country is surveyed and brought into market. This would obviate all difficulty with those who consider it improper to make absolute grants at this time. All the men under Lewis and Clarke received donations of land for their meritorious services in the expedition to the Pacific; and why not give the same to settlers who will go and reside there?

Mr. Chairman, these encouragements, tendered to emigrants, together with the fine country of Oregon, will insure its speedy settlement. The country itself is enticing. It is the finest climate in the United States. The temperature is more equal than any other section, and of such mild character, that winter is scarcely known. Live stock remain out all winter, and support themselves on the grass. The country is also extremely healthy, and in many parts very productive. All the grain that grows in the United States also thrives well in Oregon. The timber is large and abundant, which is now a considerable article of exportation by the Northwest Fur Company.

It is so manifestly just and right to occupy and settle the Oregon Territory, that I should consider it my duty, representing the will of my constituents, to urge this measure on the consideration of Congress on all proper occasions, until it is adopted. Should it fail at this session, and I be honored with a seat in the next Congress, I would continue my efforts, humble as they may be, until the Oregon is occupied and settled.

Although the temper and character of the American people are for peace; and although the American form of Government is calculated to insure that blessing; and although the United States have no object on earth to induce them to go to war against any nation,—yet England may force the Americans, for the third time, to take up arms against their old and inveterate enemy. That Government forced us to be free in the revolutionary war. She forced the United States, in the late war, to assume such a high stand in the republic of nations as neither party anticipated; and now she may force the people of the United States into such rage and fury that English dominion will be expelled, root and branch, from North America, and all her possessions come under the United States Government. Although the American people love honorable peace, yet there is a deep-rooted hatred resting in their breasts against the usurpations and corrupt ambition of the British Government, which could be excited into a tempest that would sweep everything before it.

Should England be so unwise and so wicked as to force the Americans into a third war with that nation, the young and growing vigor of America may shake the British empire to the centre. Our country is unbounded in resources and wealth; while the other is enfeebled with old age, and oppressed with tyranny. One is free; while the people of the other are laden down with debts and monarchy.

America can continue a war with England for ages Under the pressure of war, the people would unite in the defence of the country, and become invincible. An army of five hundred thousand soldiers could be maintained in the field; while a sufficient population would remain at home to work, and carry on the business of the country, and sustain the war. All those nations whom the English hold in bondage would cheerfully join the American standard, and be free. The Irish, the Asiatic, and the Chinese nations would bound with joy at the arrival of the happy day of their liberation from British tyranny. The Canadians, our nearest neighbors, would be the first to join the stars and stripes, and taste the sweets of liberty. France, our natural ally, would join us against England; and Ireland, being sustained by both France and America, would be the first to take vengeance on England for the many crimes and oppressions which she has inflicted on her, for many generations past.

These speculations may become sober realities, if England will continue to inflict on the Americans those cruelties and crimes of which she has been guilty, since the pilgrim fathers first landed on the Plymouth rock. It is for England and other nations to do justice to the Americans, and the consequence will be a peace of eternal duration.

Mr. Chairman: The distance from the Western settlements to the Oregon is not so far as is generally supposed. It is about 650 miles from the Council Bluffs, on the Missouri river, to the Rocky Mountains, and 600 from the mountains to the Pacific ocean. It is very little more than 3 000 miles from the tide water in the Potomac, to the tide water of the Columbia river. The country from St. Louis, Missouri, to the Rocky Mountains, is level and easily traversed; and the mountains themselves present no great obstacles to travellers, who cross them through the southern passes. In a few years, when the route from the Western settlements is better known, and more travelled, it will not be more difficult to journey to the Oregon Territory, than it was once to travel from the Mississippi to Philadelphia. Delicate females have already travelled from St. Louis to the Pacific, over the mountains. I hope the subject of the occupation and the settlement of the Oregon Territory may be seriously considered by Congress, and adopted at the present session.

SPEECH OF MR. WINTHROP,

OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In the House of Representatives, January 25, 1843.—On the resolution of the Committee of Ways and Means that the exchequer plan ought not to be adopted.

It is with no little reluctance, Mr. Speaker, that I enter into this debate. There is a well-remembered proverb of Solomon, that "from the fulness of the heart the mouth speaketh." I confess, sir, that I have no fulness of the heart to speak from, in relation to the questions now before us. The whole subject of the currency has been so perplexed and embarrassed by the deplorable collisions which have occurred between the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States, that no man can approach it without something of repugnance and aversion.

In reference to this subject of the currency, indeed, we have been tossed to and fro on the waves of party contention for almost ten years. A year or two since we were flattered with the belief that we were coming at last to port; but the objects which we took for land, and which were eagerly and joyously hailed as such from the mast-head, turned out to be only fresh reefs of rock across our course; and we seem to be now as far as ever, or even farther than ever, from the haven where we would be. In the mean time, the subject itself, as a matter of public discussion, has become "as stale as the remainder biscuit after a voyage."

Questions, however, seem likely to be taken before this report and resolution are disposed of, upon which any vote that one may give will be so exceedingly liable to misconstruction, that I cannot consent to forego some explanations of my views.

Repeated challenges have been heard in this hall for one man to rise in his place and say that he was in favor of adopting the exchequer plan, as originally presented to us by the President of the United States. I am not about to respond to these challenges, or to take up the gauntlet which has thus been thrown down. But I greatly doubt both the policy and propriety of passing the pending resolution; and if compelled to give my vote at all, that vote will be in the negative.

Before proceeding, however, to any remarks upon the resolution itself, or upon the report by which it is accompanied, I desire to present some general views on the subject-matter involved in them.

And, in the first place, sir, I wish to express the strong sense which I entertain of the obligation which is resting upon the Congress of the United States to make provision by law, in some form or other, and without further delay, for the collection, custody, and disbursement of the public moneys. How is it with these moneys now? Who knows where they are to day, or where they will be to-morrow? Who knows how they are collected, how they are kept, how they are disbursed? Who

loes not know that they are collected, kept, and dis-ursed under the almost entirely unregulated and liscretionary authority of the Executive? There is i section or two of an old law of 1789, and there is in amendatory act of 1822—both of them exceedngly loose in their language, and indefinite in heir import; and there is also the resolution of 1816. The first of these acts merely makes it the luty of the Treasurer of the United States to re-eive and keep the public moneys, and to disburse he same upon the warrants of the Secretary of the Treasury, leaving all the subordinate agencies hrough which the receipts and payments of this reat nation are to be conducted, entirely without egal specification or selection. The second of them elates mainly to moneys appropriated for the War nd Navy Departments, and supplies none of the deects of the previous act; and the resolution of 816 prescribes only the medium in which the pubic revenue shall be collected. These comprise all he law there is on the subject. These are the dis-ecta membra—the dry and detached bones—of our xisting fiscal system; and it is left to Executive onstruction to knit them together as it can, and to lothe them with what body it pleases. The report f the Committee of Ways and Means admits all his, and declares that, since the late vetoes of the President, "the public moneys have remained in he hands of officers appointed by the Executive, vithout any definite regulation by law."

For one, I cannot feel that my duty to the coun-ry, as one of its humblest Representatives, is disharged, in leaving this discretion longer uncheck-
d. Do gentlemen tell me that we have tried twice o accomplish this object, and that our efforts have wice been defeated by the interposition of Execuive vetoes? Sir, I am no vindicator of those veoes, and no apologist for them in any degree. I oin as heartily as any man in this House in deloring and condemning the use which has been nade of this odious veto power, both in relation to his and other matters; though, perhaps, I may not hink it consistent with the dignity and decorum vhich belong to this place to indulge in such ex-ressions on the subject as have too often been heard ere. But, so far from finding, in such consideraions as these, any ground for relaxing our efforts n relation to the public moneys, I hold them to be dditional reasons for persevering until our duty as been accomplished. We are the Representa-ives of the people. We have something of peuliar constitutional responsibility for the safety of he moneys of the people. And because the Exective, whose discretion we desire to control and egulate, has seen fit, from any cause—I care not whether of conscience or of contumacy—to arrest nd resist our interposition, shall we therefore for-ear altogether, and leave him in undisturbed pos-ession of the Treasury? I cannot so read our luty. On the contrary, if there be distrust of the Executive; if there be disapprobation of his policy r principles; if there be alarm or apprehension as o his aims and ends, and as to the means by which e seeks to accomplish them,—there is the more eason, in my judgment, for persisting in our at-empts, until the public moneys shall be again laced under legislative securities and safeguards.
Sir, if there is fear of a union of purse and sword, we have that union now, in the very form in which t first became the subject of Whig denunciation, when General Jackson removed the deposites from he Bank of the United States; and it is for us, if hat union must, in any shape, be continued, at east to provide that it shall henceforth be a union egulated and restricted by law.

Thus far, it is true, our treasury has been in litle danger. Our poverty has been our protection.
The utter emptiness of the public coffers has made t almost a matter of indifference who kept the keys, or whether there were any keys at all. Canabit vacuus coram latrone. We have enjoyed something of the security of the penniless traveler, who whistles in the face of the highwayman.
But a different state of things is not far off. I have no fear that the tariff of the last session, if only allowed to go fairly into operation, is about to be so ruinous to our revenue as some gentlemen have prophesied. Let the ability of the people to consume be stimulated until it rises above the famine standard—above the almost starving and freezing point—to which an unchecked foreign competition with their labor has reduced it, and there is nothng in the present scale of duties which will prevent an ample influx of revenue. The country has seen higher duties than these, and an overflowing treasury at the same time. Certainly, if the rigor of the cash payments should be mitigated by the adoption of that warehousing system which, I am happy to say, has been matured by the Committee on Commerce this very morning; and if, too, this House could be prevailed on to impose a moderate, and, if they please, a temporary duty on tea and coffee—a measure which no one would feel as oppressive, and which a due regard to the public credit demands of us, in my judgment, to adopt before we adjourn—we should witness a very different condition of the finances of the country at the commencement of the next session. But, at any rate, full or empty, exuberant or exhausted, the treasury of the nation ought now and always to be under legislative regulation and control.
This, sir, is Whig doctrine, Republican doctrine, Democratic doctrine, constitutional doctrine.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in saying that a national bank, of moderate capital—say fifteen or twenty millions at the furthest—with such limitations and restrictions as the experience of the last ten years has abundantly suggested, always has been, and is still, my first choice for the fiscal agent of the Government. Nor has the profligate mismanagement of such an institution which has recently been exhibited, destroyed or impaired my confidence in its value. No, sir, no more than the monstrous misrule to which this nation has been subjected from time to time, during the last twelve years, has destroyed my confidence in the free and glorious form of government under which we live. I am rash enough to think, too, that this very moment would be, in many respects, a favorable moment for establishing such an institution; believing that, while our experience of the evils to which its bad management has exposed us is still fresh and uneffaced, a bank would be established on safer and stricter principles, and on a less magnificent and dangerous scale, than at almost any time hereafter. The principles of the President have, however, rendered this an utterly impracticable idea.

But there are other modes which might be tried, and ought to be tried, for the same end. If this Congress is willing to do nothing else, it might call upon the Secretary of the Treasury to set down in black and white, and to present to us in the form of a statute, his present working plan for keeping, collecting, and disbursing the public funds.
We might examine it, amend it, and give it the sanction of law. Better have any system, even a bad one, resting on written law, than no system at all, or than a bad system resting on mere Executive will.

So strongly, Mr. Speaker, have I felt the impropriety of leaving the custody of the public treasures of the country longer at the mere discretion of the Executive, that, as events have turned out, I have more than once been inclined to regret that the sub-treasury system itself was so summarily repealed. Odious and abhorrent as that system was regarded, I could hardly bring myself to vote for its entire repeal at this moment, were it still in existence, except by voting for the simultaneous substitution of something better. And I will do the justice to the party with which I am associated here, to say, that I believe it was no part of their original purpose, at the extra session, to repeal that system as an independent measure. It has often been charged—and often, as I think, most unjustly charged—that the Whig party were actuated, at the extra session, by a desire to embarrass and perplex the President of the United States.
There was far more ground, sir, for charging them, in some cases, with too great a willingness to yield to his suggestions. That accusation of a spirit of compliance, which the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] arrayed against us the other day, has, in my opinion, much more of foundation; though, perhaps, it hardly lies with the President's immediate friends to cast it in our teeth. The outright repeal of the sub-treasury system, as a separate act, was, as I understand it, a measure of complaisance to the Executive. Its history was on this wise. The first bank charter had passed, and was under Executive advisement.
Its signature would have repealed the sub-treasury system prospectively; its veto would have left that system standing permanently. A suggestion was made, from some quarter or other, that the President took this course unkindly; that it looked like a purpose to make him either sign the bank charter, or be responsible for the continuance of a system which he himself admitted had been condemned. It was thought that it would put him in better humor for a favorable consideration of the bank, if he were relieved from this predicament.
And upon this hint the sub-treasury repeal bill was hastily carried through. For one, I can hardly help regretting that such a course was taken. I would rather have left the sub-treasury system on the statute-book, on the joint responsibility of those who originated it and of those who prevented the adoption of the proposed substitute, until some third system should have been devised. We might have taken out the teeth of the monster.
We might have extracted the poison from its fangs.
We might have abolished the specie clause—a provision which, as Mr. Gallatin has well remarked, was operative against those banks alone which continued to pay in specie—"a warfare directed exclusively against those institutions which performed their duty, and, not without difficulty, sustained a sound currency." And perhaps other beneficial modifications might have been engrafted on it at a future day. But, as a system for keeping the public moneys, it was at least better than none, and might better have been left until we could agree upon something to take its place.

After the expression of these views, Mr. Speaker, no one can be surprised when I say that I prefer to adopt that part of the exchequer plan which provides for the custody and disbursement of the public funds, to doing nothing; and that I am therefore entirely unwilling to cut myself off from the opportunity of supporting so much at least of the President's plan, by voting for the resolution before us.

But this is not the only part of the exchequer plan for which, under all circumstances, I am disposed to vote. I am not one of those who hold that the duty of the Government on this subject ends with making provision for the management of its own finances. I am no subscriber to the doctrine which was heard a few years ago—that the Government should look out for itself, and should let the people look out for themselves. On the contrary, in relation both to revenue and to finance, the interests of the people should be embraced in every consideration of the wants of the Government. Especially, at a moment of such commercial embarrassment and depression as the present, we should contemplate, if possible, no measure of relief to the treasury, which does not hold out some hope of relief to the community also. We all regret—all of us, at least, who constitute the majority in this House—that circumstances have prevented us from doing what we desired to do in this behalf. But, if we cannot do all that we wish, let us not fail to do all that we conscientiously and constitutionally can, trusting to other and greater opportunities for the ultimate fulfilment of our desires.

Now, sir, I am one of those who believe that a simple issue of fifteen or twenty millions of exchequer notes, redeemable in specie at sight, (and I would prefer them redeemable in the city of New York alone, or, at most, at one or two other points,) and resting on a basis sufficient to secure their re-deemability from all danger and all doubt, at any and every instant when they might be presented, would be a very considerable convenience and relief, both to the Government and the people. Government paper is, indeed, no prime favorite of mine, in any form. I regret that we have been under the necessity of resorting to it at all. But, as we have lived upon it already for five or six years, and seem not likely, at present, to obtain a national medium of circulation of any other kind, I am willing to try it in the most convenient shape. Nor can I agree with gentlemen who pronounce such a medium, based upon specie even to the extent of dollar for dollar, as not worth having. Something a little more liberal, so it were safe, might undoubtedly be preferable. Something more liberal would, indeed, be indispensable, so far as any relief to the treasury is concerned; and the President's plan accordingly makes provision for basing an issue of fifteen millions of notes upon five millions of specie, and five millions of Government bonds to be negotiated as needed. Increase the authority to issue bonds to the full amount which might be necessary in any emergency for redeeming the entire issue of notes, and the safety of such a provision could hardly be questioned. The bonds would, in all probability, never be called for; and the treasury would have an addition of ten millions to its resources at a moment when such an addition may be absolutely indispensable to the preservation of the public credit. But the mere substitution of paper for metal is certainly a great convenience to the people; and gentlemen forget one of the heads of their old arguments against a hard-money currency, when they spurn such a substitution as so utterly worthless and contemptible. Such a paper would be convenient for local payments, convenient for treasury payments, and, more especially, convenient as a medium of exchange. Even treasury notes, as now issued, at interest, and on time, are acknowledged to have been a great convenience and relief in all these respects. Indeed, it is almost impossible to conceive how the business either of the treasury or of the people could have been conducted, during the difficulties and distresses of the last five years, without the aid of such an instrument of receipt and payment.

Mr. Speaker, there are other features of the Executive plan of an exchequer about which I have many misgivings, and for which, I confess, I do not see my way clear to vote. I refer particularly to the power to purchase bills of exchange. There is certainly great room to apprehend that such a power would not be exercised wisely, even if it were exercised honestly, by those to whom it is proposed to be intrusted. In such hands it would undoubtedly be liable to great abuses, both from ignorance and from intention. I have the strongest reluctance, too, to making any part of our fiscal system dependent on the assent of the States—a condition without which this exchange power could hardly receive the sanction of the President. I confess, sir, it is rather late in the day for some of us to take umbrage at this condition. My venerable colleague [Mr. ADAMS] and the honorable member from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] are perhaps the only members on our side of the House who are privileged to carp at it. All the rest of us voted for a most miserable compromise of this State assent in the first bank charter of the extra session; and we all remember the opening thunders of the gentleman from Kentucky on that occasion. We gave those votes with an honest desire to satisfy the President's conscience, but they only served to wound our own; and, for one, I am more willing to cry peccavi in relation to that vote, than to have it recorded as a precedent for my future action. Nor do I believe that this exchange feature of the bill, under all the limitations and restrictions which must be imposed upon it, would be so very great a boon to the country. Public opinion, in some quarters of the country certainly, has undergone great mutations on the subject of exchanges. Government regulation of exchanges is much less called for than it used to be. As the local currencies of the country become sound, the enormous rates of exchange are found to disappear. The aid which is now demanded of the Government, is aid through the medium of currency; and to supply this aid to the exchanges, is undoubtedly as far as any positive duty of the Government can extend. The substitution of gold for silver, as the main ingredient of our metallic medium, (as is strongly stated by my respected predecessor, [Mr. APPLETON,] in his able pamphlet on the currency,) has exerted a most salutary influence in lessening the rates of exchange. While the transportation of silver would hardly have been attempted between New York and Boston, for instance, with an exchange below one per cent., gold is transported from one city to the other before the exchange can rise to a quarter of one per cent. But I will not dwell longer on the subject of exchanges, nor, indeed, on any of the other features of the exchequer system. When the bill itself shall come up for consideration, there will be ample opportunity for discussing its details; and I intend to leave myself at liberty to vote as I shall then think fit upon each and every part of the plan. Meantime, I have said enough to show that, though not ready to pledge myself to the entire Executive project, I am ready to adopt, if nothing better is proposed, some portions, if not the whole, of the bills which have been reported in the Senate and in the House. In so doing, I shall vote for that which many persons, in whose judgment I have the highest confidence, consider altogether harmless; for that which many other persons (and myself among the number) regard as likely to be positively beneficial; and for that which not a few persons in the nation will never believe is not the genuine specific, the matchless sanative, for all the troubles of the country, until it has been tried and found wanting. Above all, sir, I shall vote for that which may give something of at least temporary rest and repose to the public mind on this long-vexed question of the currency, and which may satisfy the people that there is no purpose in any quarter to keep the wounds of the body politic open and bleeding, in order to excite party sympathy and stimulate party struggle two years hence.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to a few remarks on the report and resolution before us. And before making them, I beg leave to bear my humble testimony to the ability, integrity, and patriotism of the honorable chairman, [Mr. FILLMORE,] by whom the report has been prepared. I respond most cordially to the tones of honest indignation with which he yesterday repelled an infamous slander upon himself and his colleagues. I trust that, in dissenting from some of the doctrines of the report, I shall not seem wanting in regard and respect for its author.

The report admits, on one of its earliest pages, that, if it were possible to have such an institution, without increasing Executive power, or endangering the treasury, which should be administered by men of undoubted talents and integrity, it is capable of rendering some service both to the business wants of the country and the financial embarrassments of the treasury. It immediately adds, however, "that to hope for this, is to expect a change in human nature itself, and in the ordinary motives that govern the conduct of men, and especially political men, little less than miraculous. Our institutions are based upon no such theory of human perfectibility."

Now, Mr. Speaker, the honorable chairman must pardon me for saying, that if this exchequer plan of the President is too much based on a theory of human perfectibility, it really seems to me that his report runs quite as far to the other extreme, and rests its objections to the plan too much on a theory of total depravity and universal corruption. This, if I mistake not, is the great peculiarity of the report. Its arguments are able and forcible; but they are almost all of them arguments from abuse. Every possible evil which such an institution may produce, if intrusted to dishonest hands, is exhibited in its most alarming aspect. The advantages which it might render, if administered by honest agents, are disposed of a good deal more summarily. It really occurred to me, as I read this report, that my honorable friend might have taken as his text, in writing it, the saying of—I forget what statesman or philosopher of ancient Greece—that the only safety in relation to human government was distrust, distrust, distrust; or, as a Roman poet conveyed the same idea, "una salus, nullam sperare salutem." Sir, it is not to be denied that something of distrust is useful in relation to all human governments, and more especially in relation to our own Government. But it is equally undeniable that some degree of confidence—that a great deal of confidence—is not only useful, but absolutely indispensable to the successful operation of every government, and even to the very existence of a free Government. It is true, our institutions are not based on a theory of human perfectibility; but they are based on a theory of human morality, integrity, and virtue. This is the distinctive feature of free Governments. It was laid down truly by Montesquieu, long ago, that the foundation principle of a despotism was fear; of monarchy, honor; but of a republic, virtue. There must be public virtue as well as private virtue—virtue in the Government, as well as virtue among the people. The two things are, in fact, inseparable for any long period of time; for a virtuous people will either expel a corrupt administration, or a corrupt administration will debauch a virtuous people. If virtue, therefore, shall indeed have taken its final flight from our public councils, and from those who preside over them, as this report would almost seem to intimate—vain, vain will be the attempt to bolster up our political fabric by any more artificial machinery, or to prevent its downfall by any degree of distrustful vigilance. Sir, if such be really the deplorable and desperate condition of our Republic, the passage of this resolution will do nothing to save it from ruin, nor will the adoption of the exchequer plan be at all responsible for its overthrow. It will fall by its own weakness and its own weight, like any other structure whose corner-stone has already crumbled into dust.

But I do not apprehend so disastrous a catastrophe at present. I freely admit that we have had no great encouragement to cherish any very implicit trust in our rulers for some years past. Within the last year even, we have seen demonstrations and heard declarations but too well calculated to check the flow, if not entirely to congeal the current, of that tide of returning confidence which came out to greet the accession of a new Administration. But I am not willing to believe that the age of virtuous politics is gone forever. I trust that we may again see at the head of this Republic men who have stood there in its early days—men like those we have seen there in years within our own remembrance—men who will feel, in entering upon public office, that they have been called to no pitiful job, but to a sacred function—men who may be addressed in the words, though certainly not in the spirit, in which Macbeth was addressed by—the demi-demon, I had almost said—with whom his destiny was associated:

> "What thou would'st highly, that would'st thou holily;
> Art not without ambition; but without
> The illness should attend it."

And, sir, if such a day should again arrive, how would the petty and paltry contentions which embitter and embroil us here, and in the prosecution of which the true interests of the nation are so often forgotten and neglected, be hushed into silence! How would the public prosperity revive, the public peace be restored, the confidence of the people in the Government be reassured, and the public faith resume again, in the eyes of all the world, that robe of stainless and inviolate sanctity with which it was first clothed by the fathers of the Republic.

But, at all events, Mr. Speaker, whether this hope be realized or not, I do not think it quite time yet to base our systems, or our objections to systems, on a theory of universal corruption and corruptibility; or even upon the doctrine of my honorable friend who has just taken his seat, [Mr. BARNARD,] that public office is the very worst school of morals on this side the penitentiary. This report would really seem to trust nobody in relation to finance and currency,—not the President, not the Secretary, not the subordinate executive agents, not the Senate, not the House of Representatives, not each individually, not all conjointly. The President will abuse the veto power; the President and Senate will abuse the appointing and removing power; the Secretary and subordinate agents will abuse their authority to keep the public moneys; and the Congress of the United States, even should it restrict the issues of exchequer notes within a proper limit at the outset, will run into ruinous excesses in the end. "As you cannot check or control Congress on this subject, (says the report,) it would follow that we ought not to attempt to exercise this power."

Why, sir, it is as much as ever that even a United States Bank can find a loophole of escape from the universal discredit in which the report deals. There is too much foundation for the remark of the minority of the committee, that some of the objections of the majority to this exchequer scheme apply equally to a national bank. As such an institution, however, was unquestionably intended to be excepted from any terms of distrust, I wish now to say a word or two on some of the expressions and some of the implications of the report on that subject.

The report seems to lay a little too much stress on what it denominates the watchful caution of the interested stockholders of such a bank. The private capital of a national bank is undoubtedly a great security for the safety of the Government deposites; but the vigilance of stockholders has proved thus far to be a most miserable ground of reliance. Where has been the watchful caution of interested stockholders in the countless defalcations and frauds which have recently involved us in so much distress at home, and so much disgrace abroad? This Argus of self-interest may have a hundred eyes, but it has never used one of them. It has been drugged and posseted into perfect blindness. The stockholders of our banks—and it ought to be spoken to their shame—have looked to nothing but the dividends, as long as there were any dividends to look to; while the directors, clerks, and cashiers have exercised unlimited control over their concerns.

Sir, I have already said that a national bank was my first choice for the fiscal agent of this Government; and, so far as this report goes in asserting or in implying that such an institution is the first choice of the committee, I most heartily agree with it. But if it is intended to be implied that there is no second choice—that this Government can, under no circumstances and in no emergency, employ any other fiscal machinery—I must dissent from the doctrine. I have no fancy for independent treasuries, in the sense in which this phrase has lately been used; but that this Government ought not in any case to provide a system of its own, for keeping its own moneys, for managing its own finances, and for maintaining and regulating a national currency for itself and the people, I certainly am not prepared to say. Why, sir, let me suppose a case. Suppose that the first bank charter which was passed by the two Houses at the extra session, instead of having failed through the veto of the President, had failed (as most people in my part of the country seem to think it would have failed) for want of subscribers to its stock: would a majority of this House, in that event, have felt it their duty to leave things as they were, and to abandon all further effort? Is it not even possible that, if we had come together at the commencement of the last session of Congress, under such circumstances, and with no cause of complaint against the President, and no feelings of bitterness towards anybody connected with the Administration, we should have looked upon some such plan as this very exchequer with less of alarm and horror than we now regard it? Whether so or not, sir, such an exigency might have occurred, and may occur again. Are we, then, ready to say that Government cannot discharge its duty to itself, and its duty to the people, unless the capitalists of the country will take stock in a bank? We, that refuse to make any part of our fiscal system dependent on the assent of the States—are we ready to make that system entirely dependent on the assent of individual citizens? If not, why should we not do what we should be willing to do in the case I have supposed? The same exigency now exists, though arising from a different cause. The impracticability of obtaining a bank at this moment is as clearly determined by the refusal of the President to subscribe his name to its charter, as it would be by the refusal of capitalists to subscribe their names to its stock list. And though there may be much more right to complain in one case than in the other, the emergency is the same in both, and our responsibilities in both are alike and identical.

One word, sir, in reference to another suggestion of the report, before I proceed to the resolution with which it concludes. A provision is contained in the President's plan of the exchequer, and is improved upon, I believe, in the bills both of the Senate and House, to limit the removing power of the Executive in relation to the commissioners and other officers of the board. Such a provision undoubtedly does away many of the dangers of the system. But the report pronounces all this unconstitutional. It declares that Congress possesses no such power, and that any fancied security built upon such an hypothesis must prove fallacious. Now, this was not the doctrine of the Whig Senate of the United States in days when a Whig Senate was all we had to rely upon. On the contrary, the Whig Senators of those days, with Mr. Clay and Mr. Webster in perfect harmony at their head, went strongly for the right and for the duty of such limitations. Some of them, indeed, went very much further than this bill proposes to go, and declared themselves in favor of reversing the decisions of 1789; but none of them, I believe, made any question that limitations of some kind might be, and ought to be, made.

The report under consideration concludes with a resolution "that the plan of an exchequer, presented to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury at the last session, entitled 'A bill amendatory of the several acts establishing the Treasury Department,' ought not to be adopted." This resolution is immediately preceded by the remark, that the committee deem the plan to be "essentially defective, and incapable of any modification—at least without an amendment of the Constitution—that could justify its adoption." I am told, however, that the resolution may be adopted without any reference to the report, and that it is not intended to reach beyond the precise bill which was furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury; and some of my colleagues and friends, from whom I do not differ materially in opinion, will vote for it, I am aware, with this understanding. But the common mind will not so construe the resolution. Nor does it seem reasonable that we should be held to the precise provisions, phraseology, and punctuation of a particular bill, to which there has been no opportunity for amendment, and be compelled to declare affirmatively or negatively upon a resolution for its rejection. Why should such a resolution be pressed to a vote? Why not lay it on the table, as you do all other adverse reports? Why waste the time and temper of the House in discussing mere abstract opinions, instead of going into Committee of the Whole and acting on the bill to which those opinions relate? I have no doubt, sir, that the resolution was introduced into the House in a proper spirit, and with no unbecoming motives. I concur in no imputations on the Committee of Ways and Means. But there is no little sensitiveness in many quarters as to the movements of the present Congress upon this, and, indeed, upon every other subject. Everything out of the common course (as this certainly is) will be imputed to sinister designs. Pass this resolution by an overwhelming vote—as I doubt not you will, if you insist on taking the vote in this form—and it will be regarded as an act of mere hostility to the President, and of mere retaliation for his bank vetoes. It will be regarded as intended to stamp something of peculiar reproach and unaccustomed reprobation on this measure and its author. It will look as if you desired the triumph of holding up this bill to the scorn and derision of the country, and saying, "Here is Mr. Tyler and Mr. Webster's famous fiscal project, with hardly one man so poor to do it reverence." Now, sir, I am not disposed to shrink from any just or necessary act of legislation for fear of misconstruction, or to save appearances. But, on a mere amateur proceeding of this sort, I would give no vote which can be so misconstrued. "A thousand false eyes are stuck upon us." Let us not again gratify their malicious gaze. Let us disappoint, for once, their eager search for subjects of mystification and perversion. For myself, sir, as I have already intimated, if a vote is insisted upon, I shall vote against the resolution, both because I am opposed to the policy and propriety of such a proceeding, and because I am unwilling to foreclose all direct consideration of the subject, and to cut myself off from voting for the whole or any part of the exchequer plan, now or hereafter. I shall give such a vote with the less reluctance, from the consideration that, in differing from great numbers of my political friends, I shall differ from perhaps an equal number of my political opponents. There were no party lines on this resolution in committee, and it is plain that there will be none in the House.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot feel justified in resigning the floor, as my hour has not quite yet expired, without alluding to a course of remark which has been persisted in for some weeks past, in relation to the supposed author of this exchequer plan. I am not here, sir, as the champion of the Secretary of State. Heaven help him, if he has not a more tried and trustworthy arm than mine to look to, if he shall ever require any other than his own! He will, doubtless, say amen to this aspiration; for I have no idea he will thank me for many of the remarks which I have already made, or for many of those which I am about to make. He is, indeed, one of my most distinguished constituents. I might appeal, however, to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] who counts among his constituents the great and gallant statesman of the West, to bear witness with me that such a relation does not necessarily involve anything of peculiar cordiality or confidence; though, certainly, it cannot imply anything of the reverse. But, at any rate, holding, as I do, that great injustice has been done to Mr. Webster, on more than one occasion, by gentlemen who have gone out of their way to introduce his name into the debate, no fear, either of personal imputation or of political misconstruction, shall make me shrink from saying so. I should be unworthy of sitting here as the Representative of Faneuil Hall, and should hardly dare to look those who are accustomed to meet there in the face, were I to listen longer, without a word of protest, to the wholesale reproaches which have been cast upon one who has so long been associated with their fortunes and their fame.

Sir, I was not at Faneuil Hall when Mr. Webster made the speech which has been the subject of such frequent allusion. I have read that speech, however, more than once; and, as I do not intend to be charged with any non-committal or concealment, I have no hesitation in saying that it contains many opinions which I deeply regret were ever expressed, and from which I entirely dissent. The idea which seems to be implied in one part of the speech, that the Whigs of Massachusetts, in declaring a "full and final separation" from President Tyler, designed to commit themselves to an indiscriminate opposition to all the measures of his Administration, good, bad, and indifferent, was certainly unwarranted by anything which they had ever done at home, or which their Representatives had ever done here. The opinion which seems to be conveyed in another part of the speech, that the Whig party in Congress deserved no particular credit for the passage of a protecting tariff; that, because twenty or thirty Whigs, in one branch or the other, voted against the tariff, and ten or a dozen of their opponents for it, while the great body of the Whigs had, from first to last, devoted their most strenuous efforts to its adoption, and the great body of the Van Buren party had labored incessantly to defeat and reject it; that, therefore, there was no party element in the proceeding, and no party credit for the result, was to my mind equally indefensible. It was confounding the rule and the exception, and placing both upon equal terms. The denial of the authority of the convention, also, to act upon matters which every Massachusetts Whig convention, for ten years before, had been accustomed to act upon without qualification or question, was anything but reasonable. But, sir, there are other passages of this speech, upon which constructions have been put which are utterly ungenerous and unjust. The idea which has more than once been advanced in this House, that Mr. Webster's interrogatories on that occasion—"where do they mean to place me?" "where am I to fall?"—instead of being applied, as it was, simply and solely to his relations to the Whigs of Massachusetts, with whom he had stood so long on terms of confidence and respect, such as few other men ever before enjoyed, was an expression of a corrupt, base, unprincipled lust for office, or of an abject, craven, cringing fear of being turned out of office, is as unfounded as it is gross. It is wholly unsustained by the spirit or by the letter of the speech. The very next sentence to that in which these questions are contained, destroys all apology for such a construction—"If I choose to remain in the President's councils, do these gentlemen mean to say that I cease to be a Massachusetts Whig?" This is the sum and substance of both the interrogatories which have been rung through these halls with so much scorn, and which have formed the foundation of this infamous charge of servility and corruption. The question as to the collectors, attorneys, postmasters, and marshals, is fairly susceptible of no other interpretation. And so, also, with that in relation to my excellent and distinguished friend, the present minister to England. The inquiry, as to all of them, was whether, by this full and final separation from Mr. Tyler, the Whigs of Massachusetts meant to say that they intended to discard and denounce so many of their eminent brother Whigs who then were holding office, unless they either resigned or were turned out. And this is the "detestable doctrine" which has so disgraced Daniel Webster, and so desecrated Faneuil Hall! The questions may all have been uncalled for; but, if they imply a love for anything, it is a love of party, and not of place; if a fear of anything, it is a fear of being abandoned by friends, rather than of being turned out of office.

Sir, it would have been better, far better for all concerned, if this little family jar in Massachusetts had not been meddled with by strangers, and if the parties to it had been left to scold it out among themselves. But I utterly protest against such an exaggeration of its details and history, and such a misrepresentation of the language which was used on the occasion. As to Mr. Webster's love of office, there is no evidence that this love is stronger in him than in many other gentlemen who are justly esteemed and honored in the land. He retained office, indeed, when other gentlemen—his colleagues in the Cabinet—retired. But there was as little reason in charging him with having held on to his commission from the mere love of office, as there would be in charging them with having resigned from the mere hate of office. These gentlemen—for whom I have always entertained and expressed the highest possible regard and respect—felt it was due to their own honor to withdraw from the Cabinet. They did so; and though there were some of their friends who would have preferred that they should have remained, and put the President to his removing power, if he desired to get rid of them, yet all—all acquiesced in their decision, and in their own right to make that decision for themselves. Mr. Webster, on the contrary, felt it consistent with his honor to stay, and carry on that great work of negotiation with Great Britain upon which he had just entered. My venerable colleague [Mr. ADAMS] has recently told his constituents and the country that he advised him to stay—at least till that negotiation was concluded. "Thinking I was in a post where I was in the service of the country, (says Mr. Webster himself, in this Faneuil Hall speech,) and could do it good, I staid there. I leave it to you to-day to say—I leave it to my country to say, whether the country would have been better off if I had left also. I have no attachment to office. I have tasted of its sweets, but I have tasted of its bitterness. I am content with what I have achieved; I am more ready to rest satisfied with what is gained, than to run the risk of doubtful efforts for new acquisitions." Who doubts, sir, that Mr. Webster has tasted of the bitterness of office as well as of its sweets? Who doubts that he has had his perplexities and provocations during the political hurly-burly of the last two years, as well as we ours? And who denies that, amid them all, he has discharged the peculiar and most responsible duties of his post with unsurpassed ability and success? He has rendered great services to his country—services which will prevent the present Administration, unfortunate and odious as it may have been in many respects, from being quite so mere a parenthesis on the page of history as was at one time suggested. The treaty of Washington can never be passed over, in the future perusal of our annals, "without destroying the sense." It may not catch the eye of the cursory reader, indeed, so quickly as if it were written in letters of blood; nor may it occupy so large a space as the dread alternative it has averted; but it will be inscribed in characters which will rivet, as with a charm, the attention and admiration of every thoughtful patriot and every true philanthropist, and which will continually acquire fresh lustre with the advancing progress of civilization and Christianity. The light which flashes from the sword of the successful warrior may dazzle for a day, or even for an age; but a far more enduring radiance will encircle the names of those who have reconciled the proud and angry spirits of two mighty nations, and have honorably secured for them both the unspeakable blessing of PEACE.

Mr. Webster has been charged with great and glaring inconsistencies on the subject of the currency and the Constitution; and this exchequer project is declared to be in direct contradiction to the doctrines of his whole previous political life. Now, sir, I am not going to argue this point. I have no idea that I could argue it to anybody's satisfaction if I should try. I will not pretend to say that this plan does not, in my opinion, contain provisions which Mr. Webster has opposed and condemned in other connexions and under other circumstances. But this I will say: that the great and leading idea of almost all his speeches against the sub-treasury system was, that it was an entire abandonment of the power and duty of the General Government to regulate the currency and the exchanges. Wherever he addressed the people—in Wall street or in State street, at Saratoga or at Bunker Hill—this was the burden of his argument. And, so far as this argument is concerned, he is entirely consistent in advocating the exchequer plan. But if it were not so, Mr. Speaker, I confess that I have yet to see evidence that, when arraigned, in reference to this project, on the mere score of consistency, Mr. Webster might not avail himself of the answer of an Athenian orator on a similar occasion, and say: "I may have acted contrary to myself, but I have not acted contrary to the Republic." The merits of this measure, if it has any, are certainly independent of any man's consistency. It has been devised under circumstances unlike any which ever existed before in the history of this country, and unlike, I heartily hope, any which will ever exist again. It has been brought forward, as I believe, in good faith, and with an honest purpose for the public welfare. If any part of it, or the whole of it, is regarded as unwise, inexpedient, or unsafe by this House or by the country; if it be really "the terrible machine" which the report declares it to be, which would "overwhelm the treasury with bankruptcy, corrupt the Government, and lay a foundation for the most dangerous political favoritism and universal corruption;" and if it be really "incapable of any modification which would justify its adoption," let it be rejected. These opinions of the committee, however, as I have before suggested, appear to me exceedingly extravagant. I have seen no occasion for such a hue-and-cry against the plan, nor for such reproaches upon its author; and I have accordingly felt bound to say so, in utter disregard of any imputations to which such a course may subject me.

OF MISSOURI,

In Senate, Thursday, February 2, 1843—On the Oregon bill.

Mr. BENTON said: On one point there is unanimity on this floor; and that is, as to the title to the country in question. All agree that the title is in the United States. On another point there is division; and that is, on the point of giving offence to England, by granting the land to our settlers which the bill proposes. On this point we divide. Some think it will offend her—some think it will not. For my part, I think she will take offence, do what we may in relation to this territory. She wants it herself, and means to quarrel for it, if she does not fight for it. I think she will take offence at our bill, and even at our discussion of it. The nation that could revive the question of impressment in 1812—which could direct a peace mission to revive that question—the nation that can insist upon the right of search, and which was ready to go to war with us for what gentlemen call a few acres of barren ground in a frozen region,—the nation that could do these things, and which has set up a claim to our territory on the western coast of our own continent, must be ripe and ready to take offence at anything that we may do. I grant that she will take offence; but that is not the question with me. Has she a right to take offence? That is my question! and this being decided in the negative, I neither fear nor calculate consequences. I take for my rule of action the maxim of President Jackson in his controversy with France—ask nothing but what is right, submit to nothing wrong, and leave the consequences to God and the country. That maxim brought us safely and honorably out of our little difficulty with France, notwithstanding the fears which so many then entertained; and it will do the same with Great Britain, in spite of our present apprehensions. Courage will keep her off; fear will bring her upon us. The assertion of our rights will command her respect; the fear to assert them will bring us her contempt. The question, then, with me, is the question of right, and not of fear! Is it right for us to make these grants on the Columbia? Has Great Britain just cause to be offended at it? These are my questions; and these being answered to my satisfaction, I go forward with the grants, and leave the consequences to follow at their pleasure.

I maintain that the passage of this bill, and these grants to the settlers, can give no just ground of offence to Great Britain; and this opinion is the regular deduction from the unanimous opinion of this chamber, that the title to the territory is in the United States. Surely the owner may do what he pleases with his own. But gentlemen say that the exercise of these rights is limited by the convention of 1818. Not so in my opinion, nor upon the words of the convention. Those words apply only to the usufruct of the territory—to rights of fishing, hunting, trading, and navigation. They do not affect pre-existing rights. They do not touch the question of sovereignty. They are, as the Senator from New Hampshire on my right [Mr. WOODBURY] has well shown, words which are found in many treaties, and which have no relation to the sovereign rights of the parties. They are, besides, found in our British treaty of the last summer, and apply to the portages belonging to the United States between the Lake Superior and the Lake of the Woods, the use of which is made free and open to each party. To say nothing of other portages, the Grand Portage itself is sufficient to raise the question, and to try it. That portage is within the acknowledged limits of the United States—even the limits fixed in the mutilating treaty of 1842. It is a portage of nine miles in length, and six miles within our limits; and, by the words of the late treaty, this portage is to be free and open to the use of both parties. Does this affect our sovereignty? Will it prevent us from granting the land? Will it prevent us from occupying and settling the Grand Portage—that great seat of trade and empire among the Indians—and placing a custom-house, a fort, and American settlers there? According to the argument of gentlemen, this will be the consequence. If their argument is good for the Columbia, it is good for the Grand Portage; and we are to be debarred forever from the use of that grand position. I say forever; for this part of the treaty of 1842 is perpetual; and it brings back the British Fur Company to this ancient seat of trade and power, from which Mr. Jay's treaty removed them forty years ago. Gentlemen must be prepared to go this length, if they adhere to their construction of the convention of 1818. They must deny us the exercise of territorial rights at the Grand Portage, and at thirty-six other portages on the west of Lake Superior, where the joint occupation of the British will be, as it is on the Columbia, an exclusive possession on their part; and where this treaty of 1842 grants them exemption from the payment of duties. The British possession of the Columbia is now sovereign and exclusive. Their convenient agent, the Hudson Bay Company, does everything for them; and the British Government has declared to ours that they will protect this company, and that on both sides of the river. This is insult and defiance to us. This company has built forts, erected mills, opened farms, stocked them with animals, and planted a colony. Their forts include a triangle of seven hundred miles on every side: one of them approaching the south pass in the Rocky Mountains—our gate through the mountain, and only two hundred and fifty miles from it. The British, through this company, (which is to them in North America, what the East India Company is to them in Asia,) have taken sovereign possession of territory unanimously declared on this floor to belong to us: and we are to be restrained from making grants of land to our settlers, lest we give offence to her. She is not to fear offending us, by taking possession of our territory; but we are to fear offending her, by using a little of our own! This is the effect of the argument, if not its words! And a parallel is run between her condition and ours, to show that she is ready for war, and we are not: and, therefore, we must do nothing. Sir, it is no fault of mine if we are not ready for war. I proposed to devote the surplus revenue to that object, instead of giving it to the States, to whom it has been a curse. If it had been so devoted, we should not now be without revenue to support the Government—without defence to resist aggression—without the means of protecting our rights, or commanding foreign respect. But, I do not yield to the argument. I will not fear Great Britain, because she is ready, and we are not ready, for war. If we have not all the means, we have the main means of war—those which command all other means—a courageous and patriotic population, ready to stake life and fortune in defence of the honor, the rights, and the interests of their country.

The fear of Great Britain is pressed upon us; at the same time her pacific disposition is enforced and insisted upon. And here, it seems to me, that gentlemen fall into a grievous inconsistency. While they dwell on the peaceable disposition of Great Britain, they show her ready to go to war with us for nothing, or even for our own! The Northeastern boundary is called a dispute for a few acres of barren land in a frozen region, worth nothing; yet we are called upon to thank God Almighty and Daniel Webster for saving us from a war about these few frozen and barren acres. Would Great Britain have gone to war with us for these few acres? and is that a sign of her pacific temper? The Columbia is admitted on all hands to be ours; yet gentlemen fear war with Great Britain if we touch it—worthless as it is in their eyes. Is this a sign of peace? Is it a pacific disposition to go to war with us, for what is our own; and which is, besides, according to their opinion, not worth a straw? If this peaceful? If it is, I should like to know what is hostile. The late special minister is said to have come here, bearing the olive branch of peace in his hand. Granting that the olive branch was in one hand, what was in the other? Was not the war question of impressment in the other? also, the war question of search, on the coast of Africa? also, the war question of the Columbia, which he refused to include in the peace treaty? Were not these three war questions in the other hand?—to say nothing of the Caroline, for which he refused atonement; and the Creole, which he says would have occasioned the rejection of the treaty, if named in it. All these war questions were in the other hand; and the special mission, having accomplished its peace object in getting possession of the military frontiers of Maine, has adjourned all the war questions to London, where we may follow them if we please. But there is one of these subjects for which we need not go to London—the Creole, and its kindred cases. The conference of Lord Ashburton with the Abolition Committee of New York shows that that question ceed not go to London—that England means to maintain all her grounds on the subject of slaves, nd that any treaty inconsistent with these grounds would be rejected. This is what he says:

"Lord Ashburton said that, when the delegation came to read is correspondence with Mr. Webster, they would see that he ad taken all possible care to prevent any injury being done to he people of color; that, if he had been willing to introduce an rticle including cases similar to that of the Creole, his Government would never have ratified it, as they will adhere to he great principles they have so long avowed and maintained; nd that the friends of the slave in England would be very atchful to see that no wrong practice took place under the ith article."

This is what his Lordship said in New York, nd which shows that it was not want of instructions to act on the Creole case, as alleged in Mr. Webster's correspondence, but want of inclination n the British Government to settle the case. The reaty would have been rejected, if the Creole case ad been named in it; and if we had had a protool showing that fact, I presume the important ote of Lord Ashburton would have stood for as ittle in the eyes of other Senators as it did in nine, and that the treaty would have found but ew supporters. The Creole case would not be dmitted into the treaty; and what was put in it, is o give the friends of the slaves in England a right o watch us, and to correct our wrong practices nder the treaty! This is what the protocol after he treaty informs us; and if we had had a protool before it, it is probable that there would have een no occasion for this conference with the New ork Abolitionists. Be that as it may, the peace nission, with its olive branch in one hand, brought budget of war questions in the other, and has arried them all back to London, to become the ubject of future negotiations. All these subjects re pregnant with danger. One of them will force tself upon us in five years—the search question—hich we have purchased off for a time; and when he purchase is out, we must purchase again, or ubmit to be searched, or resist with arms. I reeat it: the pacific England has a budget of war uestions now in reserve for us, and that we cannot escape them by fearing war. Neither nations nor individuals ever escaped danger by fearing it. They must face it, and defy it. An abandonment of a right, for fear of bringing on an attack, instead of keeping it off, will invitably bring on the outrage that is dreaded.

Other objections are urged to this bill, to which cannot agree. The distance is objected to it. It s said to be 18,000 miles by water, (around Cape Horn,) and above 3,000 miles by land and water, hrough the continent. Granted. The very distance, by Cape Horn, was urged by me, twenty ears ago, as a reason for occupying and fortifying he mouth of the Columbia. My argument was, hat we had merchant ships and ships of war in he North Pacific ocean; that these vessels were 0,000 miles from an Atlantic port; that a port on he western coast of America was indispensable o their safety; and that it would be suicidal in us to bandon the port we have there to any power, and especially to the most formidable and domineering aval power which the world ever saw. And I instanced the case of Commodore Porter, his prizes ost, and his own ship eventually captured in a neural port, because we had no port of our own to reeive and shelter him. The 20,000 miles distance, nd dangerous and tempestous cape to be doubled, were with me arguments in favor of a port on the western coast of America, and, as such, urged on his floor near twenty years ago. The distance hrough the continent is also objected to. It is said to exceed 3,000 miles. Granted. But it is further han that to Africa, where we propose to build up a colony of negroes out of our recaptured Africans. Our eighty-gun fleet is to carry her intercepted slaves to Liberia: so says the correspondence of the naval captains (Bell and Paine) with Mr. Webster. Hunting in couples with the British, at an expense of money (to say nothing of the loss of lives and ships) of $600,000 per annum, to recapture kidnapped negroes, we are to carry them to Liberia, and build up a black colony there, 4,000 miles from us, while the Columbia is too far off for a white colony! The English are to carry their redeemed captives to Jamaica, and make apprentices of them for life. We are to carry ours to Liberia; and then we must go to Liberia to protect and defend them. Liberia is 4,000 miles distant, and not objected to on account of the distance: the Columbia is not so far, and distance becomes a formidable objection.

The expense is brought forward as another objection, and repeated, notwithstanding the decisive answer it has received from my colleague. He has shown that it is but a fraction of the expense of the African squadron; that this squadron is the one-twelfth part of our whole naval establishment, which is to cost us seven millions of dollars per annum, and that the annual cost of the squadron must be near $600,000, and its expense for five years three millions. For the forts in the Oregon bill—forts which are only to be stockades and block-houses, for security against the Indians—for these forts, only $100,000 is appropriated; being the sixth part of the annual expense, and the thirtieth part of the whole expense, of the African fleet. Thus the objection of expense becomes futile and ridiculous. But why this everlasting objection of expense to everything Western? Our dragoons dismounted, because, they say, horses are too expensive. The Western rivers unimproved, on account of the expense. No Western armory, because of the expense. Yet hundreds of thousands, and millions, for the African squadron!

Another great objection to the bill is the land clause—the grants of land to the settler, his wife, and his children. Gentlemen say they will vote for the bill if that clause is stricken out; and I say, I will vote against it if that clause is stricken out. It is, in fact, the whole strength and essence of the bill. Without these grants, the bill will be worth nothing. Nobody will go three thousand miles to settle a new country, unless he gets land by it. The whole power of the bill is in this clause; and if it is stricken out, the friends of the bill will give it up. They will give it up now, and wait for the next Congress, when the full representation of the people, under the new census, will be in power, and when a more auspicious result might be expected.

Time is invoked, as the agent that is to help us. Gentlemen object to the present time, refer us to the future, and beg us to wait, and rely upon TIME and NEGOTIATIONS to accomplish all our wishes. Alas! time and negotiation have been fatal agents to us, in all our discussions with Great Britain. Time has been constantly working for her, and against us. She now has the exclusive possession of the Columbia; and all she wants is time, to ripen her possession into title. For above twenty years—from the time of Dr. Floyd's bill, in 1820, down to the present moment—the present time, for vindicating our rights on the Columbia, has been constantly objected to; and we were bidden to wait. Well, we have waited: and what have we got by it? Insult and defiance!—a declaration from the British ministers that large British interests have grown up on the Columbia during this time, which they will protect!—and a flat refusal from the olive-branch minister to include this question among those which his peaceful mission was to settle! No, sir; time and negotiation have been bad agents for us, in our controversies with Great Britain. They have just lost us the military frontiers of Maine, which we had held for sixty years; and the trading frontier of the Northwest, which we had held for the same time. Sixty years' possession, and eight treaties, secured these ancient and valuable boundaries: one negotiation, and a few days of time, have taken them from us! And so it may be again. The Webster treaty of 1842 has obliterated the great boundaries of 1783—placed the British, their fur company and their Indians, within our ancient limits: and I, for one, want no more treaties from the hand which is always seen on the side of the British. I go now for vindicating our rights on the Columbia; and, as the first step towards it, passing this bill, and making these grants of land, which will soon place the thirty or forty thousand rifles beyond the Rocky Mountains, which will be our effective negotiators.

SPEECH OF MR. BUTLER, OF KENTUCKY.

In the House of Representatives, January 11, 1843—On the proposition to restore the fine to General Jackson.

MR. SPEAKER: Although there is, perhaps, not a gentleman around me less in love with the music of his own voice within these walls, than I with mine, yet there are occasions—and this is one of them—on which I do not feel myself at liberty to follow the natural bent of my own inclination. It is known to you, sir, and to many others in this hall, that I belonged to the Southern army, commanded by General Jackson, in the years 1814 and 1815. It will, therefore, be presumed, and correctly presumed, that I am somewhat familiar with the leading facts and circumstances which led to the declaration and enforcement of martial law, and for which the fine proposed to be remitted by the bill now under consideration was inflicted. It is also known to you, sir—at least it is well known to my constituents—that I have ever been the warm personal and political friend of that distinguished gentleman. Nay, sir, that I was once, but not then, a member of his military family. Under all these circumstances, were I to remain silent, and listen to such a debate as that to which this subject has given rise, there could be but one of two opinions formed as to the cause of that silence. It would either be said that I deemed the conduct of General Jackson utterly indefensible, or that I shrunk from that defence. Neither of them shall be said in advance, whatever else may be said when I shall have taken my seat.

What, sir, is the proposition before us? Simply to restore to General Jackson the amount of a fine, inflicted, as he contends, for the performance of an act of imperative duty, and one essential to the service of the country. And yet, sir, I see with equal pain and surprise that this simple proposition, which ought to depend upon truth and justice alone, is fast assuming, if it has not already assumed, a decided party character. I am asked, on my right and on my left, why the Democratic party did not pass such a law when in power? Do gentlemen who make this inquiry wish to leave the inference that the Democratic party have shrunk from doing so? This no one does or can believe. Why should this be peculiarly a Democratic measure? Had the Whigs no part in the defence of New Orleans? Were none of them, or none of their friends, there? If they cherish no proud recollections of that glorious defence, and are willing to yield up all to the Democratic party, then, indeed, there might be some pretence for making this a party question. But, sir, I know it is far otherwise; I know that every patriot in the land feels his heart bound prouder within him, as his eye falls on that immortal page in his country's history; and he feels that such achievements are a nation's, not a party's wealth. Still I hear the question repeated on all sides, "why is this measure forced upon a Whig Congress?" It may be, sir, for the express purpose of affording that party the opportunity to prove to the world that justice and magnanimity are still to be found in its ranks; or it may be for precisely the opposite reason. I understand, however, it has been done in obedience to the voice of public sentiment—acting, no doubt, on the known wishes of General Jackson to be released from a fine which he believes unjust, and therefore, and therefore only, oppressive. If my wish were to make political capital, and I could consent to resort to such a measure for such a purpose, nothing could please me more than to witness the party bias attempted to be given to it. Sir, will your party, with all its knowledge and talents, never have the wisdom to appreciate the American people? Lay this question before them in your next canvass, and you will at least learn that ingratitude and injustice to those who have freely periled their lives in defence of their country form no part of their character.

Before I proceed farther upon the merits of the question under consideration, permit me to say a few words in reply to part of the speech of the venerable gentlemen, [Mr. ADAMS,]—not on its merits. I will first read from the Globe's report of that speech the following paragraph:

"Rumors were afloat—he could not, of course, vouch for their truth—that the great presidential question between the various divisions of the Democratic party was to be ultimately decided by General Jackson himself. It seemed to be given out that he was to be the president of the national Democratic convention; and who knew what the result would be? Such were the rumors which were afloat. From what the House had seen, it was clear that all the divisions of the party were humble suitors for the good-will or neutrality of General Jackson. He did not expressly assign the paragraph in the message of the President to that purpose. The President alone knew what were his motives; and, therefore, he (Mr. A.) would not say that this was a bid in the great auction. If it was, however, a bid, he would say that it was not a very good one. He thought the "war-worn veteran" would say that such a bid won't do. At any rate, he wished to have the trial made, by putting the bill in precisely the same terms recommended by the President, in order to see whether the "war-worn veteran" would take it."

Now, sir, I will not pretend to decide what influence General Jackson may have in future President-making. It is, however, well known—and to none better than the venerable gentleman [Mr. ADAMS] himself—that the old hero, in his day, was esteemed a most capital President-breaker. And even if it were true that, in one character, he has drawn support to this bill, no one can doubt that, in the other, he has excited against it a most deadly and unrelenting opposition. That the gentleman [Mr. ADAMS] cannot consistently oppose it on the usual grounds—the unwarrantable assumption of power—is manifest from the fact, that he has himself most triumphantly vindicated the same General from a similar exercise of power, on the ground of necessity, and in a much more questionable case. We are, therefore, to seek elsewhere for that gentleman's opposition; nor is it difficult to find. Had General Jackson retired to private life at the close of his military career—had he but worn meekly those honors which he won proudly, he might have gone down the vale of years followed by the prayers and blessings of all; his laurels growing fresher and greener at every step of his pilgrimage, until standing, as he now does, on the brink of the grave, they would have caught a bright reflection of the world beyond it. This bill would then have passed on its merits, and passed by acclamation. But, sir, he dared do otherwise. He dared throw his tall, straight shadow across the crooked path of mad ambition. He dared resist that combination, trick, and jugglery by which a Federal dynasty was foisted upon a free country. He dared appeal—and appeal successfully—from the people's servants to the people themselves. And, above all, sir, he dared strike to dust a corrupt moneyed monopoly, alike essential in every age and country to the existence of such a dynasty. This, sir, is the front of his offending—this has arrayed party vengeance against this bill.

The same venerable gentleman has also spoken of the sale of the office of President at public auction; and seems emulous to succeed my friend from Indiana, [Mr. THOMPSON,] who, a few days since, gave us a most amusing display of his talents as congressional auctioneer. This new auctioneer, too, has thought fit to change his rooms from the White House to the Hermitage. Now, sir, as we have learned from the venerable gentleman [Mr. ADAMS] the "rumor" that one ex-President is to dispose of the Democratic interest in the next election of Chief Magistrate, it is but fair to presume—from "rumor," of course—that the other ex-President may have some little influence in disposing of the Whig interest in the same office; and, if so, in requital for his important information, on the veritable authority of "rumor," I would advise him, by all means, when that interest is disposed of, to adhere to the good old "rumored" precedent of 1824—or perhaps, sir, sealed proposals will suit quite as well.

Whether I ought to take any, or what notice I ought to take of the grovelling anecdote of the traitor Arnold, applied by the venerable ex-President [Mr. ADAMS] to an old successful competitor for the first office in the world, long after that competitor had quitted the political arena forever,—is a matter of much doubt. I will simply say of this attack, that it is of but too close affinity with that made by the notorious Knight of Gadshill on the soldier corse of the gallant Percy—and will be felt about as much.

I will now, sir, (if I can be pardoned by the House for this, to me, most unpleasant digression,) turn to what I conceive the true merits of the question—the propriety of the declaration and enforcement of martial law, by General Jackson, at New Orleans. When I speak of martial law, I will not be understood as meaning the law establishing rules and articles for the government of the army of the United States. That law is at all times in force, and acquires no new power from a simple declaration of that fact. I mean that martial law of paramount control, as it is understood in all countries, and which may not unaptly be defined "the common law of camps," springing out of, and commensurate with, the exigencies of armies in the field—exigencies which cannot be foreseen, and therefore cannot be guarded against in advance, by fixed legislation. That Gen. Jackson had the constitutional power formally to declare or enforce such a law—to supersede the civil for such military rule—I shall not contend for him; nor has he ever so contended for himself. If his justification is to be found at all—and that it is, I have no doubt—it must be sought for amidst the dangers and difficulties by which he found himself surrounded. I know, sir, there are some who would fain persuade the world that no alternative, however direful, can justify, or even excuse, a resort to such a course. I have now a pamphlet before me, signed "A Kentuckian," written with some ability, in which the author labors to enforce this doctrine. A single and a very short paragraph from this work will serve to show his position:

"The great national interest with us—the great point of discipline—is, and ever must be, implicit and devoted obedience to the law."

Based on this dogma, he labors to prove that, while General Jackson was whipping the British, he was in fact levying war against his own country—because he took the necessary measures to suppress mutiny and treason in his own camp!—and winds up by saying, "It is plain, unmixed treason."

Who this learned gentleman is, I do not care to know. From his unsparing bitterness, he might well be taken for some political renegade, vainly attempting to win the confidence of his new friends, by assailing the leader of his old ones. Certain I am he is no soldier, and knows nothing of the hardships or casualties of war. If he did, he would also know that an army rarely marches by day, or halts by night, without necessarily breaking some law, or trampling on some right. It is more than probable this gentleman is some judge, or ex-judge, who, wrapping himself in his robes of office, and hugging to his heart this darling Utopia, "implicit obedience," fondly imagines he can convince the American people that it were infinitely better New Orleans had been sacked and burnt, than saved by martial law. This is but the doctrine attempted to be inculcated in the pamphlet referred to, when carried into practice; and, whatever may be thought of it now, I have no doubt it would have been received with acclamation by the entire British army at the time. In this shape, then, let it go before the world. I, at least, will waste no argument to prove its folly or its falsity.

To such as admit that a crisis may arise, in the prosecution of a war, in which it may not only become proper, but even an act of imperative duty in the commanding general, to set aside or disregard for a time the established laws and usages of the country he serves, I have a few considerations to address. To such, and such only, (and I know they constitute a large majority even of the Whig party,) I shall attempt to prove that such a crisis did, in fact, exist at the time martial law was declared, and as long as it was enforced by General Jackson at New Orleans.

In order to do this with any hope of success, it will be essential to understand the theatre on which he was compelled to act, the difficulties and dangers that surrounded him, and the means placed in his hands to meet them; and this will require me to enter more into detail than I fear I shall be able to do in the time allotted me.

General Jackson had just closed his Indian wars, and with a brilliancy and success rarely equalled, and never surpassed, in any age or country. Such, at least, was his reputation, that the President thought fit to confer on him the rank of major general in the United States army, and intrust to his command one of the most important, because one of the most defenceless and unprotected, military districts in the Union. I do not remember its exact geographical limits. It is enough to say that it extended, on the gulf, from the Perdido to the Sabine; and that its inland border was skirted, almost from one end to the other, by numerous and warlike Indian tribes; several of them but recently at open war, and known still to be hostile: a mere fragment of one of which has, for the last six years, kept a force larger than that under his command in constant employment; and is now barely conquered, if conquered at all. On the 7th of November Pensacola was taken, which, for a time, put an end to those wars, by cutting off the communication between the Indians and British. For although this town was at once restored to its owners, the Spaniards were taught the necessity of preserving a strict neutrality between nations who, though at peace with them, were at war with each other; and were also taught—what they had previously denied—that they only wanted the will, and not the power, to enforce that neutrality. This, too, was another necessary stretch of power, which called down on General Jackson the vengeance of the "implicit obedience" party; still the nation at large justified him. Pensacola taken, he at once repaired to Mobile, and spent some days in putting that frontier in the best state of defence his limited means would permit, and then proceeded by land to New Orleans. It may seem a matter of surprise that he should have taken this long and difficult route at such a season of the year, requiring some six or eight days to perform it, when he might have reached the same point in two days by water. I can only account for it, from the known importance he attached to the defence of the Mobile frontier; his belief that this was one of the most vulnerable points from which New Orleans could be assailed; that the British, by drawing to their support the numerous and powerful tribes of hostile Indians in that region, might pass by land to the Mississippi, above New Orleans, and, posting themselves on either bank, cut off all communication with the upper country. Hence he felt the importance of possessing a minute knowledge of the topography and resources of the country through which the enemy would necessarily pass, should that plan be adopted.

Be this as it may, on the first day of December he reached that city, destined to be saved by his skill and valor, and to give immortality to his name. Travel-worn, and wasted with disease as he was—for, in the late campaign, he had often been barely able to sit his horse—he gave not an hour to rest, but entered at once upon the active duties of the field. On the day of his arrival, he reviewed the city troops; and, on the next, set out upon a military reconnoissance of his position, not merely of the city and its environs. He descended the Mississippi, and examined, in person, the wild and minute passes of Barrataria on the one side, and Lake Borgne on the other; planned and directed many improvements and alterations in the works at Fort St. Philip, the key of the Mississippi; and then returned to New Orleans about the 10th of the month, to calculate and improve his means of defence, and weigh the difficulties that surrounded him. His means were few, indeed, and easily ascertained. His difficulties were innumerable, and only to be fully appreciated by those who saw and felt them. I possess no exact data on which to estimate the precise force available at this time for the defence of the city; nor at the moment when martial law was declared. I have, however, the official report, which will be found both in Latour and Eaton, giving the exact number of each corps engaged in the battle of the 23d, as follows:

Seventh and forty-fourth regiments United States infantry	763
Company of marines and artillery	92
Plauche's battalion	280
Daquin's freemen of color	208
Mississippi dragoons under Col. Hinds, not in the action	186

From which, if we deduct the commands of Coffee and Hinds, (who had not then arrived,) it will leave the available force, at the time martial law was declared, only 1,333; even if we can suppose there was no increase from the 14th to the 23d.

It will, no doubt, be matter of surprise to all, that in a battle fought in sight of New Orleans, and one on which, all admit, its fate was staked, that only 488 residents of Louisiana were engaged; and that 208 of them were free men of color. Were there no other persons in that city or its vicinity able to bear arms? and, if so, where were they at this important hour? are questions that will naturally suggest themselves to every one, on learning this fact. Sir, for all the purposes of military defence, I have no hesitation in believing, with the information then before him, that General Jackson would much sooner have defended a city void of inhabitants, and surrounded by a desert. And here I wish to be most distinctly understood as not intending to cast the slightest imputation on the patriotism of the citizens of Louisiana in general. What I mean, then, in connexion with what I have just said, is, that the predominance of slave over white population was such, and such its character, as to more than neutralize any aid that could be fairly expected from that white population, had every man able to bear arms been both a patriot and a soldier. What I here say of slavery in Louisiana, I by no means apply to slavery in general. On the contrary, I would much sooner trust the slaves of my own, and of several other States, to defend this nation in her darkest hour of need, than one half of that whining brood of sickly sympathizers, who are uniting themselves with foreign societies, whose real purpose is the destruction of this Union, under the specious pretence of bettering the condition of a class who, in all the essentials of ease, comfort, and happiness, are infinitely better off than most of themselves. The slaves of this State were, at the period of the late war—whatever they may be now—of quite a different class. Louisiana was then (if I may use the term without offence) a sort of servile Liberia, into which all the vilest slaves of all the States were sent, and often for the purpose of screening them from condign punishment. It may, then, be readily conceived with what reluctance men would quit their homes, leaving their families at the mercy of such beings, subject to be operated upon by such a foe—a foe then in league with every desperate band of roving and lawless savages that could be seduced into their bloody service, reckless of the well-known fact that, in that service, they would spare neither age, sex, nor condition. I shall, however, doubtless, be told that none of these evil consequences ensued. Let it be borne in mind that I am now only speaking of things in the light in which they naturally and properly presented themselves at the time, and not that which they have since assumed. As far as my information goes, the British made no attempt to excite the slaves either to murder or revolt. No, sir, they pursued a very different course. Like Gen. Jackson, they had been taught to believe that a large portion of the citizens of Louisiana, and particularly those of French and Spanish extraction, were inimical to the Union. To these, therefore, they addressed proclamations, assuring them that they came as friends, and not as enemies; and promising security and protection both to themselves and their property. These facts, with many others, had a natural tendency to mislead the commanding general as to the extent of that disaffection. Louisiana was, moreover, a purchased province; and we are told by Mr. Martin, the historian mainly relied on by the opposers of this bill, that the transfer was attended with no little gloom and discontent. This was a natural, and by no means an unpatriotic feeling. The allegiance of the heart is not to be purchased. The father-land is a green spot in the waste of every man's memory, which visits him in his dreams, and comes to him in his day-dreams. How much of that feeling still remained, was yet to be seen. If the embers were not extinct, here was a most propitious opportunity of kindling the flame anew. The Spanish inhabitants were told that England and Spain were fast friends, and for years had been warring side by side, in the same great cause; and the French were told, that that great cause included the restoration of the legitimate sovereign of France to the throne of his ancestors. What sane man would undertake to say that all these appeals would fall on cold unwilling ears; particularly when, in all human probability, the British had ample means to make good their promises both of protection and security?

But there was still a third class, who neither owed nor professed any allegiance to this nation. The city and country were filled with foreigners and strangers from every clime and zone, of every tribe and tongue, whose sole business was to better their condition—having more or less interest staked on the result of the coming contest. Who would pretend to vouch that these "lookers on in Vienna" were all good men and true, and ready to "do or die" in a cause not their own? Or who would even vouch that they would not join the enemy, who seemed to have victory already written on his banner? Sir, had one-half of the population of this country pledged themselves for the patriotism of the other, it could not have been expected that a man as deeply read in that intricate volume—the human heart—and as well acquainted with all its springs of action, as General Jackson is known to be, would have given it a moment's credence. But General Jackson was not left to speculate upon his general knowledge of men and things. He was warned and forewarned previous to reaching Louisiana—and that, too, from the very highest authority in the land—that it was filled with spies and traitors. True, Mr. Martin attempts to show that General Jackson had been the informer, and succeeded in imbuing the mind of Claiborne with suspicions not his own. He says (speaking of General Jackson) "unfortunately, he had been surrounded, from the moment of his arrival, by persons from the ranks of the opposition to Claiborne, Hall, and the State Government; and it was soon discovered that he had become impressed with the idea that a great part of the population of Louisiana was disaffected, and the city full of traitors and spies." It appears that such were his sentiments as early as the 8th of September; for, in a letter of Claiborne, which he has since published, the Governor joins in the opinion, and writes to him: "I agree with you, that our country is full of spies and traitors." And yet this impartial historian had before him both Letour and Eaton, each of them containing the defence offered by General Jackson on his trial before Judge Hall: in which were numerous extracts of letters from Governor Claiborne to himself, solemnly warning him against these very traitors. From one of them, written just one month prior to that from which Mr. Martin has garbled the line above quoted, I make the following extract:

"I have reason to calculate on the patriotism of the interior and western counties. I know, also, there are many faithful citizens in New Orleans; but there are others in whose attachment to the United States I ought not to confide. Upon the whole, sir, I cannot disguise the fact, that, if Louisiana should be attacked, we must principally depend for security upon the prompt movements of the regular force under your command, and the militia of the Western States and Territories."

I will also make a quotation from this same letter of the 8th of September, which did not answer the purpose of Mr. Martin, and which he, therefore, found it convenient to suppress. Speaking of New Orleans, the Governor says: "There is in this city a much greater spirit of disaffection than I had anticipated; and among the faithful Louisianians, there is a despondency which palsies all my preparations." Mr. Martin proceeds: "The Governor was not unwilling to increase his own merit by magnifying the obstacles he had to surmount; he therefore stated, in his correspondence with Jackson, every opposition he met with; and did not fail to represent every one, who did not think as he did, as inimical to the country." Here we have the strange spectacle of Jackson being at the same time surrounded "by persons from the ranks of the opposition to Claiborne, Hall, and the State Government," and Claiborne himself constituting one of that opposition. In modern parlance "the General seems to have stolen the Governor," and arrayed him not only against his friends, but against himself.

But Governor Claiborne was not the only source from which General Jackson received his impressions of the want of fidelity among the inhabitants of Louisiana, as Mr. Martin himself shows. He proceeds: "Those who immediately surrounded Jackson on his arrival, with a view to enhance his reliance on them, availed themselves of every opportunity to increase his sense of danger." And who were those men? At their head stood Livingston and Duncan—men who would rank high, in any age or country, for talents and probity; who had lived long in the city, and had the very best means of correct information. Can it, then, be a cause of wonder that General Jackson believed the country was full of "spies and traitors?" or a matter of reproach that he resorted to the most energetic measures to render treason abortive? But was there, in truth, no treachery? That there was much less than the General believed to exist, I feel great pleasure in conceding. But that there was still enough to demand all his vigilance and skill, none ought to deny. For proof of this fact, I refer to Latour, who is himself a Creole of the country, and whose prejudices and feelings are, therefore, all presumed to be in favor of its citizens, and opposed to whatever may be construed to their prejudice. After describing a village on the left bank, and near the mouth of Bayou Bienvenue, which he says "contained thirty or forty fishermen, almost all Spaniards or Portuguese," ten of whose names he gives, as he says, "to consign them to execration and infamy," he proceeds: "These all were known to have aided the British in disembarking their troops, serving as pilots on board their vessels and boats, and acting as spies from the period of their arrival on the coast." (See pages 82 and 83.)

I also refer to the following letter from Mr. Charles K. Blanchard, of New Orleans, to General Jackson, which will be found in Eaton, p. 445:

"SIR: I have the honor, agreeably to your request, to state to your excellency the substance of a conversation that occurred between Quartermaster Peddle, of the British army, and myself, on the 11th instant, on board his Britannic Majesty's ship Herald. Quartermaster Peddie observed, that the commanding officers of the British forces were daily in the receipt of every information from the city of New Orleans which they might require, in aid of their operations for the completion of the objects of the expedition; that they were perfectly acquainted with the situation of every part of our forces, the manner in which the same was situated, the number of our fortifications, their strength, position, &c. As to the battery on the left bank of the Mississippi, he described its situation, its distance from the main post, and promptly offered me a plan of the works. He furthermore stated, that the above information was received from seven or eight persons in the city of New Orleans, from whom he could at any hour procure every information necessary to promote his Majesty's interest."

If there was treason here—and that there was, no one can with truth deny—then never was there on earth a country in which that treason might play its part with more security and success, or which demanded more prudence and skill to detect and to disarm it. Look, sir, at the country in the vicinity of New Orleans: a narrow strip of land on either side of the river, varying from a half to two miles in width, pent in on all sides by swamps almost impervious to the foot of man, and intersected by innumerable bayous and canals, connecting the Mississippi with the surrounding gulfs and bays and lakes. But, in order fully to appreciate the view of the case it is my object to impress, it is important to understand something of the plan adopted by the commanding general for the defence of the city He had obviously but two, between which to choose: one was, to collect his entire force in its vicinity, wait the approach of the enemy, and settle the fate of the city by one bloody death-struggle. This he wisely declined, because he would still have it as a dernier resort, should he fail in the other. That plan was to keep his main force at or near New Orleans, seize on all the avenues of approach, though at such a distance from it as to cover and protect as many of the well disposed inhabitants as he could, without weakening his position; at the same time keeping in check those he dared not trust; holding the enemy at arm's length as long as possible; and, when able to do so no longer, falling back, and selecting the best ground on which to give him battle. From what I have said, it will be seen that there was a complete cordon of pickets or outposts surrounding the city, occupying all the avenues of approach to it, and as thoroughly cutting off all communication between the space included within this cordon and the balance of the world, as though it had been circumvallated by a wall or ditch, so long as these pickets could be maintained; and all proved true. This it was that rendered the city at all times not only a camp, but the very heart and centre of that camp. But how easy was it for treason to defeat even this noble plan of defence? Only the river termini of these bayous could be occupied by the American army; while the enemy, from their superior naval power, would of course seize on their entrances into the gulf. No intermediate point could be occupied by either, as it was one entire morass. In this state of things, it is evident that the British had the power, not only to select their own point of attack, but to make as many feints as they might think fit; and that it would be impossible to distinguish the one from the other, until they should reach the firm ground near the bank of the Mississippi. All, then, that was wanting on their part, in order to insure success, was to deceive the commanding general by a false attack, either above or below the city, and thereby draw his main force in that direction, while the real approach should be made on the opposite side. All this, had it not been restrained by the most rigid means, treachery would have attempted, and might not have done so in vain.

Having said thus much of the condition of things at home, let us now turn our eyes for a moment in the opposite direction. About the period of which I am now speaking, Gen. Jackson received intelligence of an undoubted character that the enemy was near at hand. Eighty vessels, filled with troops and munitions of war, were already off Pensacola, and as many more were hourly expected. Believing the entire control of all the resources of the country to be indispensable to its defence, and that these resources could not be applied to so good a purpose; believing, also, that unrestrained liberty of person—when applied to such as would, from necessity or choice, be included within the city to be defended, or the adjacent territory covered by his posts—to be utterly incompatible with either discipline or safety, General Jackson applied to the Legislature, then in session, to suspend for a time the writ of habeas corpus. That body, like himself, seem to have felt the importance of the crisis; for they not only passed a law closing up all the courts of justice, but also one laying an embargo on all the vessels in the port of New Orleans. Even Judge Hall, yielding to the pressure of the emergency, thought fit—without law, or trial, or bail—to discharge all the prisoners committed under process of the United States, no matter what their crimes, in order to fill the ranks of the army. Still, the proposal to suspend the writ of habeas corpus met with opposition, and was yet under discussion, when, on the 14th of December, the battle of the lakes was fought, by which we lost all the gun-boats on the station, and gave the enemy unlimited control of the entire coast, and full power to select his point of attack. This was, indeed, a most critical, a most startling moment. Recollect that neither Coffee, Carroll, Adair, nor Hind had yet arrived; and that I have before said General Jackson's available force for the defence of the city was but about 1,300 efficient men. That of the enemy was, of course, unknown, and variously reported from twelve to twenty thousand. One thing, however, was certain: the same victorious army, though greatly increased in numbers, that a few months before had wrapped this proud Capitol in flames, and laid siege to Baltimore—then the third city in the Union—was there. The same army that had marched unscathed through this populous region, abounding in resources, both of men and munitions, twenty-fold greater than General Jackson could command, was to be encountered, and the trial hour was at hand. This, sir, was no time to waste in protracted debate upon measures to be taken; no time, either, for making laws, or unravelling the "nice quillets" of laws already made. Dismay and confusion reigned predominant. The boldest doubted, and the timid despaired, of success. The commanding general saw that the fate of the city rested upon himself alone; and that, without a resort to extraordinary measures, it must inevitably be lost. He did not hesitate a moment; but met this, as he has done every other emergency, promptly, not blindly. Yes, sir, at this startling moment, when fresh dangers and difficulties were hourly thronging upon him—when the enemy, proud in their discipline, and confident in their numbers, were pressing forward as to certain victory—when the circle of fate seemed closing rapidly around him, and its very billows already breaking at his feet—as the only means of escape left him, he ventured to declare martial law. He saw that the arm of the civil authority, though nerveless for all purposes of good, might, if unrestrained, become potent in evil, (nor were his fears vain, as experience has proven,) and, therefore, he ventured to put it aside, as unsuited for the times, and to substitute martial law in its stead. He knew that if evil should grow out of it, that evil would fall most heavily on himself; but if good followed, that good would be his country's alone. Still, sir, he did not hesitate. For him, such an alternative had no terrors. The defence of a noble city had been intrusted to his skill and valor; and he would have felt himself a traitor to that trust, had he sacrificed it, by "implicit obedience," under the pressing exigencies of war, to laws formed for "piping times of peace." Sir, it were just as vain to hope for such obedience, at such an hour, as for rigid etiquette on board of a sinking man-of-war.

But whatever may be said as to the power or necessity of declaring martial law, none who witnessed its operation can doubt for a moment as to its beneficial results. All saw that a bold hand had taken the helm—whether rightfully or not, no one thought fit to inquire. All eyes were turned upon one man; and that man, looking as proud and unbending as though he were the very genius of the storm that was thickening around him, with the power to hush it by a whisper. The boldest heart beat bolder, and the coward felt himself possessed of spirit not his own. All felt the necessity of strict and prompt obedience. Confidence was renewed, and order sprung out of chaos. A guide star rose out of the gloom, and led the way to victory; and such a victory, sir, as finds no parallel even in the proud annals of this nation. All will at once conclude that I am alluding to the memorable 8th of January. Not so. I mean that of the 23d of December, in which General Jackson, at the head of two thousand undisciplined troops, met in the open field, and repulsed, more than double that number of England's choicest veterans. I am particular in saying that General Jackson led this attack; for it was but yesterday that a Whig friend of mine, and a member of this House, asked me, in sober earnest, whether the old chief was really there. Yes, sir, he was, in good truth, there; or, my word for it, none of his army would have been there. And now, Mr. Speaker, after a lapse of more than a quarter of a century, comes this cold hypercritical age to sit in judgment on the military character of a man who dared fight and win such a battle. Yes, sir, men who would turn pale at the flash of a musket, even if fired by themselves, coolly tell us that, notwithstanding General Jackson saved New Orleans against hopeless odds, and contrary to the expectation of a large majority of all who understood his true condition, still he was entirely deceived as to what he believed one of the main causes of that success. Of this class is the Kentucky pamphleteer. He first assumes that the only object of martial law was to prevent correspondence with the enemy, and then proceeds: "But if that was his object, he entirely failed in accomplishing what was intended; for he himself tells us it was ascertained from the British officers, after the peace, that they were fully informed of everything that happened in the city, from the first to last." This gentleman has certainly made a mistake, and whetted his sword on the back instead of the edge. If his argument is to have any weight, it must concede what its author has most strenuously denied throughout his entire pamphlet—that there were spies and traitors in New Orleans. And still it by no means follows, because these spies and traitors found means to elude the many precautions resorted to for the purpose of preventing their communication with the enemy, that these precautions were either unwise or improper. I leave this question to be settled by a liberal community—between a quibbling lawyer and a fighting general.

I now proceed to the second point in issue—the propriety of continuing martial law. I am well aware, sir, that there is a much greater contrariety of opinion on this point, than on that to which I have been calling the attention of the House. I am inclined to believe that a large majority even of the Whig party consider the declaration of martial law as not only justifiable, but commendable; many of them also admit that it was properly enforced. A large portion of them, however, who justify its declaration on the ground of necessity, contend that it was continued too long, and after that necessity had ceased. To such, I beg leave to present a few considerations touching that necessity. The opinion of the commanding general is certainly entitled to great weight. To deny this, would be to contend that the pilot who has successfully guided his vessel over the darkling waves, and amidst the wildest tempests, is utterly unfit to decide upon the termination of the very tempests which he has so successfully buffeted. I need not say, sir, that in his opinion, and with all the lights he possessed, the continuance of martial law was just as essential to retain the advantages he had gained over the enemy, as its declaration was to win them in the first instance. True, sir, there was not that present and visible emergency. The enemy was not in sight; but was the necessity for vigilance and strict discipline, therefore, the less, when it was known that he lay in striking distance, able, and no doubt willing, to turn to his advantage every occurrence in the American army, if any should happen by which he might hope to wash out the disgrace he had sustained? As much weight as this opinion has with me, and ought to have with all who wish to form an impartial judgment, I do not intend to press it on this House. It is my purpose to meet the opponents of this bill upon a simple history of facts, which none of them will find it convenient to deny. When do they say martial law should have ceased its sway? Certainly not immediately after the battle of the 8th of January; for although the enemy were defeated with most terrible slaughter, leaving one-fourth of their whole number engaged, and three out of four of their generals dead, or wounded on the field, and the rest were seen still, sir, although they fled fast, they did not flee far. They soon recovered of their panic, and, resuming their old position, continued to growl back defiance from their deep-mouthed guns. Notwithstanding their heavy loss, they still more than doubled the force by which they had been defeated. General Jackson's effective force on the left bank of the Mississippi was, when the battle began, 3,700; that of the enemy was, at the same time, estimated at 9,000. None will then say that martial law should have ceased on the 8th, nor at any time while the enemy occupied their position in sight of our lines. Certainly not on the 17th of the same month, while they were yet bombarding Fort St. Philip, which commanded the Mississippi, and which taken, or passed, would have enabled their vessels of war to reach New Orleans, and to have laid it in ashes in an hour after reaching it. Nor yet on the 12th of February, when they were receiving the capitulation of Fort Bowyer, which left uncovered the bay and city of Mobile, and gave the enemy command of what I have before said was the most secure and certain point from which to renew their operations against New Orleans, by calling to their aid the numerous bordering tribes of hostile Indians. No, sir; not even then; but the moment the first news of peace reached New Orleans. So, at least, say the opporers of this bill, with one accord.

> Baffled and broke, and rushing back > To ocean, on their own red track—

This news was received on the night of the 18th of February, was brought by Mr. Livingston, and came direct from the enemy. It is true, sir, there is an attempt made by Mr. Martin, and all others who have thought fit to believe him, and him only, to show that the same information was received from a different channel about the same time. The truth is, that Lord Cochrane's letter to General Jackson reached him, by the mouth of the Mississippi, a few days after his verbal communication of the same fact by Mr. Livingston, who came by the nearer lake route. Was this information, coming direct from the enemy, such as ought to have produced any change or relaxation in the measures of the American General? The enemy, who had in the mean time received a large reinforcement—equal, and more than equal, to the number he had lost in battle—had entire command of the neighboring seas—and lay within a day's sail of New Orleans. If his intentions were peaceful, and his information such as he could rely on himself, why did he not propose a cessation of hostilities to General Jackson, through Mr. Livingston? The fact that he did not do so, was, of itself, well calculated to make the impression that it was a mere stratagem of war; and if General Jackson, depending on such information, had relaxed his discipline, or disbanded his army, and thereby lost New Orleans, the very men who are now hunting him down for the course he deemed it prudent to pursue, would have denounced him as a traitor for corresponding with, and taking counsel of, the enemy. Instead, however, of this report forming any pretext for the relaxation of discipine, it created a strong necessity for its more rigid enforcement. It was busily circulated mong the soldiery, that a treaty of peace had been concluded and ratified between the two countries, and that there was no longer any necessity for their continuing in the field; and they, of course, soon grew restless and impatient of restraint. Men for whom war had no terrors, now that the foe had disappeared, and the excitement produced by his presence had subsided, soon became tired of the necessary drudgery of the field. Their thoughts naturally turned from war to peace, and their own firesides rose temptingly and beautifully before them. The city troops, who should have been the last, were the first to manifest a spirit of insubordination. Many claimed leave to return to the city; and it is contended that they were entitled to this indulgence, as their families or friends resided there. The gay carnival season, too, was drawing to a close; and their national love of pleasure (for they were mostly of French origin) was too strong for their patriotism. Not having succeeded in their application to Gen. Jackson, many, who were known to be American citizens, applied to, and received protection of, the French consul, who invariably certified them to be citizens of France. Armed with these certificates, they demanded their discharge, leaving their brother soldiers from distant States to defend the very firesides which they were so eager to enjoy.

Such an example at such a time would have dissolved the army. An entire regiment, with the exception only of fifteen men, who were left to guard the very avenue by which the enemy had made his approach, had already abandoned that important position; and others, equally important, were partially deserted. In such a crisis, the commanding general could not hesitate. History, pregnant with warning, lay open to his view. Capua of old rose naturally before him; and the victor of Cannæ, with his rent garlands, admonished him that the ease and luxury of a petty town had conquered an army that had overcome both the Romans and the Alps. And was he to permit a grateful city, which had just been rescued from destruction by his own and the valor of his army, to become to that army what Capua had been to an invading enemy? Was he to permit that city, even rith the hand of kindness, to pluck from his own nd his soldiers' brows the very laurels they had von in her defence? No, sir; his path of duty lay lainly before him, and he pursued it without de- ay or hesitation. All foreigners who had taken rotection under the French consul were ordered o leave New Orleans forthwith, and the consul vas ordered to go with them; for they were all oing their best to fill it with mutiny and dissen- ion. Such as claimed to be foreigners, but who vere found, upon an examination of the poll-books, o have voted at an election then but recently held n the city, were ordered to the lines, and compelled o perform the duty of soldiers. This course, how- ver necessary and proper in itself, was well cal- ulated to create discontent among the friends of hat class to whom it particularly applied; and vhen perverted, (as it was,) to extend that dis- ontent throughout the army. At this most fa- orable conjuncture, Louallier and Judge Hall nade their appearance. I do not say they acted n concert, although this charge was made and elieved by many at the time. They are now oth in the grave; and I intend to say nothing of ither, not warranted by proof, and essential to the nerits of this case. Neither of them had raised a and in defence of the country. Judge Hall, who, ve are told by his admirers, (and I shall not con- radict them,) was a mild, amiable man, left the ity just before the British were expected; when onfusion and dismay were seizing on all ranks nd orders of men, which his presence and ex- mple might have done much to allay, and which is flight was but too well calculated to increase. Louallier, on the contrary, remained in the city. Still, sir, with the enemy before his eyes, and their annon thundering daily and nightly in his ears, e struck not a blow in her defence. No; not even n the first battle, when he saw his countrymen going orth to combat against double their numbers of the est troops that Europe could boast, and when an rmed man was worth his weight in gold. True, hose gentlemen wereboth exempts; for one was a egislator, and the other a judge. In this condi- ion of things, and on the 3d of March, Louallier's ublication arraigning the course of the command- ng general, in the severest manner, as oppressive nd unjust, exciting the troops to mutiny, and giv- ng the enemy full notice of the extent to which it lready prevailed, made its appearance in the Lou- siana Gazette. His friends have contented them- elves with calling this publication ill-timed and mprudent; General Jackson has designated it by much more appropriate, but far less glossing terms.

On the 5th of March, Louallier was put under arrest, and a court-martial ordered for his trial. Of his trial, my time will not permit me to speak; nor is it at all necessary, as it forms no one of the causes assigned by Judge Hall for inflicting the fine now under consideration. On the same day a writ of habeas corpus was sued out in favor of Louallier; and on that day, Judge Hall made the usual official endorsement, requiring General Jack- son to appear before him, and show cause for his detention. General Jackson, instead of answering, retained the writ, and arrested the Judge. For this arrest and this detention the fine was inflicted. Recollect, sir, that martial law was just as much in force on this day, as on the day it was first declared. Recollect, also, what I have before said, that the only news of peace had come direct from a de- feated enemy; that this enemy, greatly reinforced, lay within a few hours' sail of New Orleans; and that no proposition for an armistice had been made by the British commander.

It is part of the history of the country, not to be controverted, that information of the treaty of Ghent first reached this city on the 14th of Feb- ruary, 1815. The following circular of Mr. Monroe, announcing that information, was at once prepared to be sent to the different commanding officers throughout the Union:

"DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Feb. 14, 1815.

"SIR: It is with great satisfaction I inform you that a treaty of peace was concluded between the United States and Great Britain, on the 24th day of December last. A copy of the treaty was received to-day by Mr. Carroll, has been examined by the President, and will, I have no doubt, be ratified. I give you this information, that hostilities may immediately cease between our troops and those of Great Britain.

"I have the honor to be,

"Your most obedient servant,

"JAMES MONROE."

A copy of this circular was addressed to General Jackson, and a special courier despatched, for the purpose of insuring its speedy and safe delivery; but, on opening the packet, he found, instead of a communication announcing peace, an order to raise troops for a more vigorous prosecution of the war. Suppose, sir, this circular had been duly forwarded, and duly received: it was but a simple annunciation that a treaty of peace had been negotiated between the two countries, and not that it had been ratified by either. It wanted the confirmation of both, to make it of any avail; and it might still be rejected by both or either of the contracting parties. What is the effect of such a treaty, under the laws of nations? Will any gentleman on this floor under- take to say that, by these laws, the condition of belligerents would be in the slightest degree al- tered by it? None, I feel well assured. General Jackson had, however, received, from other sources, such information as satisfied him that a treaty had in fact been negotiated, and such as to create the hope that it had been ratified. This information, loose, and in advance of the truth, as it was, he at once communicated to General Lambert, and proposed a cessation of hostilities. How did the British General meet this proposition? The fol- lowing extract from his letter, in reply, will best answer the interrogatory:

"His instructions would not allow him to enter into any written stipulation, or give publicity officially to a cessation of hostilities, until he received the intelligence from an accredited person from the British Government of the treaty having been ratified and exchanged, authorizing him to carry it into execu- tion."

What more could General Jackson have done? Was he to disarm, while an enemy of thrice his force stood cased in steel, and ready for the combat? If he had done so, and General Lambert had taken New Orleans—which, as I have said, in the then state of the pending negotiation, he had the unques- tioned right to do—what would have followed? Lambert would have received the order of knight- hood from the British Government, and General Jackson the well-merited scorn and contempt of the American people.

The attitude in which he found himself placed by the non-arrival of Mr. Monroe's letter, and the various conjectures which were formed as to its real character, by those around him, rendered his condition embarrassing in the extreme. He how- ever ventured to disband such of the Louisiana militia as had been levied in mass. They added but little to his efficient force, and had been called out in haste, and were but ill prepared for service. The following beautiful extract from his address to these troops, on the occasion, will serve to show the conflict in his mind between his duty to the country and his desire to comply with the wishes of his troops: "Although the commanding gen- eral has not received official advice that the state of war has ceased by the ratification of a treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain, he has persuasive evidence of the fact, and credits it at the risk of being misguided by his wishes." But why (ask those who are determined to oppose him, right or wrong,) discharge part of his army, and still continue martial law? I have already given the reason for discharging these troops; and surely the reduction of his force can form no pretence of excuse for relaxing the discipline of his diminished numbers, on whom the whole bur- den would necessarily fall.

But I am admonished that the sands of my al- lotted hour are nearly out, and that I must draw to a close. On the 13th of March official intelli- gence of the ratification of a treaty of peace duly arrived; and none pretend that General Jackson hesitated a moment longer to yield to civil au- thority and disband his army. Why should he have delayed? What was "a little brief authority" to him at any time, and particularly at a time like this? He had scarcely felt the cheer of his own fireside for the last three years, (and no man loved his own better.) His wife, too, had come to take him back; his friends and neighbors anx- iously awaited his return, and General Gaines had for some time past been waiting to relieve him. Accustomed, however, to sacrifice his own to his country's good, nothing could seduce him from his post while his sense of duty told him he ought to remain. He continued just as long as was neces- sary to finish the work he had so nobly begun, and not one moment longer.

Before leaving New Orleans, however, General Jackson had to appear in a new, but by no means an uninteresting, character. Judge Hall and him- self had now rightfully changed their relative posi- tions. The civil authority, which had been rendered powerless under the pressing hand of war, had now resumed its majesty, and its offended functionary his robes. On the 21st, General Jackson was sum- moned to appear before Judge Hall, to show cause why an attachment should not be awarded against him for the causes which I have before stated. On the 24th, he appeared, and made the effort, by at- tempting—as I have done—to show the necessity of declaring and enforcing martial law, in order to save the country. But having been denied this privilege, and required to shape his defence by certain arbitrary rules laid down by the court, he declined making any; simply saying to the Judge, "Your honor will not understand me as intending anything disrespectful to the court; but as no op- portunity has been afforded me to explain the reasons and motives by which I was influenced, so is it ex- pected that censure or reproof will constitute no part of that sentence which you may imagine it your duty to pronounce." (See Eaton, p. 419.)

The result is known to the world. Judgment was pronounced, and the thousand dollars paid. Much has been said—and too much cannot well be said—of the moral grandeur of this trial. It is doubtless the first instance in the history of the world, that a judge, while dealing out the vengeance of the law, was clinging to his victim for pro- tection. Such, however, was the excitement and indignation of the vast crowd assembled on the oc- casion, and who were familiar with all the causes which led to the infliction of this fine, that Gen- eral Jackson (who had but recently protected the Judge from a foreign enemy) now found it difficult to save him from the fury of his friends.

It was stated, on a former occasion, by the gen- tleman from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] that the amount of this fine was repaid to General Jack- son by the citizens of New Orleans. All the mem- bers from that State know this statement to be incorrect. It is true, that a grateful and sponta- neous offering of the amount was made to him, and stands in beautiful contrast with the ex gratia thousand dollars recently proposed by their Senator, [Mr. CONRAD.] General Jackson, however, de- clined it; because he deemed he had an undoubted claim upon the justice of the nation, in whose ser- vice it had been inflicted, and into whose vaults it had been paid. No wonder, sir, they have been smitten with the curse of emptiness.

It will not be expected, after the able and eloquent speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] that I should say anything as to the power of the Judge to inflict this fine. If the un- limited power, both of fine and imprisonment, without the intervention of a jury, really exist— and that, too, for offences not committed in the presence of a court, and when no court is in ses- sion—it is, indeed, a frightful power, and one that ought to be abolished.

But, for all my purposes, it is not important to settle either this question of power, or its rightful exercise. If I have been successful in my efforts to convince this House that the exigencies of the war, and the condition of the country in which it was waged, justified the resort to martial law, and that this fine grew out of that exercise, then have I achieved my purpose. For I cannot permit myself to doubt that Congress will hesitate a mo- ment to restore to a faithful public servant that which has been taken from him, either by the hand of the law, or by violence, for the performance of an act admitted to be both necessary and proper— and that, too, while the nation are enjoying the full fruition of that act. The friends of General Jackson ask nothing of this House that can reflect, in the slightest degree, on Judge Hall; nor will they receive anything that can be construed into a reflection on General Jackson. Let them both stand where history and the opinions of men shall place them, and I am content.

REMARKS OF C. J. INGERSOLL,

OF PENNSYLVANIA.

In the House of Representatives, January 27, 1843.—On his motion to reconsider the bill amendatory of the several acts establishing the Treasury De- partment.

Mr. INGERSOLL renewed the motion to re- consider, in order to make a few observations on the subject. At an early day in the session, he had seized an occasion of declaring—first, that he could not vote for the exchequer recommended by the Executive; and, in the next place, that, while he could not deny the absolute constitutionality, he much questioned and disliked the presidential practice of interference and urgency at all on a subject which, in origination and responsibility, belongs to the House of Representatives. He regretted to feel himself bound peremptorily to oppose what seemed to be a favorite plan of the President, because he acknowledged, that both as a member of the party with which he is associated, and as an American, he felt deeply indebted to the President for executive interposition on certain great and well-known emergencies. Let me add (said Mr. I.) that there is a view of Mr. Tyler's instrumentality which has not, perhaps, been presented, or, at any rate, not considered as it deserves.

A distinguished person, of whom I never speak, as I never feel, without respect for his long and great public distinction, has spoken reproachfully of the actual Chief Magistrate, as a President without a party; as if that were a demerit or infirmity. Now, I will not undertake to say whether a President can successfully administer the affairs of this country without a party; but this I will say, that the demise of a late President, and the accidental succession of the present incumbent, have triumphantly proved that, in an untried crisis, the Constitution works well; and that all its vital functions are performed, as usual, under circumstances, the analogy to which in other countries, with what are supposed to be stronger Governments, has always been found extremely hazardous. Not speaking as a member of any party, nor with reference to party considerations, but as an American Republican, it is highly gratifying to see, that even though the violence of party be aggravated, and without passing any judgment upon the measures of the present Administration as either good or bad; neither vindicating nor condemning them; and, I may add, without reference to the character of the present incumbent; yet, it is matter of much gratification to perceive that in the new crisis which made Mr. Tyler President, he has been the instrument (perhaps unconscious and unwilling) of affording further proof of Mr. Jefferson's assertion, that this is the strongest Government in the world. For this, I repeat, I feel much obliged to him; and desire to exhibit him, as I think he appears, with advantage before the country. And, coinciding as his Administration has with so many of the principles which I cherish, it is not without regret that I find myself constrained to oppose what appears to be one of its favorite measures for restoring the public credit and currency; and which I must oppose with the more pertinacity, because I think it is urged with an importunity not befitting executive authority, and encroaching upon the independence of this House, to which the Constitution confides, if not exclusive, yet superior, agency in all the monetary concerns of the country.

The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has said something to-day of the act of Congress of 1789 for organizing the Treasury Department. An excellent foundation, not as familiar, I fear, as it ought to be to this House and to the country at large. I have examined it repeatedly and thoroughly, with a strong impression that its organic provisions, enacted as they were by Ellsworth, Washington, Hamilton, Madison, and other members of the convention which created the Constitution, and just after its creation, contain the germs and basis of nearly all that is now necessary for the restoration and settlement of our dilapidated circulation; and that as it was by departing from the simple and solid provisions of that act the difficulties ensued, so by returning to them we shall find the most immediate, the safest, and surest remedy for these evils. By recommending a return to the act of 1789, I am not to be understood as suggesting the re-enactment of the independent treasury, as repealed by this Congress. I was always an unwavering adherent of the independent treasury, and still consider it, in principle, indispensable. But I am not wedded to the details of the law as enacted and repealed; and I confess that I have long been inclined to think that it never need have been made either a Presidential or a party question. Separating the Government from banks—the divorce, as it has been called—and the receiving, keeping, and disbursing the public money, without bank machinery, were original principles of this Federal Government, which are to be found, specie clause and all, in the act of 1789, upon which the convulsions of party, and the inherent vices of the banking system, have thrown us back; and if, as I would fain hope, a majority of Congress and of the country can be prevailed upon to meet harmoniously upon some extension of those provisions, and their adaptation to existing circumstances, it will be the best pacification of party strife, the simplest restoration of the currency, and the most durable establishment of public prosperity.

Soon after the act of 1789, the Bank of the United States was unfortunately introduced by act of Congress. A resolution of this House, calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for a report upon such measures as would tend to the benefit of the public credit, was taken advantage of, without any specific authority for that purpose, to introduce a bill for incorporating the subscribers to that institution, which, associated with the Government, became the depository of its funds, the regulator of its currency, and eventually in the well-known operations of the second Bank of the United States—the despotic arbiter of all the operations of the Government itself. Determined to treat this subject with undisguised truth, it is right to add, that a State bank interest was soon after originated, to counteract the influence of the Bank of the United States. Eminent citizens of Philadelphia, (among others, a gentleman who was afterwards a highly distinguished Secretary of the Treasury,) established the Bank of Pennsylvania; and others of the same party politics, (among whom was a well-known personage, afterwards Vice President of the United States,) set on foot, with the same view, the Manhattan Bank of New York. By at least questionable encroachments, if not violations of constitutional interdict, banks, both national and State, were thus introduced, continued, and multiplied, with all the worst properties of modern banking, including the monstrous principle of inconvertibility, borrowed from the long English interregnum of bank suspension of specie payments, and a system of ruinous credit predominated, till the United States, and nearly every one of the States, have, by now wellnigh universal acknowledgment, been banked to the verge of destruction. The vices of the system, and the convulsions of party, have destroyed it nearly root and branch, throwing us back upon the aboriginal act of 1789, with the small remnant of the independent treasury, punishing embezzlement and other misdemeanors, which this Congress has not repealed. Here we are upon the foundation of that act once more, and let us be very careful how we depart from it. It has been for several years of great difficulty, with some slight posterior supplements, all the Federal Government has for the management of its finances; and I submit that it will be extremely rash to take any departure from it, without being well advised that it will be for the better.

What, then, does the President recommend, and with, I must say, undue pertinacity press on our adoption? A treasury bank. Yes, a treasury bank. And though I confess that I have never been able to see such a bank in the formidable aspect attributed to it by Madison, and many, if not most others of our wisest men, yet I have never hesitated to yield my opinion to theirs, and to look upon a treasury bank as a thing not to be adopted. The President's plan is not merely a treasury bank; but a treasury bank with a large, if not unrestricted, issue of paper money—inconvertible paper—continental notes—money to be made on the mere credit of Government; a measure altogether delusive of relief, either to the people or the Government; a most reprehensible mode of borrowing, which, if persisted in, must expire in depreciation, just as certainly as a falling body must continue to fall until it meets resistance; just as certain as the unquestionable fact, that no Government, ancient or modern, ever redeemed paper money issued on its own credit—paper money without taxes or other basis, a mere expedient, an exploded contrivance, a resort, a last shift, which Government, National and State, and individuals in this country have attenuated, exhausted, degraded, and debased, till it has become proverbial for all that is despicable, villanous, and abominable. And this treasury bank, with such paper money, is to have power to regulate our exchanges!—a power the most formidable, the most fearful—a power the most liable to abuse, the most creative of unprincipled circulation, the most stimulating of that criminal speculation which has been the curse of this country. Some years ago, a celebrated speech was made in this hall, by a distinguished member from the city of Philadelphia, in behalf of the Bank of the United States, the staple of whose able argument was an imposing view of the immense exchanges regulated by that great institution in the days of its utmost prosperity—a speech of which it was said the bank scattered one hundred thousand copies broadcast throughout every quarter of the United States. Its power of thus regulating the exchanges was afterwards ably exposed in one of Mr. Van Buren's excellent messages, as a most pernicious monopoly and stimulation of fictitious currency—having no reality, contributing nothing to the public property; but, on the contrary, ministering to the worst passions. And this is the power which the President calls on Congress to confer on the Executive! Never shall any President, with my vote, have such a power—liable to abuse enough in the hands of a bank, but infinitely more so in a national treasury. Some such measure as that reported by Mr. Cushing, I feel no great objection to; but never, never can I be reconciled to the Executive scheme; and I am extremely sorry to see that portion of the public press particularly supporting the President earnestly engaged in recommending and urging this scheme as a happy mean between a bank and the independent treasury. I perceive, with regret, not merely that it is an Administration measure, but that it appears to be pressed upon us with all the power and influence of the Administration, which, I am bold to say, is with me additional argument against it. With no personal disrespect to the President—enjoying pleasant personal relations with him, and with every disposition to support his measures, as I have frequently shown by my votes, and sometimes by more than votes, desirous of coincidence in political sentiment with him,—I cannot subscribe to his treasury project.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, I much question the wisdom of any immediate action at all on this delicate and dangerous subject; strongly inclining to think the act of 1789, for the present, the safest and best platform we can rest upon; and, with modifications, all that, under any circumstances, we should attempt to impose upon the community. Has this House considered the provisions of that act with the attention to which they are entitled? Has the good sense of the community been awakened to them? It establishes not only an independent treasury, but an independent Secretary of the Treasury; and, more than all, an independent House of Representatives. It gives the Treasurer of the United States the custody of the public moneys; takes care that those moneys shall consist of coin alone, according to the Constitution; providing for their safekeeping and disbursement much better than they can be kept by any corporators, or other irresponsible individuals. Without being a treasury bank of issue, discount, or exchequer, it is a treasury bank of deposite and safekeeping, guarded by checks and securities, such as it is not easy to improve, or relinquish without danger. There is a clause in the act, which, possibly, even honorable gentlemen of this House, and which, I am sure, most of the good people of this country are not aware of, authorizing the House, at all times, instead of allowing the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish required information in writing, to command his attendance at the bar of the House; and there, face to face, to question him as to the finances, the funds, and whatever else appertains to the monetary concerns of the United States. This great and peculiar power conclusively proves—what those who enacted that law deemed it—the constitutional function and authority of this House to control the Treasury Department, enacted the responsibility of that department to this House, and what it deemed the money and the proper custody of the money of the Government. Once more I repeat, that it will be not without much hesitation that I consent to any departure from these fundamental arrangements. If the course of events since has been such—if public sentiment and habit since have become so inveterate as to require some modification or enlargement of the act of 1789, especially now that all banks, whether Federal or State, are out of repute, let us take no step without the utmost caution, and none that is not indispensably necessary; for whatever we do, must be experimental and doubtful. The act of 1789, for now near half a century, has remained unaltered; and it is likely to continue in force, as it is now in force, from the extreme difficulty and hazard of supplying its place with anything better, if so good. Suitable modifications and extensions may be practicable; but, compared with the treasury project recommended by the President, it is infinitely preferable.

In addition to Presidential recommendation and urgency, and to Treasury suggestion of the exchequer scheme, we have had an argument from the ecretary of State, in a speech of which so much as been said on this floor that I cannot refrain om also taking some notice of it. That gentleman had long by his admirers been denominated god-like person for his great intellectual attributes; which panegyric, transcended by the western ientalism of this House, has been exaggerated by ich hyperbolical extolling as to compare him to ountains and giants, Vesuvius, Mont Blanc, itan, Tyger, Samson, and other similar, as it appears to me, most extravagant notice of his supposed superiority.

He said of himself, it seems, in a somewhat milar strain of self-complacency, that, if there is ything he understands, it is this particular subject. Now, however bold it may be to take issue ith such a giant, I utterly deny (judging from what e said in that speech) that he does understand the ubject. At all events, I hope it will not be extremely immodest for me to declare that, if he understands it as well as he boasts he does, I don't understand it at all. He says he is a bullionist; which deny, for no man can be a bullionist who attempts to defend inconvertible paper-money. He ay have studied, as he says he did in early life, ie English bullion controversy, in which Vansittart and his adherents insisted that paper is better an coin; and he may have sided with their opponents, that bullion is better than paper, and, alone or onvertible, makes money. But that no more entled him to proficiency in the science, than a an would become a learned divine by the udy of sermons, without ever reading the scriptures. Nor do I consider it at all rash or uncoming in even so humble a person as I am, deny that any man understands this subject, whatever he may think or say of his own understanding to an audience at Faneuil Hall, who, after nsisting on the virtues of paper money as proof of is bullionism, declares that it would be a wise egulation of the monetary concerns and private nterests of this country to superadd to that enormity the executive regulation of all its incalculale exchanges. He may be Vesuvius, Mont Blanc, Titan, Tyger, or Samson Agonistes; and there nay be those who pronounce such speeches the manations of a master mind; but I have no hesitation whatever at calling them crudities, and exposing them as puerilities—the ebullitions of egoism, relying on the ipse dixit of a master—not a naster mind—for issuing as true what is unquesionably and manifestly not so. The Secretary of State pledged his reputation that, on a short trial of this panacea, (which he claimed as his own patent medicine,) it would prove an infallible cure, and give immediate relief to a distempered and prostrate community. Of that, sir, I have not the least doubt. If that gentleman—or it would be more proper to say, if I were to take the relief of intoxication for any distress I might be laboring under, I should probably have the ease and comfort which such a resort administers; and, while it lasted, be happy, merry, content, and free from all complaint. But as our friend (the president of the temperance society) near me, [Mr. BRIGGS,] I think, will agree, the relief and happiness would be extremely short-lived, and not very creditable; and I should soon be more miserable than ever, with aggravated prostration of the whole system, terrible headache, and still more terrible remorse of disordered intestines. In the suggestion of such relief as this, I must say there is no evidence of that wise familiarity with this simple subject arrogated to himself by the Secretary of State, and seeming to be conceded to him by those who merely deny his consistency, without going further and denying, as I make bold to do, that either his scheme or his speech shows that his is the master mind which he and others say it is. As Secretary of State, and quasi Secretary of the Treasury, I must deny all odor of that arrogated mastery, whatever there may have been of Senatorial supremacy formerly. I deny that to the lieges of Boston there were any masterly illustrations of a hackneyed subject, or anything more than egregious misrepresentation of it, in its most expansive and delusive aspects, such as the pupils of Vansittart, and other anti-bullionists, might rejoice in.

The distress of the country has been alarmingly depicted by the honorable gentleman who preceded me, [Mr. BURNELL;] and, sensible that the country, if not actually distressed, is so constantly told that it is, as to believe so, and to think, perhaps, that Congress can relieve it, I came here determined to listen patiently to all plans suggested for that purpose; to give them all opportunity of consideration; and if any one can be shown likely to do better than the act of 1789, to vote for it. I have heard, however, of no approximation to such plan, except that of Mr. CUSHING, which comes so nigh that act and the independent treasury that, possibly, it may do. But I own my distrust of all action at present; for I feel free to declare that the terrible suffering of the community has been, and continues to be, salutary—the only lesson that could bring it to confession of error, and sincere resolution of amendment. It is worth volumes of legislation, this bitter experience. Besides, is the country as much distressed as it is said to be? No doubt stagnation, penury, and discomfort, the rich reduced to comparative want, and the poor to want of employment, prevail in cities, towns, and wherever bank influence disasters business, as it does, with extensive and deplorable sweep, smiting right and left with destruction. But is this the condition of the farming population—of the laboring classes, except in certain places—of agriculture at large, the basis of all other occupation and supply? Is not the country recovering from the prostration inflicted by bank credits, and their strumpet twin sister, bank frauds? Though the circulation is reduced to the coin standard, and there are banks enough left standing to keep much of that standard out of use, hid in their dark vaults, is it true that the country is not slowly recovering? And will not spontaneous recovery be much more stable and substantial than if Government attempts to hasten it by that Dædalian flight which Adam Smith mentions? I much incline to believe that the best thing we can do is to keep the doctors off, and let the patient alone in convalescence. We must give time. Time is an important element in the revival. Letting the country repose, and reinstate itself, is much better than treasury nostrums and hastening stimulants. Remember that all legislation must be prospective, experimental, and, perhaps, perilous; whereas, as it is, the community is aroused to the reality, is convinced of it, is taking care of itself; is gradually, intelligently, and substantially rising to permanent prosperity; has done much, has learned much, is learning and doing more, and has abundance of resources and good sense to do the rest. Is it palsied, as was said by Mr. BUANELL? prostrate, paralyzed, incapable of recovering without help from Government? I think not—I trust not—I feel sure not. Last season was one of great production—probably the most so ever known—in cotton, grain, flesh, everything; and though prices were low, yet they will improve, and are probably now remunerating, while no treasury hocus-pocus can render them profitable. Government cannot, by any contrivance, suddenly raise them, without liability to as sudden decline; and let us have the manliness to say to the people that they must help themselves, without assistance from Congress. Mother Earth, and her eldest son, Labor, are the great, if not only, reliance.

If the Secretary of State, instead of expending his master mind, if such it be, on treasury projects, would bestow it upon objects pertaining to his own department of Government, in fostering and extending that commerce which it was the great design of this Union to develop, he would exhibit more attention to the public welfare than by any irregular attempts, through exchequer schemes, to expand that currency which, without extensive commerce, can never prosper. Such arrangements may, I think, be made with other countries as would greatly increase the foreign commerce of the United States. Our exchequer may be placed in Europe, in Asia, and in South America, by increasing the export of those inestimable staples which are the great sources of national wealth and American prosperity. Instead of eighty or ninety millions of exports, why should there not be one hundred and fifty millions a year sent out of the country, and nearly as much brought back again—much of it in coin, in return for cotton, grain, flesh, rice, lumber, and other articles of which we have a superabundance, and other parts of the world are in want? Why may not this be done, even in less time than any speculative restoration of the currency by expansion? What is there to prevent its being the work of even the present Administration, which in its remaining two years may more readily restore the finances of the country, by devoting its talents (and it has talents) to the legitimate purpose of extending commerce, rather than stimulating circulation? If all the energies of the Department of State, and those of the present Secretary, were earnestly devoted to this accomplishment, I see nothing to prevent its rapid success, with more certainty, and in less time, through the agency of that department, than the Treasury. By commercial improvement, relief will be obtained through the great arterial system of the country, beginning at its heart, by natural means, and every pulsation would be healthful; whereas, by the superficial process of a stimulated circulation, the surface and extremities only are dealt with, and the result is necessarily doubtful, and even probably pernicious. Let us act on the heart, not the extremities. Among the numerous rumors with which the air of this metropolis is always agitated, conjecture is afloat that the Secretary of State is to be sent abroad on a special mission, to make a commercial treaty with England, desirous, it is said, of dealing with the United States on the basis of reciprocity, and an equal exchange of our productions for theirs. Without giving any opinion on the policy of such an arrangement, it is, at all events, worthy of consideration by the best talents of the country; and, for one, I am ready to vote the necessary appropriation for the Secretary's foreign mission. ["To get rid of him," said some one.] No, sir, not to get rid of him; but to send him on a most important errand, where I hope his talents may be useful, and where I am sure they would be much better employed than by making speeches at Boston on the state of the finances and of parties. I take leave here, in my place, ex cathedra, to recommend his attention to the legitimate purposes of the Department of State, and to give up those of the Treasury Department, for which his speech at Faneuil Hall displayed no remarkable aptitude. Finance is not his forte.

It is quite a misapprehension of the state of the country to suppose that it has gained nothing by the uses of adversity within the last few years. The Secretary of State now acknowledges that a United States bank is an obsolete idea. How long is it since he used to say that a note of that bank was better than gold or silver? Will gentlemen say that nothing is gained by such progress as this?—such march of master minds? With no view of making a President, but because of its excellent instruction? I confess that I desire that the present state of things, if its inflictions be not too severe, may continue a little longer, till the last lingering attachment to the detestable infatuation of making money out of inconvertible paper, and wealth out of speculation, may be completely and utterly extirpated. Are gentlemen aware that such has been the long usurpation of paper money in this country, that the late war with England was carried on by it, almost as much as the war of the Revolution! I have taken the trouble, latterly, to ascertain, from authentic sources, that one hundred and twenty millions in loans and treasury notes were raised by acts of Congress during the three years of the latter war, which are nearly equal in relative proportion to the three hundred and sixty millions of continental money issued during the former. The debt of the war of 1812 is all paid, to be sure; while that of the war of 1776 remains, and will forever remain unsatisfied. Such is the history of the United States—the history of a wonderful nation whose bane has been infatuated predilection for paper-money, notwithstanding the most abundant indigenous means of commanding the precious metals, controlling the commerce of the world, and rendering it tributary to North American advancement, which, great as it has been, has been greatly retarded by this infatuation.

Mr. Speaker, with these hasty views—and I am perfectly sensible of their extreme imperfections—I come to a conclusion. No member of this wild House can come to it prepared to present methodical arguments. Nothing here is certain but overruling uncertainty. There is no such thing as debate, and hardly any discussion. Whoever addresses the country in this brilliant bog of a hall, must bring all his speeches of the whole session jumbled together in his mind, and utter chance-medley whichever happens to come foremost. In this desultory way I have ventured to say something to-day. I repeat, that the admirable act of 1789 is nearly all we need, and that I fear departures from its excellent and familiar organization. I am inalienably devoted to the principle of the independent treasury, and cannot be divorced from it—divorce of the State from all banks, and inseparable union of it with coin. But I am not wedded to the law as enacted and repealed—enacted by my party, repealed by the other. I hold this to be a great national measure, far above transient party. This Administration may restore it, if it will and can, and it shall have my vote—hereafter a silent vote; for I have said all I desire to say—for that great contribution to the public welfare. I do not wish to wait the advent of another Administration, with which possibly I may be more nearly associated. But I doubt all speculative action on the subject, and dread novelty—abominate expansion. I never will fail, without the slightest reference to Presidential questions, to oppose those inordinate and monstrous contrivances of Government—inconvertible paper-money and licentious exchanges by legal facilities—as the greatest stain on the character, the most destructive canker on the vitals, of this country.

SPEECH OF MR. PAYNE, OF ALABAMA.

In the House of Representatives, January 28, 1843—The proposition to refund the fine to General Jackson being under consideration—

Mr. PAYNE rose and said:

Mr. SPEAKER: In rising to address the House this morning, I feel somewhat as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS] felt a few days ago. I had reflected on this question, and on some parts of it had wished to say a few words; but, by the postponement of its consideration from day to day, much of what I intended to have said has escaped my recollection, and I shall find it impossible to strike on the train of thought I had marked out for myself. I shall, therefore, content myself with offering such views only as present themselves to my mind as I progress in the discussion. Besides, there was another thought which operated upon my mind when I desired to address the House a few days ago. I did believe that, by making a calm appeal to the justice and magnanimity of this House, there could be no difficulty in agreeing to refund the fine which, in my soul, I believe was unjustly imposed by Judge Hall upon Gen. Jackson, for declaring martial law at New Orleans. But I have now totally despaired of any such result; the speech of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS] has convinced me that the warm and generous feelings of magnanimous nature are chilled and destroyed by the malignity of party strife and the trammels of party discipline. I shall not, therefore, appeal to this Congress at all—I look above and beyond it. To the American people I appeal. They are the fountain of justice in the reward or punishment of political men, as they are of all political power in a Government like ours. With them, this question will stand upon its own merit; it will be disconnected from the party conflicts of the day. The elevation of no political favorite will depend upon the rejection of the bill; nor will the prospects of any ambitious aspirant to the Presidency brighten by its passage. The whole question will be gauged by the square of justice; and the only inquiry will be, "Was Gen. Jackson right or wrong in declaring martial law at New Orleans?" If right, the bill ought to pass, and the fine of $1,000, with interest, ought to be refunded; if wrong, he merited his punishment, and the fine ought not to be remitted. That is the question; and it is totally immaterial what your decision may be; the people will decide that question upon principles of strict justice, and command you to execute their will.

Sir, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS] asks where Gen. Jackson derived his authority to declare martial law at New Orleans? That inquiry has been so often made, and so fully answered, that I did not expect a repetition of it from the gentleman from Virginia. But, as the interrogatory has again been repeated, I will answer it in accordance with my own views, and in my own way.

I shall not pretend that the Constitution or laws of the United States authorize the declaration of martial law by any authority whatever. On the contrary, it is unknown to the Constitution or laws; and so guarded have those persons been, upon whom the people have conferred the power to form constitutions, either State or national, that there is scarcely a constitution of a single State in the Union which does not declare that "the military shall at all times be subordinate to the civil power;" and the Constitution of the United States inculcates the same doctrine.

That the military shall always be subordinate to the civil power, is a fundamental principle in our form of government; and the genius of our institutions requires that it should be so. But it does not follow that cases may not arise, in time of war, when a commander would not only be excusable, but criminally culpable if he did not assume the responsibility of declaring martial law. Sir, what are the exigencies of war which would justify this measure? I answer—the preservation of his army from destruction; the sacking of an important and wealthy city, or the devastation and ruin of his country. To prevent any one of these results, would justify a general, before any just tribunal on earth, in declaring martial law. And to condemn a commanding officer for declaring martial law when necessary to prevent any one of these results, is virtually saying that he should stand calmly by, and witness the destruction of his army, the sacking of a city, or the devastation and ruin of his country, when the means were in his power to prevent it.

Who would tolerate this idea? An Arnold might, but no patriotic American could. It may be asked, upon what principle a commander can declare martial law, where it is conceded that the Constitution or laws afford him no authority to do so? I answer, upon that principle of self-defence which rises paramount to all written law; and the justification of the officer who assumes the responsibility of acting upon that principle must rest upon the necessity of the case. If that necessity cannot be made apparent, when called to answer before the civil authority of the country, he will be condemned and punished. But if the necessity was apparent, and shown to be so, he will be honorably acquitted, and a grateful country will approve the act. These were the grounds upon which General Jackson acted when he declared martial law at New Orleans, as is shown by the opinion of Mr. Livingston, the aid to General Jackson; which opinion is in the following words, and was filed among the papers of General Jackson: "On the nature and effect of the proclamation of martial law by Major General Jackson, my opinion is, that such proclamation is unknown to the Constitution and laws of the United States.

1st. "That it is to be justified only by the necessity of the case; and that, therefore, the General proclaims it at his risk, and under his responsibility both to Government and individuals. When the necessity is apparent, he will meet reward instead of punishment from his Government; and individual claims for damage must be appreciated by the same rule, under the discretion of a jury. Should they, in the opinion of the Government, decide falsely against their officer, they have a right (which they have frequently exercised) of indemnifying him for the disinterested responsibility he has incurred."

2dly. "That the effect of a proclamation of martial law de facto is to bring all persons who may happen to be within the district comprised in the proclamation, under the purview of such law; and therefore all persons capable of defending the country within the district are subject to such law, by virtue of the proclamation, and may be tried during its continuance by virtue thereof."

These are the grounds upon which we place the power of General Jackson to proclaim martial law at New Orleans; and I trust the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS] will consider his interrogatory fully answered.

Sir, there is another event in the history of our country, in which General Jackson was compelled to assume responsibility, and act from the necessity of the case. I allude to his invasion of Florida, then belonging to the Spanish dominions, and a neutral territory. He reduced St. Mark's, Pensacola, and the fort of Barrancas. This was not authorized by the Constitution or laws; no one ever pretended that the Constitution or laws authorized any such invasion of neutral territory. It was an act of self-defence, forced upon the commander from the necessity of the case. Why this necessity? The Indians were in the daily habit of committing depredations upon our frontier settlements, and retreating with their plunder across the Florida line, a market for which they found among British emissaries stationed at St. Mark's and Pensacola. These emissaries also furnished the Indians with powder and the various implements of war, and continued to stimulate them to increased exertion, and to the perpetration of renewed cruelties upon our defenceless women and children.

Now, sir, should General Jackson have remained quietly upon our side of the line, until our settlements were broken up, and our citizens slaughtered, because the Constitution and laws did not authorize him to march an army into neutral territory? No; all must admit that an imperious necessity fully justified the step taken by him, and the result of the measure vindicates the policy of the act.

Sir, the King of Spain viewed the invasion of Florida as an insult to his sovereignty, and demanded the punishment of General Jackson, as we learn from a letter written by John Q. Adams, then Secretary of State, to George W. Erving, minister plenipotentiary to Spain. I read from the letter as follows: "In the fourth and last of the notes of Mr. Pizarro, he has given formal notice that the King, his master, has issued orders for the suspension of the negotiation between the United States and Spain, until satisfaction shall have been made by the American Government to him for these proceedings of General Jackson, which he considers as acts of unequivocal hostility against him, and as outrages upon his honor and dignity, the only acceptable atonement for which is stated to consist in a disavowal of the acts of the American general thus complained of; the infliction upon him of a suitable punishment for his supposed misconduct, and the restitution of the posts and territories taken by him from the Spanish authorities," &c.

How did Mr. Adams answer this demand of the King of Spain? He tells him, in this same letter, that "the occupation of these places in Spanish Florida by the American commander arose from incidents which occurred in the prosecution of the war against the Indians, from the imminent danger in which the fort of St. Mark's was of being seized by the Indians themselves, and from the manifestations of hostility to the United States by the commandant of St. Mark's, and the Governor of Pensacola; the proofs of which were made known to General Jackson, and impelled him, from the necessities of self-defence, to the steps of which the Spanish Government complains."

These are the grounds as alleged by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] upon which General Jackson took possession of Spanish Florida. Not because the Constitution or laws of the United States authorized him to enter and occupy a neutral territory, but because he was "impelled from the necessities of self-defence" to do so. Now, if General Jackson was authorized upon principles of necessary self-defence to seize upon the fort of St. Mark's, because of the danger of its falling into the hands of the enemy, how much more fully was he justified, by the same principle of imperious necessity, in declaring martial law to save the city of New Orleans from plunder and devastation by the enemy.

It may be supposed that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] has only stated the grounds upon which General Jackson entered Florida, without approving his action in that particular. Not so. He continues: "But the President will neither inflict punishment nor pass censure upon General Jackson for that conduct, the motives for which were founded in the purest patriotism; of the necessities for which he had the most immediate and effectual means of forming a judgment; and the vindication of which is written in every page of the law of nations, as well as the first law of nature—self-defence."

Sir, there is an additional recognition of that paramount law of nature—self-defence—and a powerful vindication, not only of the acts of General Jackson, in entering the Spanish territory, but of the motives upon which that action was founded. And I now respectfully submit, that every principle involved in the declaration of martial law at New Orleans, was involved in the case thus defended by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Why, then should the gentleman from Massachusetts, who so ably defended General Jackson nearly thirty years since, now turn round and become his reviler? Sir, I will not say that this change was produced by the result of the political contest of 1828, but I tell the gentleman from Massachusetts that others with less charity for his motives, will not only think, but declare that such is the fact.

Mr. Speaker, having stated the grounds upon which I place the power of a commanding officer to proclaim martial law, and having brought to my aid the learning and experience of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] in his better days ıall now proceed to examine into the necessity ich actually existed, and induced General Jack- to declare martial law. Permit me to ask what le of things actually existing in a besieged city uld justify a proclamation of martial law? The own existence of spies and traitors, or the dis- ction of any considerable portion of the resi- t population of said city, whether citizens, den- ns, or aliens, would fully justify the proclaim- of martial law by the commanding general.

Now, sir, upon the actual existence of treason, l the disaffection of a considerable portion of the ident population of New Orleans, I base the cessity of proclaiming martial law. If no treason disaffection did exist, the act was unnecessary; treason and disaffection actually existed, a con- lling State necessity imperiously demanded the clamation of martial law; and hence the justifi- ion of General Jackson.

Sir, in order to demonstrate the actual existence treason and disaffection to the American cause, nust avail myself of such lights as history throws on this subject; and, in every instance in which efer to history, the enemies, and not the friends General Jackson will be consulted, because I efer that his vindication should rest upon his- rical facts, recorded by those who cannot be arged with leaning to the side of General Jack- n.

We find in Martin's History of Louisiana, that any of the people of that territory were original- opposed to the transfer of said territory from rance to the United States. He says: vol. 2, page 9, "that the tri-colored made room for the striped nner, under repeated peals of artillery and mus- etry; a group of citizens of the United States, ho stood on the corner of the square, waved eir hats in token of respect for their country's ag, and a few of them greeted it with their oices. No emotion was manifested by any other art of the crowd." Again, page 263, Martin ays: "Cordero had sent a large reinforcement to Nacogdoches: Porter had not two hundred men nder his command on Red river. In a letter to the Secretary of War of the 15th February, he ated the great disaffection of the people around im—nineteen of whom out of twenty preferred the Government of Spain to that of the United States."

Sir, here is historical evidence that a large pro- portion of the population of Louisiana were op- osed to the authority of the United States; although his fact may not be conclusive as to the actual ex- stence of treason during the investment of New Orleans by the British army, it must nevertheless e taken and considered as a connecting link in he chain of evidence which I shall hereafter ad- luce upon this point.

I now propose to show, from the same historical vidence, (vol. 2d, page 323,) that treason did ac- ually exist during the investment of the city. It vill be remembered that Nicholls, the British col- onel, after his arrival at Pensacola, issued a proc- amation to the people of Louisiana, in which "he announced that on them the first call was then nade to assist in the liberation of their natal soil from a faithless and weak Government. To Spaniards, Frenchmen, Italians, and Englishmen, whether residents or sojourners in Louisiana, ap- plication was made for assistance. He gave as- surances that the inhabitants had no need to be alarmed at his approach, as the good faith and disinterestedness which Britons had manifested in Europe, would distinguish them in America.

The Indians, he added, had pledged themselves in the most solemn manner to refrain from offer- ing the slightest injury to any but the enemies of their Spanish and British fathers.

"Addressing himself to the people of Kentucky, he observed, they had too long borne with griev- ous impositions; the whole brunt of the war had fallen on their brave sons. He advised them to be imposed on no longer, but either to revenge themselves under the standard of their forefathers, or observe the strictest neutrality.

"He asked whether the Kentuckians, after the experience of twenty-one years, could longer sup- port those brawlers for liberty, who called it free- dom, when themselves were free. He advised them not to be duped any longer, and to accept his offers; assuring them what he had promised he guarantied to them, on the sound honor of a British officer."

Sir, such were the means resorted to, to seduce our people from the allegiance due to their own Government; and I lament, for the honor of man, and the dignity of his nature, that any individual could have been found so base, as to aid in the ac- complishment of this wicked attempt upon the pa- triotism of our people. Upon the brave Ken- tuckians (to their honor be it said) this appeal had no influence; they would neither observe "neutrality," nor "revenge themselves" upon their brothers, under "the standard of their forefathers." Not so with others; for we find (page 327 of Mar- tin's History) that "emissaries were sent with copies of this proclamation over the country, between Mobile river and the Mississippi."

This was the work of treason; and I note the fact, as conclusive evidence of its actual existence at the time. I proceed with my evidence from the same work. On page 340 we find Claiborne, the Governor of Louisiana, saying to General Jackson: "I think, with you, that our country is full of spies and traitors." On page 364 of the same vol- ume, we find that during the engagement between the British and American lines on the 28th De- cember, General Jackson was informed that "the assembly were about to give up the country to the enemy."

All these are important facts, which show the ex- istence of treason in Louisiana, at the time General Jackson proclaimed martial law. It is not my in- tention, in the charge of treason, to involve the Legislature of Louisiana; but I regret that I have not been able to procure a copy of the journals of that body, since questions may have been started, and propositions entertained, which would go far to relieve the character of General Jackson from the aspersions which Federalism and British in- fluence have at all times cast upon it.

The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOTTS,] in commenting upon the order given to Governor Claiborne by General Jackson, to blow up the Legislature of Louisiana, if, in truth, it did con- template a surrender of the city to the enemy, has said that General Jackson acted upon vague sur- mise. Sir, the gentleman from Virginia inform- ed us but the other day, that he had never read more than one law book in his life—and that one, twenty years since. Judging from the remark of the gentleman just referred to, we might suppose that he had been equally negligent in omitting to read the history of his country. I make no such charge; we know the gentleman has read the his- tory of his country, and the reasons for this declar- ation must be sought in other causes.

Mr. BOTTS (Mr. PAYNE yielding for explanation) said that the gentleman from Alabama had mis- understood him on that subject. He had only said that General Jackson had never given his author- ity, so far as he had been able to ascertain, and he never yet had ascertained; perhaps the gentleman might furnish it.

Mr. PAYNE. Sir, I am proceeding on the suppo- sition that the gentleman had omitted to read the history of the times. I regard this as an important charge against General Jackson; it does him mani- fest injustice. His vindication may be found in a letter dated 31st December, 1814, in camp, 4 miles below New Orleans, and directed to the Legisla- ture of Louisiana, in which he says:

"The Major General commanding has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the joint resolution of both Houses of the honorable the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, now in session, dated the 30th instant, and communicated to both Houses; to which the General gives the following answer: That, just after the engagement between the British and American armies had commenced, on the 28th instant, when the enemy was advancing, and it was every instant expected they would storm our lines, as the General was riding rapidly from right to left of his line, he was accosted by Mr. Duncan, one of his volunteer aids, who had just returned from New Orleans. Observing him to be apparently agitated, the General stopped, supposing him to be the bearer of some information of the enemy's movements, and asked what was the matter? He replied, that he was the bearer of a message from Governor Claiborne, that the Assembly were about to give up the country to the enemy.

"The General was in the act of pushing forward along the line, when Mr. Duncan called after him, and said: 'the Governor expects orders what to do.' The General replied, that he did not believe the intelligence; but to desire the Governor to make strict inquiry into the subject; and, if true, to blow them up."

Colonel Declouet is stated to be the officer who delivered the message to Mr. Duncan. This is a thorough vindication of General Jackson from the charge of never having given the world his author, as made by the gentleman from Virginia; and I trust he will now consider me as having furnished the information he desired.

Mr. BOTTS here inquired what history the gen- tleman read from?

Mr. PAYNE replied, from Martin's History of Louisiana.

Mr. BOTTS said he had never read that book.

Mr. PAYNE. So I had supposed, or the charge would never have been made. If General Jack- son had ordered the Legislature of Louisiana to be blown up, upon indefinite rumor, it would have been highly censurable; but the order given in the heat of battle, upon information derived from the Governor, and then with the qualification to "ex- amine strictly" into the subject, and, if true, blow them up, is a very different question. Sir, the order was one that I would not have given, had it been true that the Legislature was about to give up the country to the enemy. Not that they would not have deserved to be blown up, but because I be- lieve gunpowder, under such circumstances, is an improper agent with which to punish traitors. Gun- powder was intended to be used in the adjustment of difficulties between honorable men, or between nations engaged in honorable warfare. The trai- tor should be punished with the halter, whenever found in either the person of a judge, legislator, private citizen, or common soldier.

Sir, I now turn from this digression to the con- tinued proof of the actual existence of treason when General Jackson proclaimed martial law at New Orleans. I next call the attention of the House to a statement contained in Latour's Me- moirs and History of the War in West Florida and Louisiana, who has recorded the names of ten fish- ermen, of whom he says:

"These were well known to have aided the Brit- ish in disembarking their troops, serving as pilots on board their vessels and boats, and acting as spies for them, from the period of their arrival on our coast."

"It was their practice, when they came to town to sell their fish, to get all the information they could, for the purpose of carrying it to the English when they went out to fish in Lake Borgne. On the 20th of December—the day preceding the arrival of the detachment of American militia at the village—the British captain (Peadre) had come disguised, accompanied by the three first-named fishermen, as far as the bank of the Mississippi; and had even tasted its waters. It was from his report, after having thus examined the country, that the enemy determined to penetrate by Viller's canal, whose banks at the time afforded firm footing, from the landing-place in the prairie to the river."

Mr. Speaker, here is conclusive evidence of the actual existence of treason during the investment by the British of the city of New Orleans. In the language of the Governor and General Jackson, the country was "filled with spies and traitors."

Mr. MOORE of Louisiana rose to explain.

Mr. PAYNE said he could not yield the floor. Un- der the rule, he was allowed but one hour to inves- tigate this subject; and for every minute of that time he should have important use. Besides, the gentleman from Louisiana could reply when he had finished his remarks.

Sir, I have now fully made out my case. The actual existence of treason is proved beyond all question. Hence the absolute necessity of pro- claiming martial law; and upon that necessity I place the justification of General Jackson. How could the city have been saved? how could the spies and traitors have been prevented from con- veying to the enemy daily information of the strength, condition, and operations of the Ameri- can army? Sir, in but one way. It could only be done by proclaiming martial law. General Jack- son saw and knew this. He felt the responsibility resting upon him, and adopted the only possible means by which the city could be saved. He pro- claimed martial law, and subjected the city of New Orleans to military government. He garrisoned every avenue leading to and from the city, and thereby cut off all communication between the traitors within and the enemy without. Now, sir, what effect has martial law upon persons within the district comprised in the proclamation? I agree with Mr. Livingston in the opinion already quoted: "That the effect of martial law, de facto, is to bring all persons who may happen to be within the district comprised in the proclamation, under the purview of such law; and, therefore, all persons capable of defending the country within the district, are subject to such law by virtue of the proclamation, and may be tried, during its continuance, by virtue thereof."

Louallier, a naturalized Fenchman, and member of the Senate of Louisiana, presuming upon the dignity of his station, wrote and published a seditious paper, which was calculated not only to embolden the treasonable portion of the population of Louisiana, but informed the enemy of the divisions and dissatisfaction actually existing in regard to the measures adopted by the commanding general. For writing and publishing this paper, he was arrested, by the order of General Jackson. Dominic A. Hall then issued a writ of habeas corpus for the release of Louallier, and thereby became his accomplice. Hall was also arrested. Louallier was tried and acquitted by a court-martial; and Hall, after a few days' confinement, was sent beyond the limits of the city, and released. If there was necessity for proclaiming martial law at all, the same necessity required that it should be preserved. Hence the necessity for the immediate arrest of Louallier. Nor could he be released under a writ of habeas corpus; for that would have been a virtual repeal of the proclamation, before the necessity ended which required its existence. Moreover, I do not believe that it would be consistent with the public safety to admit the doctrine, that a man writing and publishing a mutinous and seditious paper, in the midst of a military camp, can be taken from the military by the civil authority, by writ of habeas corpus, and discharged. If that doctrine be once established, the spy or the traitor may at any time find exemption from the punishment due to his crimes, under the soiled ermine of some foreign stipendiary, exercising judicial functions under the authority of the United States.

Sir, I have said that New Orleans was placed under garrison, and subjected to all the laws which govern a military camp, by virtue of the proclamation of martial law. I now ask, did Gen. Jackson commit any act, after the proclamation, which every commander has not a right to do, at any time, within the limits of his encampment? Upon this point, I read an argument, the other day, in the January number of the Democratic Review, which was so conclusive, and the impressions of which are now so vivid upon my recollection, that it would be impossible for me to make an argument upon this branch of the subject, without plagiarizing the one to which I have adverted. I therefore ask leave to read to the House this argument, and to substitute it for the remarks I intended to make.

"Many Frenchmen born, for the purpose of securing exemption from military duty, procured certificates from the French consul, declaring them to be subjects of the King of France. These certificates were given in the midst of the General's camp, and tended to weaken his means of defence, by taking effective soldiers from his ranks, and producing dissatisfaction and a spirit of mutiny among those who remained. Might not the General, in strict conformity of law, have placed both the consul and his protegés in confinement? He adopted the milder expedient of ordering them out of his camp.

"Then came the publication of Louallier, harshly censuring this order as an act of tyranny, and openly advising disobedience. This publication, be it remembered, was made in the midst of the camp. Its direct and manifest object was to bring the military authority into contempt.

"The arrest of the author was, in our view of the General's lawful authority over his camp, not only a matter of right, but of indispensable duty. Instead of violating the Constitution and laws of his country, he but performed the solemn obligation of executing them, by preserving the just authority of its military commander over its armies and their encampments.

"Yet it was for this act that Judge Hall (himself, at the moment, the subject of martial law, and abiding in the midst of the camp) issued his writ of habeas corpus. This was making himself the accomplice of Louallier, in stirring up discontent and mutiny in the camp. The same principles which required the arrest of the one, demanded, with a louder voice, the restraint of the other. The Judge was kept under guard a few days, and then sent out of the camp, and set at liberty.

"The power of the General, under martial law, seems to be altogether preventive, except in cases where the law itself provides for punishment. In this case, it seems to us that the preventive power can only be exercised by keeping the mischief-maker in confinement, or sending him beyond the limits of the camp. In effect, this was the result in the case of Louallier, and nothing beyond it was attempted in the case of Judge Hall.

"These facts and reasons lead us to the conclusion, that, in ordering French aliens and the French consul beyond the limits of his camp; in arresting and confining Louallier for an open attempt, within his camp, to produce discontent and disobedience; and in confining and sending out of his camp Judge Hall, for attempting to sustain Louallier—General Jackson trampled on no constitution, and violated no law; but, on the contrary, faithfully executed the powers vested in him by the Constitution and laws, as a military commander, for the preservation of order in his camp, the safety of his army, and the defence of his country."

Sir, if the views taken be correct, the blame, if any, which attaches to General Jackson, was for proclaiming martial law, and not for acts committed by him subsequent to that proclamation. When upon that branch of the subject, I demonstrated beyond doubt that an overruling State necessity, resulting from the conduct of the spies and traitors known to be in the country, required the existence of martial law to save the city from the enemy; and upon that necessity I rest the justification of General Jackson, and demand, as an act of justice, that the fine imposed upon him by Judge Hall be refunded by the passage of the bill now under consideration.

Sir, it may be asked, could this city have been saved by any other means? This interrogatory requires that I should examine, for a few moments, the means of defence, as compared with the means of attack. I have already said that we were called upon to defend a restless and divided people. Our army numbered about 3,000 men, undisciplined; many of them had never before faced an enemy, and withal badly armed. What were the means of attack? An army of 14,000 strong, well ordered, provided with all the appliances of war, and from a country whose troops had been disciplined by a war of twenty years' duration, and commanded by the most experienced generals of the age.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] eloquently said, the other day, that, if we would look at the history of England during the period of the French revolution, and mark the course of that great power in Asia, in Africa, and in Europe, we would find it one undeviating course of unchecked victory and glory; or, if we turn to the ocean, we are met by the victories of St. Vincent, of Trafalgar, of Copenhagen, and the Nile; and, wherever a British ship met an opposing vessel, it added a new halo of glory to the conquering cross of St. George.

Sir, what was the condition of that gigantic nation at that time? She could concentrate her whole power upon us; she feared no invasion from France; the power of Napoleon had been wrenched from its basis; his star of glory had set; its sickly and ominous glare had been extinguished upon the plains of Belgium. Nor did she fear an insurrection in Ireland; the altars reared to liberty by that gallant people had been cloven down, and the fires which burnt upon those altars had been extinguished by the blood of Emmett. Thus we were contending with a nation which had torn the diadem from the brow of the hero of Austerlitz, and shook asunder the confederation of the Rhine. Sir, we met them upon the plains of New Orleans, and the Anglo-Irish blood—the Andrew-Jackson blood—snatched the American eagle from the fangs of the British lion, and enabled her to unfurl her wings in proud triumph over American arms and American soil. Could this have been done without the proclamation of martial law? No, sir; never. Three thousand Americans could never have resisted successfully a British army of fourteen thousand men, with all the points of attack designated by the spies and traitors known to be in New Orleans. Assuming this to be the fact, I ask, was it just, was it patriotic, to impose a fine upon its defender, its preserver? The whole American people will answer no; and, in their name, I demand that the fine be refunded—not as a pecuniary remuneration; no, sir, as such, we would not receive it; but as a vindication—a legislative vindication by an American Congress of the reputation of Gen. Jackson from the aspersions with which British influence then, and Federalism, its twin sister, now seeks to assail it.

Sir, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOYD] tells us that the fine imposed by Judge Hall upon General Jackson has been refunded. By whom, sir? The ladies of New Orleans. Suppose this were true, and that General Jackson had actually pocketed the money subscribed by the patriotic ladies of that city: would that justify this Government in retaining in its treasury money which had been improperly wrenched from the hands of a public servant? No, sir, if the facts, as already stated, were true, and it were improper to refund the money to General Jackson, it should have been handed over to the ladies of New Orleans, whose patriotic zeal outstripped the Government in the desire of protecting a public officer in the discharge of his military duty. I say this fine of $1,000 got into the public treasury wrongfully; and having done so, as a mere question of honesty, it should not remain there.

But, sir, what are the facts of this case? When Judge Hall imposed this fine upon General Jackson, it was immediately paid by him. The ladies of New Orleans, feeling deeply the injustice of Hall's conduct, by subscription of $1 each, raised the amount of the fine imposed, and tendered it to General Jackson; who immediately saw the impossibility of returning the money to those by whom it had been subscribed, and for this reason expressed a wish to those who had the money that it should be distributed among the families of the brave men who lost their lives in the defence of these very ladies. What other disposition respectful to these ladies and just to himself could General Jackson have suggested? To have refused it indignantly, would have been unjust to the motives of those by whom it was tendered; and yet, to receive it as a pecuniary indemnity was impossible, so long as he continued to be Andrew Jackson. Sir, the opponents of this measure must be hard pressed for argument to plead these facts in bar of even a pecuniary claim upon the treasury.

Will it be contended that we have not the constitutional power to refund this money? By those at least, who voted to the widow of General Harrison an appropriation of $25,000, such an objection cannot be urged. I did not vote for that appropriation; it was a gratuity, and I believe this Government has no right, under the Constitution, to bestow gratuities from the public treasury. But here is a different case. You have in your treasury the money of a private individual, unjustly obtained; and there can be no want of power to restore it to the proper owner. Suppose you refuse to do justice, by failing to refund this fine to General Jackson, what will the people say?

Sir, they know that you have already passed a bill for the relief of the heirs of Hull, who surrendered an army under circumstances which excited the strongest suspicions that he was guilty of treason. The people also know that the Senate passed a bill at the late session, (and many of the members of this House were anxious for the passage of the same bill,) to pay the Massachusetts militia, not for fighting the battles of the country, but for refusing to march over the Canada line with the view of attacking the enemy.

Now, sir, after all this, if you refuse to refund the fine unjustly imposed upon General Jackson, who preserved his army, prevented a city from being sacked, and was himself the victor of many battles, the people will denounce this Congress as the most unjust and factious body of men ever assembled under the Federal Constitution.

Sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] insidiously introduced in the debate upon this question, the name of Arnold, the traitor—for his own amusement, I suppose, but to the evident mortification of the House. He said that Arnold asked an American in Europe, what the people of the United States would do with him if in their possession? The American replied, that they would bury the leg wounded in defence of his country with the "honors of war," and hang the rest of his body for his treason.

Sir, the application of this anecdote to General Jackson, and the connexion of his name with the name of a traitor, is extremely unjust. That distinguished patriot holds no communion either with the "overt" traitor, or with him who only meditates

he act; he is reviled by the one, as he would be feared and shunned by the other. And I tell the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the point of his anecdote, if it has any, is applicable to himself and his friends, who have already shown their friendship for Hull and the Massachusetts militia, and their increasing and deadly hostility to Andrew Jackson. Judging from these facts, and the indications already given by the votes of this House, if Arnold were now before this Congress, his body would be pensioned for military services to Federalism in the attempted betrayal of his country, and the leg mutilated in the service of that country would be hung for its treason. I am now done with the question of the fine.

Sir, the remaining moments of my hour I must devote to the notice of a remark which fell from the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOTTS,] who tells us that he has been enabled to discover but one green spot in the life of General Jackson, and that was his submission to the decision of Judge Hall in the imposition of this fine. Sir, but one green spot in the life of Andrew Jackson! I go back to his boyhood: when he was a British prisoner during the revolutionary war, he was insolently ordered by a British officer "to black his boots." Did Andrew Jackson obey this order with the servile acquiescence common to his years and situation? No, sir; he positively refused to obey, claimed the treatment due to a prisoner of war, and, although an only brother was sacrificed and fell by his side from the cruelty of his oppressor, Andrew Jackson could not be driven from his position, or forced to submit to the arrogance of his tyrant. Was this no green spot in the life of Andrew Jackson? I come down to the history of the last war. What was the condition of your country then? The cities upon your coast had been sacked; your country overrun; and a hostile flag waved in proud triumph from the walls of this Capitol. Go to the West: the tide of victory had spread over the upper valley of the Mississippi; your "stripes and stars" trailed in the dust; your national glory lost; the massacre of the river Raisin and the defeat of Dudley hung heavily upon every mind; Kentucky mourned the loss of her bravest sons, whose bones, denied the right of sepulture, were then bleached and whitening upon the battlefield of disaster. At this, the darkest period of our national history, Andrew Jackson was appointed to the command of the American army. The effect was like magic: hope revived; patriotism rekindled; confidence was restored. Our stars and stripes again floated in the breeze; the current of disaster was checked; the wave of victory rolled back; and battle after battle won in quick succession, until the war was ended in the blaze of glory at New Orleans, to which I have already adverted.

Was there no green spot in the life of Andrew Jackson resulting from all this? Do the battles of Tuckfau, Taladega, Enotochopco, and the Horseshoe, form no green spots in the life of Andrew Jackson? Sir, it will require no storied urn to commemorate the deeds of that illustrious man. They are recorded upon every page of his country's history. Nor will it require monumental columns to mark the spot in which his ashes shall be deposited. The laurel will continue to bloom upon his grave, bedewed by the tears of a grateful nation, when the deeds and the graves of those who revile him will be forgotten and buried beneath the rubbish of oblivion.

Mr. PAYNE was here interrupted by the expiration of his hour.

SPEECH OF MR. REYNOLDS,

OF ILLINOIS.

IN THE House of Representatives, February 2, 1843—On the appropriation to improve the upper and lower rapids in the Mississippi river.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: This improvement is not sectional. It is not Western or Eastern; but it is national. It is a great work in which the whole nation is interested. The great loss of property which occurs on the Mississippi every year is a destruction, to that amount, of the national wealth. The whole nation may be considered a partnership firm, organized to promote the prosperity and happiness of the whole concern; and a loss of property, no matter in whose hands the loss may happen, and no matter in what section of the Union it may take place—in Maine or Iowa—yet it is still a loss to the whole partnership—to the whole nation.

Although the Mississippi may flow through the Western valley, and be removed from Maine many thousand miles, yet that State is deeply interested in the prosperity of the commerce of the Mississippi. This is the case with every State in the Union. And all are deeply interested in this great national improvement. Do we not see presented to Congress great numbers of petitions from the Atlantic States, praying the improvement of the navigation on the Mississippi? Those petitions are signed by intelligent citizens of the Eastern and Middle States, who are celebrated for their acute feelings of friendship to their pockets; and, therefore, feel a lively interest in this subject.

But, Mr. Chairman, we have the old objection raised by Southern gentlemen, that these improvements are not warranted by the Constitution. It is alleged, that to improve the Mississippi, is a violation of the Constitution of the United States. When will these exploded objections cease?

These objections to this improvement remind me of the sentiments of the honorable Mr. Robison, a member of Congress from Virginia, expressed, under the solemn and awful approach of death. The story is: "that Mr. Robison, in Washington city, late at night, rose in his bed, expecting to die in a short time, and told his room-mate not to permit him to be buried by Congress, as it was unconstitutional to bury a member of Congress at the public expense."

This is carrying the doctrine beyond ultraism. I apprehend it is too late at this day to adjust and settle the construction of the Constitution on this subject. All the Presidents, since the formation of our Government, have signed bills of the character of that which is now before the committee; and, of necessity, every Congress must have passed them. Many of the same individuals who were in the convention that framed the Constitution, were also in the Congresses that passed these bills. And who could be more competent to give to the Constitution a proper construction than the very same men who made it? These individuals, justly famed for their virtue and wisdom, and who may be emphatically called "the fathers of the Republic," enacted laws of the same character as the bill now under discussion. To enable the National Government to "regulate commerce" was one of the main reasons which induced the people to form the Constitution of the United States. And to establish light-houses, improve harbors on the ocean, make surveys of the coast, &c., &c., has always been considered within the constitutional power of Congress.

The Mississippi may be considered the high sea for the commerce of the West; and although the river water is fresh, and has not the regular tides of the ocean in it, yet the Constitution must have the same application to it that it has to the Atlantic, as to commerce. Therefore improvements within this river must fall within the same class of cases as the establishment of light-houses, coast surveys, harbors, &c., &c., on the Atlantic.

Mr. Chairman, we hear constitutional objections raised, on almost every occasion, against bills that come before Congress. These objections generally proceed from the South; and are so common, that they bring to my recollection an anecdote which happened in Kentucky An old farmer went out back of his field, into the timber, with his gun, to shoot squirrels. The old man remained out some considerable time, and continued loading and shooting incessantly all the time. His son thought strange of it, and went out to see why it was his father kept up such continual shooting. On inquiry, the old man showed his son the squirrel he was shooting at still on the tree, and in the same place. The boy saw no squirrel on the tree; but, looking at his father, he saw a mote in the old man's eyebrow, which his father—with his anxiety in looking up in the tree—had construed to be a squirrel, and had been shooting at it all day. Thus it is with these gentlemen. They have motes in their eyebrows, which they magnify, not into squirrels, but into breaches of the Constitution, at which they are eternally shooting.

I am, myself, in favor of a limited construction of the Constitution; extending it to embrace nothing by implication. But, on the other hand, I am not disposed to cripple and cramp it, or to pervert it from its original design. There can exist no doubt in my mind but the improvement of the Mississippi river is such a national work as is clearly embraced within the constitutional action of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me to be necessary, beyond all controversy, to improve the navigation of the Mississippi, and thereby save the lives and property that are destroyed on it every year.

It will be seen, by the census returns for 1840, that there are between six and seven millions of people who inhabit the Mississippi valley; and they produce annually, by agriculture alone, more than five hundred millions of dollars. This great amount of population, and great agricultural production each year, will satisfy every one of the business and importance of the Western country.

This section, in population, is greater than one-third of the whole Confederacy; and I presume the same may be said of its productions and wealth. And I would not be astonished that more than half of the wealth which is exported out of the whole Union, proceeds from the valley of the Mississippi.

These statements will appear satisfactory, when the extent of country and fertility of soil are considered. The climate is various from one extreme to the other; so that almost all productions can be cultivated in the West with great profit. I may moreover add, that the whole valley of the Mississippi is inhabited by an intelligent and energetic race of men. The inhabitants are not crowded together in large cities, or in dense settlements, to be enervated and corrupted by such a condition; but they possess youthful vigor and industry, in proportion to the age of their country: and with such a character, and in such a country, the productive wealth of the West must be considerable.

What would all this enterprising and laborious population do in the West, were it not for the Mississippi? Of what avail would be all the surplus productions, if no cheap conveyance could be had to market? Were it not for the navigation of the Mississippi and its tributaries, the surplus products of the valley would rot on the hands of the farmers; and thereby the enterprise and spirit which now enliven and animate the population would absolutely cease to exist.

The navigation of the Mississippi and its tributaries being so vastly important to the people, is it not reasonable that they would use it to the utmost extent of their abilities? The daring and enterprising spirit of the people indicates that they know well their interest, and will in the same proportion pursue it.

Almost the whole surplus productions of the West are, at some time before they reach their destination, floated on the Mississippi; and the wealth which is received in return is conveyed back by the same channel. I presume that all the wealth which is exported and imported on this river would amount, annually, to more than two hundred and fifty millions of dollars.

Taking all these views into consideration, I hesitate not to say that there is more wealthy commercial business transacted on the Mississippi than on any other river in America. It must be remembered that this river is more than three thousand miles in length; and every mile of it is navigated, more or less. It is true, not much business is as yet transacted towards its sources; but, when it flows into the Southern climate, a commerce of great wealth and importance is carried on, through this channel, to the ocean. Many intelligent gentlemen consider that double as much business is done on this river as on any other in the Union; and, in fact, some say three times as much is done on it as on any other river in America.

I presume the river that comes nearest to the Mississippi in wealthy commerce, is the Hudson, in the State of New York. In making this comparison, I consider the Hudson as ending at the city of New York, and the Mississippi at New Orleans. The length of the Hudson cannot be compared with the other; and, although much wealth may pour into the Hudson from the New York canal, and from the State, yet it cannot, in my opinion, be compared with the vast country bordering the Mississippi, and the corresponding wealth that is shipped on that river.

Mr. Chairman, I pretend not that all this wealth which is shipped on the Mississippi crosses the two rapids (which are called the Des Moines and Rock River rapids) mentioned in the amendment before the committee; yet, nevertheless, the commerce of a great and a growing country is shipped over these obstructions. All the Iowa Territory is dependent on the Mississippi for almost all its commerce. Its surplus produce exported, and merchandise imported, are shipped on this river, and must pass one or both of these rapids. The western portion of Wisconsin Territory is in the same situation; and so is the northwest section of Illinois. The country above these obstructions, and adjacent to the river, is growing fast, and is carrying on considerable business on the river at present. The lead from this region that is shipped over these rapids amounts, during the year, to millions and millions of pounds. The furs from the sources of the Mississippi and St. Peter's, that descend the river, are also considerable. The farmers, whose industry has so rapidly improved the country, export great quantities of their surplus crops over these obstructions; and the lumber, from the prairies between the Mississippi and Lake Superior, constitutes an article of considerable commerce, which is also compelled to pass these rapids to find a market.

The most careless observer of the Western country must be forced to believe that the commerce on the Mississippi is at present of vast importance to the whole Union, and is increasing with the same unparalleled rapidity as the country is improving.

Mr. Chairman, the great loss of property and destruction of boats on the Mississippi have become so well known all over the Union, and so much has been written and spoken on the occasion, that it would be idle and useless for me to attempt to portray these horrid scenes. Every traveller on the Mississippi is compelled to become a witness to the fact. The hulls and wrecks of boats are so common in some parts of the river, that a person would suppose that some horrible fatality had destroyed all that approached the ill-fated spot. A location of this character on the Mississippi, a few miles above the mouth of the Ohio, has become celebrated throughout the West, and is known as the "Boat Grave-Yard." This is the grave-yard where the finest steamboats that ever sailed on the Western waters, with their valuable cargoes, were wrecked and lost; and in this vicinity the steamboat Eliza was sunk, and with her, also, perished fifty or sixty persons. Capt. Littleton, the commander and owner of the Eliza, not only lost his vessel, but in the confusion, at night, his wife and children also perished with the boat. Besides the valuable lives lost on this river, more than three millions and a half of property, within two or three years, have been destroyed and lost, not only to the immediate owners, but lost, also, to the nation. These losses and destruction of property have not been done in a corner, or in the dark. They all occurred in the most public thoroughfare in the Union, and are known more or less to every man in the nation.

Mr. Chairman, these facts being known to Congress, will it not compel this body to improve the river to prevent similar losses? Is it not a duty the nation owe the people of the West to improve this great national highway? It is economy in the highest degree to make this improvement. If it were not for the purposes of economy, I would not urge this subject on the consideration of Congress. It is to expend a small sum, to save a very great one to the people. Is it not economy for man to provide himself support, rather than to die? Who would die rather than to spend a few cents each day to sustain life? And I might ask, with the same reason, who would not spend a few cents on the improvement of the Mississippi, rather than to permit millions of dollars and valuable lives to be lost? Who can compare money to life? All these improvements are easily made. A small sum annually expended will remove the snags from the Mississippi, and render a safe navigation over the rapids of Des Moines and Rock river, which are mentioned in the amendment now before the committee.

The low state of the treasury cannot be urged against this improvement, as it is a measure of economy, and will directly advance the public interest. Because a man is poor, should he cease to eat? The improvement of the Mississippi is almost as essential to commerce as eating is to an animal. There is no improvement in all this extended confederacy so essential to commerce as the improvement of this river. This work, carried out to a reasonable extent, will save more lives and more wealth than any other improvement in America. Admitting the treasury to be almost empty, the country is wealthy, and full of resources. No famine, pestilence, or war, has visited the people; all are vigorous and industrious. It is no excuse that the treasury is not overflowing, that this improvement should not be made. Can we stop the commerce on the river, or prevent the loss of lives and property on it, until the treasury is full? There can exist no solid reason against the improvement; and I hope the appropriation will be made.

The honorable delegate from Iowa Territory [Mr. A. C. DODGE] has agreed that the sum of fifty thousand dollars, which had been reported in a bill to construct roads in said Territory, should be applied to the improvement of these rapids, and has proposed the amendment accordingly. This arrangement of the delegate is honorable to the patriotism and enlightened views of that gentleman, as no improvement can equal in importance and utility that on the Mississippi.

REMARKS OF MR. MERIWETHER, OF GEORGIA.

In the House of Representatives, February 4, 1843—On his motion to reduce the pay of the navy twenty per cent.

Mr. MERIWETHER said that it was from no hostility to the service that he desired to reduce the pay of the navy. It had been increased in 1835 to meet the increase of labor elsewhere, &c; and a decline having taken place there, he thought a corresponding decline should take place in the price of labor in the navy.

At the last session of Congress, this House called on the Secretary of the Navy for a statement of the pay allowed each officer previous to the act of 1835. From the answer to that resolution, Mr. M. derived the facts which he should state to the House. He was desirous of getting the exact amount received by each grade of officers, to show the precise increase by the act of 1835. Aided by that report, the Biennial Register of 1822, and the report of the Secretary of the Navy for 1822, furnishing the estimates for the "full pay and full rations" of each grade of officers, he was enabled to present the entire facts accurately.

Previous to that time, the classification of officers was different from what it has been since; but, as far as like services have been rendered under each classification, the comparative pay is presented under each.

Previous to 1835, the pay of the "commanding officer of the navy" was $100 per month, and sixteen rations per day, valued at 25 cents each ration; which amounted, "full pay and full rations," to $2,660 per annum. The same officer as senior captain in service receives now $4,500; while "on leave," he receives $3,500 per annum.

Before 1835, a "captain commanding a squadron" received the same pay as the commanding officer of the navy, and the same rations; amounting, in all, to $2,660; that same officer, exercising the same command, receives now $4,000.

Before 1835, a captain commanding a vessel of 32 guns and upwards, received $100 per month and eight rations per day—being a total of $1,930 per annum; a captain commanding a vessel of 20 and under 32 guns, received $75 per month and six rations per day—amounting to $1,447 50 per annum. Since 1835, these same captains, when performing these same duties, receive $3,500; and when at home, by their firesides, "waiting orders," receive $2,500 per annum.

Before 1835, a "master commanding" received $60 per month and five rations per day—amounting to $1,176 per annum. Since that time, the same officer, in sea service, receives $2,500 per annum; at other duty, $2,100 per annum; and "waiting orders," $1,800 per annum.

Before 1835, a "lieutenant commanding" received $50 per month and four rations per day; which amounted to $965 per annum. Since that time, the same officer receives, for similar services, $1,800 per annum.

Before 1835, a lieutenant on other duty received $40 per month and three rations per day—amounting to $761 per annum. Since that time, for the same services, that same officer has received $1,500 per annum; and when "waiting orders," $1,200 per annum.

Before 1835, a midshipman received $19 per month and one ration per day—making $319 25 per annum. Since that time, a passed midshipman on duty received $750 per annum; if "waiting orders," $600; a midshipman received, in sea service, $400; on other duty, $350; and "waiting orders," $300 per annum.

Surgeons, before 1835, received $50 per month and two rations per day—amounting to $787 50; they now receive from $1,000 to $2,700 per annum.

Before 1835, a "schoolmaster" received $25 per month and two rations per day; now, under the name of a professor, he receives $1,200 per annum.

Before 1835, a carpenter, boatswain, and gunner received $20 per month and two rations per day—making $427 50 each per annum; they now receive, if employed on a ship-of the-line, $750, on a frigate $600, on other duty $500, and "waiting orders" $360 per annum. A similar increase has been made in the pay of all other officers. The pay of seamen has not been enlarged, and it is proposed to leave it as it is. In several instances, an officer idle, "waiting orders," receives more pay now than one of similar grade received during the late war, when he exposed his life in battle in defence of his country. At the navy-yards the pay of officers was greater than at sea. Before 1835, a captain commandant received for pay, rations, candles, and servants' hire, $3,013 per annum, besides fuel; the same officer, for the same services, receives now $3,500 per annum.

A master commandant received $1,408 per annum, with fuel; the same officer now receives $2,100 per annum. A lieutenant received $677, with fuel; the same officer receives now $1,500.

At naval stations, before the act of 1835, a captain received $2,660 per annum; he now receives $3,500 per annum. A lieutenant received $761 per annum, and he now receives $1,500 per annum. Before and since the act of 1835, quarters were furnished the officers at navy yards and stations. Before that time, the pay and emoluments were estimated for in dollars and cents, and appropriated for as pay; and the foregoing statements are taken from the actual "estimates" of the Navy Department, and, as such, show the whole pay and emoluments received by each officer.

The effect of this increase of pay has been realized prejudicially in more ways than one. In the year 1824, there were afloat, in the navy, 404 guns; in 1843, 946 guns. The cost of the item of pay alone for each gun, then, was $2,360; now, the cost is $3,500.

The naval service has become, to a great extent, one of ease and of idleness. The high pay has rendered its offices mostly sinecures; hence the great effort to increase the number of officers. Every argument has been used, every entreaty resorted to, to augment that corps. We have seen the effect of this, that in one year (1841) there were added 13 captains, 41 commanders, 42 lieutenants, and 163 midshipmen, without any possibly conceivable cause for the increase; and when, at the same time, these appointments were made, there were 28 captains "waiting orders," and 6 "on leave;" 26 commanders "waiting orders," and 3 "on leave;" 103 lieutenants "on leave and waiting orders," and 16 midshipmen "on leave and waiting orders." The pay of officers "waiting orders" amounted, during the year 1841, to $261,000; and now the amount required for the pay of that same idle corps, increased by a useless and unnecessary increase of the navy, is $395,000! It is a fact worthy of notice, that, under the old pay in 1824, there were 28 captains, 4 of whom were "waiting orders;" of 30 commanders, only 7 were "waiting orders." Under the new pay, in 1843, there are 68 captains, of whom 38 are "waiting orders;" 97 commanders, of whom 57 are "waiting orders and on leave."

The item of pay, in 1841, amounted to $2,335,000, and we are asked to appropriate for the next twelve months $3,333,139. To give employment to as many officers as possible, it is proposed to extend greatly our naval force; increasing the number of our vessels in commission largely, and upon every station, notwithstanding our commerce is reduced, and we are at peace with all the world, and have actually purchased our peace from the only nation from which we apprehended difficulty.

It was stated somewhere, in some of the reports, that the appropriation necessary to defray the expenses of courts-martial in the navy would be, this year, $50,000. This was a very large amount, when contrasted with the service. The disorderly conduct of the navy was notorious—no one could defend it. The country was losing confidence in it daily, and becoming more unwilling to bear the burdens of taxation to foster or sustain it. A few years since, its expenditures did not exceed four millions and a half: they are now up to near eight millions of dollars. Its expense is greater now than during the late war with England. Notwithstanding the unequivocal declarations of Congress, it the last session, against the increase of the navy, and in favor of its reduction, the Secretary passes all unheeded, and moves on in his bold career of folly and extravagance, without abiding for a moment any will but his own. Nothing more can be hoped for, so long as the navy has such a host of backers, urging its increase and extravagance—from motives of personal interest too often. The axe should be laid at once to the root of the evil: cut down the pay, and it will not then be sought after so much as a convenient resort for idlers, who seek the offices for the pay, expecting and intending that but little service shall be rendered in return, because but very little is needed. The salaries are far beyond any compensation paid to any other officer of Government, either State or Federal, for corresponding services. A lieutenant receives higher pay than a very large majority of the judges of the highest judicatories known to the States; a commander far surpasses them, and equals the salaries of a majority of the Governors of the States. Remove the temptation which high pay and no labor present, and you will obviate the evil. Put down the salaries to where they were before the act of 1835, and you will have no greater effort after its offices than you had before. So long as the salaries are higher than similar talents can command in civil life, so long will applicants flock to the navy for admission, and the constant tendency will be to increase its expenses. The policy of our Government is to keep a very small army and navy during time of peace, so to insure light taxes, and to induce the preponderance of the civil over the military authorities. In time of peace, we shall meet with no difficulty in sustaining an efficient navy, as we always have done. In time of war, patriotism will call forth our people to the service. Those who would not heed this call are not wanted; for those who fight for pay will, under all circumstances, fight for those who will pay the best. The navy cannot complain of this proposed reduction; for its pay was increased in view of the increasing value of labor and property throughout the whole country. No other pay was increased; and why should not this be reduced?—not the whole amount actually increased, but only a small portion of the increase? It is due to the country; and no one should object. We are now supporting the Government on borrowed money. The revenues will not be sufficient to support it hereafter; and reduction has to take place sooner or later, and upon some one or all of the departments. Upon which ought it to fall more properly than on that which has been defended against the prejudices resulting from the high prices which have recently fallen upon every department of labor and property?

By the adoption of the amendment proposed, there will be a permanent annual saving of about $400,000 in the single item of pay. And, from the embarrassed condition of the treasury, so large a sum of money might, with the greatest propriety, be saved; more especially since, by the late British treaty concluded at this place, an annual increase is to be made to the navy expenditures of some $600,000, as it is stated, to keep a useless squadron on the coast of Africa. The estimates for pay for the present year greatly exceed those of the last year. We appropriated for the last year's service for pay, &c., $2,335,000. The sum asked for the same service this year is $2,953,139. Besides, there here is the sum of $380,000 asked for clothing—a new appropriation, never asked for before. The clothing for seamen being paid for by themselves, so much of the item of pay as was necessary had hitherto been expended in clothing for them, which was received by them in lieu of money. Now, a separate fund is asked, which is to be used as pay, and will increase that item so much, making a sum-total of $3,333,139; which is an excess of $998,139 over and above that appropriated for the like purpose last session.

It seems not to be necessary absolutely to make this increased appropriation. The Secretary of the Navy says that his plan of keeping the ships sailing over the ocean (where possibly no vessel can or will see them, and where the people with whom we trade can never learn anything of our greatness, on account of the absence of our ships from their ports, being kept constantly sailing from station to station) will "require larger squadrons than we have heretofore employed." He then states that his estimates are prepared for squadrons upon this large and expensive plan. "This," he says, "it is my duty to do, submitting to Congress to determine whether, under the circumstances, so large a force can properly be put in commission or not. If the condition of the treasury will warrant it, (of which they are the judges,) I have no hesitation in recommending the largest force estimated for." It is well known that the condition of the treasury will not warrant this force. We must fall back upon the force of last year, as the ultimatum that can be sustained. Our appropriations for pay last year were $1,000,000 less than those now asked for. This can be cut off without prejudice to the service; and with the reduction proposed in the salaries, $1,400,000 can be saved from waste, and applied to sustain a depleted treasury. Increase is now unreasonable and impracticable.

A portion of the home squadron, authorized in September, 1841, has not yet gone to sea, for the want of seamen. While our commerce is failing, and our sailors are idle, they will not enter the service. The flag-ship of that squadron is yet in port without her complement of men. Why, then, only increase officers and build ships, when you cannot get men to man them?

The pay of captains, commanding ships of 32 guns and upwards, shall be $100 per month, and eight rations per day; of captains, commanding ships of 20 and under 32 guns, $75 per month, and six rations per day; of a master-commandant, $60 per month and five rations per day; and of lieutenants, who may command the smaller vessels, $50 per month and four rations per day.

Whenever any officer as aforesaid shall be employed in the command of a squadron on separate service, the allowance of rations to such commanding officer shall be doubled during the continuance of such command, and no longer, except in the case of the commanding officer of the navy, whose allowance while in service shall always be at the rate of sixteen rations per day.

The pay and subsistence of the respective commission and warrant officers shall be as follows:

A lieutenant less than a master-commandant, or lieutenant commanding a small vessel, $40 per month, and three rations per day; a chaplain, $40 per month and two rations per day; a sailing-master, $40 per month and two rations per day; a surgeon, $50 per month and two rations per day, &c.

By the act of 26th August, 1842, the pay of other officers is increased, to wit:

Boatswains, gunners, carpenters, and sailmakers, now receive per annum	$800
On other duty	700
On leave or waiting orders for the first 10 years	500
And after	600

Pay since 1835.

Senior captain, in service	$4,500

Add for forty-six midshipmen, who, after examination, may be entitled to be arranged as passed midshipmen, in addition to their pay as midshipmen	13,800
	$395,950

The foregoing is the amount paid by the people to support the idlers in the navy for one year. The following are the payments made for the support of officers idle, and "waiting orders" from 1829 to 1841, inclusive:

1829	$197,684
1830	156,025
1831	231,378
1832	204,290
1833	205,233
1834	202,914
1835	219,036
1836	212,362
1837	115,631
1838	260,990
1839	297,737
1841	262,856

The chief of the Medical Bureau, in his annual report, presents the following facts, as illustrative of the manner in which some of the appropriations made for the naval service are disposed of; and what fidelity characterizes the expenditures! Speaking of the expenditure of the appropriation for medicines, he says:

"Six hundred and sixty-five dollars and fifty-seven cents were, unauthorizedly, paid out of the appropriation for medicines, surgical instruments, &c.,' for 31 blue cloth frock-coats, with navy buttons, and a silver star on them; 31 pairs of blue cassimere pantaloons, and 31 blue cassimere vests, with navy buttons;—and all this toggery for 'Jack'—for pensioners who never had worn anything longer than a sailor's jacket, or, at most, in storms, a monkey or pea-jacket, the cost of which is eight dollars, instead of fourteen definite charged for the frock coats, made in officer's undress fashion. This will serve to show the unwarrantable intrusions on the appropriation for medicines, referred to in the text. But it may more strongly be set forth by this fact: Of seven thousand one hundred and twenty-one dollars and sixty-four cents, paid by the navy agent at Philadelphia, from the 1st of October, 1841, to the 25th of October, 1842, out of the appropriation for 'medicines, &c.' only one thousand and forty dollars and nineteen cents were for medicines, surgical instruments, and sugical purposes. The remaining six thousand one hundred and eighty-one dollars and forty-five cents were for items of expenditure, wholly foreign to the intent of the appropriation, and, of course, were what have been appropriately called intrusions on the fund, not known to be practised, nor thought of by Congress, when they made the appropriations in question.

"How could thirty thousand dollars, appropriated for the whole naval service, for the whole year 1842, be deemed sufficient, when a mal-administration of the fund on one station swept off at once, in a few days more than twelve months, $6,181 45, not lawfully chargeable to the medical fund? Could the balance, $23,818 55, be for a moment thought competent to supply all the ships, sick quarters, hospitals, &c., in the United States for a whole year? That this mal-administration may be understood, the navy-agent's return to the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery is annexed, in toto, as an appendix. It will not be understood, however, that the slightest blame is imputed, in these irregular transactions, to that gentleman, officially, or in any other way. The irregularity is chargeable, and it is now unhesitatingly charged, on the governor of the naval asylum, who approved the bills, and thus ordered their payment out of an appropriation which no sophistry could make chargeable with such burdens. In addition to these irregular outlays, the sum of $3,500 is reported on the purser's pay-rolls as paid annually, for wages or pay alone (exclusive of officers' pay,) in that institution; $428 of which is the wages of a person rated and paid as hospital steward, who never performed five minutes' duty as such in the hospital, but was employed solely as purser's clerk, and to buy provisions, for which he was regularly paid, as any agent not connected with the institution might have done. Of this whole amount of $3,500 for wages—the subsistence of those so paid being a further charge, and paid out of the appropriation for medicine—only $936 were allowed in the estimates of the Secretary of the Navy; and, subsequently, $300 per annum were allowed for a carpenter's mate—making $1,239 allowed; the balance ($2,361) being entirely unauthorized, or, at least, very doubtfully authorized.

"It may illustrate this remark to state, that the records of this bureau show that an eminent surgical instrument-maker, of Philadelphia, sold certain instruments of his manufacture, of the first-rate workmanship and approved pattern, for the sum of $669 81, to certain druggists largely supplying the medical outfits of vessels in a neighboring seaport. The commission alluded to in the text, conducted by Benjamin Homans, now of the Navy Department, shows that these identical instruments were furnished by the druggists alluded to, to certain vessels, and that they charged Government for them the sum of $1,224 54; thus exhibiting a profit of $554 73—in other words, an exorbitant charge of about 83 per cent.! This, too, on articles of well-known established price. These prices were approved in the usual way, and actually paid.

"The same commission brought to light, from actual vouchers, the charge by the same druggists of $287 82, in four years, for the recipients of medicines and freights, although they state, on oath, that the "drayage, freight, &c., was always paid by them." Epsom salts was invariably charged, in wholesale quantities, at ten cents per pound, when it can anywhere be purchased of the wholesale dealers at five cents, and even much less. Half an ounce of veratria was charged at eighteen dollars! An ounce of gold is worth sixteen dollars (a doubloon, or ounce.) Thus was a small white powder charged at thirty-six dollars an ounce—four dollars more than twice the value of an ounce of gold. One ounce of strychnine, a similar powder, was charged at thirty-four dollars—that is, two dollars more than twice the value of an ounce of gold. Two dozen bottles Bedford spring water were charged eight dollars, viz., thirty-three cents per bottle. Two scabs of vaccine virus were charged at nine dollars. Oiled silk, worth (of the best quality) $1 37½ per yard, was charged eighty dollars for twenty yards—that is, four dollars per yard. Seventy-two bottles compound sirup sarsaparilla were charged at $108, viz., $1 50 a bottle. The retail price is everywhere seventy five cents a bottle, and it has been purchased by this bureau, in Philadelphia, at $7 50 per dozen, or $49 per 72 bottles.

"In the examination of vouchers by the same commission, still more extortionate charges appeared on some articles. In short, the whole of the charges now printed in the documents of Congress are of the same extortionate character.

"The illustrations given are ample to prove the truth of the remarks in the text, on the veracity of furnishers. Of $42,504 34 paid by a navy agent at the seaport alluded to, out of the appropriation for 'medicines, &c.,' these furnishers received $22,676 10."

The following are some of the expenditures under the head of appropriations for "medicine:"

SPEECH OF MR. ARCHER,

OF VIRGINIA,

In Senate, January 30, 1843—On the Oregon bill.

Mr. ARCHER commenced by remarking, that he had been in some degree anticipated by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. McDUFFIE,] who had so well discussed this measure, the other day, in the line of observation he intended to pursue. His opinions not conforming, in some other respects, however, to the views which had been expressed by other gentlemen, he was desirous of an opportunity to state them at this time.

The debate had deviated a good deal from, but had now reverted to, the appropriate topics—the consistency of the clause of the bill pledging allodial grants of land to emigrants, with the tenor of our convention with England on the subject of the territory; and the general policy of accelerating the settlement of it by our people. To both these points he would say a few words.

All admitted, of course, that we were not to adopt the clause referred to, if it operated any impairment of the obligation of the convention. A great and, it seemed to him, strange discrepancy of opinion had been exhibited on this point. The language of the convention seemed in no degree "equivocal." The import was simply a stipulation for mutual and free ingress into the territory, and a common undisturbed use, until the parties should determine further on the subject. Could there be a question of the exclusion, under such a condition, of the right to exert and convey a full property in the soil? If the condition did not operate such exclusion, what was its effect? Had it any?

But suppose the import doubtful—susceptible of two interpretations. In what source were we to explore for the right one? to what evidence resort? There could be none other than the nature of the controversy adjusted, and the character of the discussions which attended the adjustment. Now, the proposition which he (Mr. A.) maintained was this: that in the entire progress of the negotiations on this subject of Oregon—from the beginning to the end—there had been no point brought into issue, no question touched in discussion, save the single one of the title in the territory. Here had been parties engaged in protracted negotiations as to what were the grounds of title, and whose the right to the territory. They find themselves unable to agree. What is done? Resolving nothing on the subject of title, they make a convention for a common temporary use, dissoluble at pleasure, by notice. What is the plain inference from this? Is it not, that decision on the title being suspended, the fruits of full title—all other of its privileges than temporary use; above everything, the unrestricted authority to dispose in full property—must be suspended also? If such an arrangement had not this effect, where is the matter to be found to give it any operation? What has it been made for? What purpose is it to subserve? Is it any more than a blank?

It was in the face of this indisputable fact, that the negotiations had had relation to no other point or subject than the title to the territory, that the honorable Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WOODBURY] had maintained that the conventions in which the negotiations resulted were to be regarded as no more than conventions of commerce, leaving unimpaired and unaffected the right to carry our claim of title into the fullest effect, by disposal of the soil in absolute property, or pledges to make this disposal of it. A treaty of commerce! Not only had there been no mention of commerce, or regulation on the subject of it, in the negotiations; but, in truth, there had been nothing to which the name of commerce could be applied. The sole business pursued by our people or Englishmen, at the time, had been the pursuit and trapping of animals for furs! At the last adoption or renewal of the convention, we had very little interest of this kind; the prosecution of this business by our people having nearly ceased on the western side of the Rocky Mountains. There had been no occasion, therefore, for arrangement on our part to regulate this subject; nor a convention at all, unless for the preservation of our title, liable to be put in hazard by our non-user, and the overspreading of the territory by English use and occupation.

Exclusive title to the territory, or any part, had not been asserted for England by her negotiators. Their object had been only to rebut and repel our claim of this character. They admitted our right as largely as their own, and only went into the investigation of the grounds of exclusive title, for the purpose of showing that their title on these grounds was as defensible as ours. They maintained that the title of all the world to colonize was equal to ours and to theirs. This was all shown by the paper delivered by Messrs. Huskisson and Addington to our commissioner in 1827, as the summary of the pretensions of their Government. How was it conceivable that, in these circumstances, they had consented to a convention, the just construction of which left us at full liberty to pursue our exclusive title, and give the fullest effect to it?

In the last discussions, in 1827, it had become a subject of consideration whether we should consent to any renewal of the convention. Gentlemen would see this in the correspondence of Mr. Gallatin, at that day, with the State Department. But why make this a question, if the convention were to be no restraint on us—if, after admitting it, we might go on, as before, to execute our claim of exclusive title, as we saw occasion? Mr. Gallatin gave the answer to this inquiry. The renewal was of use to preserve our title, there being no other interest at that time to preserve. That was the sole interest to be consulted. The sole object was to preserve it. Well! if the convention secured the preservation of our claim, how could the protection of the counter claim be excluded from its influence? Was it to be effective for us—null for our adversary? Was that the principle of construction we were to contend for? And where was the limit of our right to make grants in full property, or engage for them? Why might not these come to cover the whole territory? And where was the room for the operation of the convention then?—what the part England was to have in it?—the benefit she was to realize or preserve?

And what were the modes in which the objection, that a breach of the compact would be involved in the adoption of this clause of the bill, was met? First, by the allegation that Great Britain had preceded us in this same form of breach of compact. That position, however, had been found untenable—having encountered refutation from the document furnished under the call of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MOREHEAD.] What was the next ground? That Great Britain had come to enjoy almost the entire usufruct and advantages of the territory—nearly as much as she would under an exclusive title. But by what means? Not by constraint or intimidation exerted on our people—that was not pretended; but as the consequence of a dexterous management of the Indians, and the practice of overbidding for furs, and underselling in merchandise! Well! superior adroitness in the use of a subject of stipulation, no more than the same adroitness displayed in obtaining it, constituted an effect of contravention, which set at work the rule, that breach on one side remitted obligation on the other! His friend from Kentucky [Mr. MOREHEAD] could hardly, he thought, feel himself strong on this ground. There was none left to countervail the allegation of breach of compact prominent in the clause of the bill assuring the grants of title to the emigrants whom it invited to the territory.

Passing by this consideration, however, (which, prevailing as it was, has formed his chief inducement to trespass on the Senate:) suppose we could be justified in the conclusion, that the controverted clause of the bill involved no breach of compact,—it was to be remembered that there was another party besides ourselves to exercise the office of interpretation. The aspect in which that party might regard it was not devoid (as the action of the advocates of the clause to be intelligible must conceive) of interest to us. Suppose the construction of the clause by Great Britain, differing from ours, should infer a deviation from the compact. There were gentlemen in this body, indeed, who could not be found to admit that a question had more than one side in our controversies with other nations. This did not make it less true, in the event that there might prove to be two sides. What if there did here? Great Britain had commercial relations with us far too valuable to be sacrificed for any value she could attach to Oregon in a naked, simple estimate of values and advantages. That she should put the one in the scales with the other, in this view, was not conceivable, in her large-sighted commercial policy.

But another consideration there was, which, mixed with this, no English ministry of any party had the power, more than the inclination, to disregard—and this was the point of national honor. Rupture for the mere sake of Oregon, he repeated, was not conceivable. But he would tell gentlemen what was entirely conceivable: that England, if she considered the mode of occupation we proposed as infringing our arrangement with her, might stand on that point, when she would not on the value of the territory; or would proceed on our own plan, and occupy in the same manner the portion she aspired to possess. What he (Mr. A.) maintained, was, that either of these procedures on her part must have an effect to complicate the question of adjustment, augment the chances of a less favorable result than might otherwise be expected, and put us in a position of contest less commanding than that which we were entitled to occupy.

Both the gentlemen from Missouri, and indeed all the friends of the bill, insisted that, situated as we were in relation to the territory—our people coterminous, and with the irresistible propensity of a portion of them to migration—the result was inevitable, that the country would fall into our possession. This opinion was, to all appearance, well founded. Why, then, from impatience to accelerate, adopt a course which had an obvious tendency to compromise this result? And did we not adopt such a course, when, with negotiation long permitted, yet depending, recently resumed, we decided to disregard it, and to establish the measure of adjustment for ourselves? He might safely appeal to candor to give the answer to this inquiry.

If we took a step of this character, we must be prepared, of course, to maintain it. Then, prudence demanded that we should estimate the consequences. He had no design to hold up the power of England in terror. We were well able to maintain conflict with her, if just occasion should require it. But, in reference to this Territory of Oregon as one of the theatres of contest, in the event of war, it was worthy of inquiry—on which side lay the balance of advantage, in waging this contest? The territory was remote from both the contending parties—the means of either, for military operations here, inconsiderable. But Great Britain had, if no formal military force, a considerable body of men connected with the Hudson Bay Company disposable for military purposes, as not engaged in agricultural pursuits, and of military habits. She had established relations of control with the Indians contiguous, who must become auxiliaries in the contest. She had command of the ports by which access to supplies—military or other—was to be afforded; superiority on the ocean, over which these supplies must be transported. She had dependencies and relations with the opposite continent of Asia, bringing her into comparative neighborhood to Oregon. In all these respects we were inferior; our settlements being recent, and agricultural merely. We were under no disadvantage, indeed, as regarded the transportation of forces by land; but neither had we any considerable advantage in that respect, as Canada was nearly as convenient as our territories to the scene.

Then, in the event of war, if neither party deemed the object worth the additional force its maintenance would require, our means of maintenance already there were inadequate and inferior; and we must be exposed to the loss of the territory. If the object should be considered worth the transfer of further force, on the other hand, then England would enjoy decided advantage over us in transporting to the scene the force and supplies required for operation; and we should, in this event, too, probably incur the loss of this subject of contest. If we got it back at the close of the conflict, in this result we must pay the price in some form of compensation elsewhere. Would it be worth any equivalent we might probably have to offer? If the war was to end on the ground of the status quo—that is to say, leaving the parties as they were at the outset—then we should have our own, minus the sacrifices of the contest. If it were to end on the ground of the uti possidetis—or of each party retaining what it was in possession of at the close—then we should lose the subject of contest, without a compensation. In one or other of the three modes mentioned, the conflict must have its termination. In neither would we be a gainer, as respected this particular subject; which we must be exposed to lose, or to a cost for preservation; or, in the event of recovery after loss, for restoration, incomparably superior to any value which could, in a sober estimate, be attached to it at the present, or at any early period. He had to say to his friend from Missouri, therefore, that he—not his friend—was the true advocate of our interest in this territory; that the plan proposed was the course to put the territory in jeopardy, and the only course; that it was the conviction of this truth, mainly, which led to the opposition to this course.

There was a further, and it ought to be a prevailing consideration, bearing on this view of the subject. The bill extended our jurisdiction over the entire contested territory to latitude 34 degrees 40 minutes, the limit of the Russian possession. But in both the negotiations we have had on this question, we had yielded our assent to being restricted to the line of the 49th parallel of latitude. Were we now to recede from this proposition, proceeding from ourselves, and at the instant of consenting to the resumption of negotiation? We were authorized to do this in negotiation, propositions not binding unless accepted. But how far would it be consistent in itself, or conformable to comity, or prudent, to adopt such a course, with a negotiation depending, in which this very proposal may have been (as it probably has been) renewed, to form the basis of discussion? Who ever, indeed, heard before the present instance, of authorizing negotiation, and at the same moment proceeding to terminate the issue by action which was conclusive of it? Was not such a mode of proceeding novel in international transactions?

Whatever the course we pursue, this affair must be settled by negotiation at last. Nobody supposed that Great Britain was going to recede before our claim, and yield us the whole subject of controversy, part of which we had professed our willingness to surrender. Then! war, or no war, negotiation must untie the knot, and put the conclusion. If there were war—that must have an end too, and by negotiation. Why not let the conclusion in this mode be the antecedent to war, not the result of it? The truth was, that negotiation would furnish a settlement more advantageous for us, than the allowance of our claim to the 49th degree of latitude. From the character of the country, and the deficiency of harbors within the limits of the 42d and 49th degree—the boundaries of our latest demand—a conventional line could probably, nay certainly, be run on the basis of the proposition to that effect, (not the exact proposition,) which had been made by the British commissioners to Mr. Gallatin in 1827; which would be more advantageous than the line of 49 degrees FOR BOTH THE PARTIES. Why preclude the chance of this mode of adjustment, by a step which (to say the least of it) might tend to the rupture of negotiation? There could be no advised policy in such a proceeding.

He came now to the views which he partook with the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. MCDUFFIE,] who had asked what the considerations were which called on us for the indulgence of a spirit of impatience on this subject of the occupation of Oregon? The Senator from Missouri told us, indeed, that our people had already gone there, and that it ought not to be a question as to our following them with adequate protection. He would not now discuss the doctrine how far a migratory population was allowed to give (not take) the law from the discretion of their own Government, as respected the progress of the settlement of territory, and to drag forward the public authority to any distance, expense, or exposure to collisions with foreign powers. However this might be, the proposition could not be controverted—that regard to the general interests ought to weigh for something in deciding on the policy to be observed; at least as to the form and measure of the subsidiary action which was required of the Government. If we were bound to follow our population to Oregon, we were not bound to adopt a plan to fill the territory up with population; for that was the scope of the present project—to hold out a lure to emigration to it. Now, let us look a little at the inducements to this course—the advantages to be anticipated.

The country was separated not only from our present, but any settlement we could ever have, (unless we expelled the Indians from all habitation within the limits of our claim of territory,) by a vast tract of Indian territory—much of it a desert. Then came the utterly barren and almost impracticable chain of the Rocky Mountains, penetrable at only infrequent passes, remote from each other. Then the territory proper, divided in its whole length by ledges of mountain ranges, barren, little practicable, penetrated by streams unnavigable save in detached portions, and not admitting of being rendered navigable in their full extent. These led to the third and last tract of valley on the seaboard of the Pacific, suited for an Asiatic (not an American) dependency, if it were to be regarded of value as a dependency at all.

This portion was suitable for agriculture; but the only really valuable part for this purpose (that in which our people were settled) was destitute of any tolerable harborage, and could never command any by art. The country, taken in its whole extent, could at no day certainly have a very large production, nor any considerable trade. From the production and trade it might come to command, owing to our position, the share of advantage could never be very considerable to us. And this was the country of which we were called upon to precipitate the settlement, by a forced operation! At what cost? Not the mere promise of the land—that would be nothing in itself; but, first, of considerable expense, then at the hazard of national embroilment.

We had passed a bill to reduce the army last year. But we had also learned, from a report of the War Department, responsive to a call, that the prosecution of the proposed plan of the occupation of Oregon would demand an addition to our military establishment (not the reduced—the full) of sixteen hundred men. The estimate had been given in detail; the number of forts, the number of men stated. Were we now to retrace our policy of retrenchment, as respected our military establishment, and make a large advance in the opposite policy of enlargement? And for what object? To gain Oregon prematurely? It was conceded that, by waiting the natural, and not slow progress of events, it must become ours. And the compensations! The business of collecting furs being confessedly nearly extinct in the region which would fall to our share, what were they? The burdens must be considerable; and as the country could not pass for a long time from the condition of a Territory, (supposing we would ever permit it to do so by incorporation in the Union,) in which all expenses were borne by this Government, these burdens must be continuous for a long, or for all time. There would be no revenue, inconsiderable trade, a frontier removed, to become a source of exposure and weakness. But there was a further view. We had 700,000,000 of acres of land, or some immense amount, on this side of the Rocky Mountains, yet undisposed of. A large proportion, besides its other advantages, was of a fertility with which no country (certainly not Oregon) could bear comparison. Why tempt our people from this region, where they would conduce to our strength by their numbers, to our revenue by their consumption?—what was more, where they would become the purchasers of land from us, instead of having it given to them to go from us?

We heard every day, on the floor of this chamber, of the deplorable deficiencies in the revenue, of the importance of the branch of it derived from the public lands, and the necessity of cherishing this great resource against over-taxation in the other department of the revenue, and all the mischievous results of it. Yet here was a policy impairing both sources of revenue—tempting away the people—who, if they remained, would buy the lands, contribute to the imposts which nourished the General, and to the taxation which was required to uphold the revenues of the State Governments. And this was to be done at a time when the revenues of the General Government were in the last stage of depression, the State revenues sunk under their burdens, and the population of the States nearest to Oregon prompted to fly, without any lure of invitation, from the taxation demanded by these burdens!

The reverse side of the argument presented no relief to the conclusion. No revenue, little trade, fixed and continuing expense, exposure to Indian and to foreign embroilments;—the theatre of embroilment, remote from access by land, nearly cut off from access by forts, and on which the adversary with whom we must contend had preoccupied all the advantages, subjecting us to disproportioned efforts to maintain ourselves in conflict, and a price of success which bore no relation to the value of the object.

Such was the policy we were recommended by the bill, in its present form, to adopt! And the ground!—the mode of appeal!—the topic of incitement addressed to us!—what were they? Why, the penalty of acting, or seeming to act, under the fear of war with Great Britain—the intruder on all rights—the encroacher in all regions! Well, he confessed it; he was afraid of war; and, in particular, with Great Britain. War for no adequate cause? War—we giving the provocation, not Great Britain? He did not aspire to the courage which took no account of consequences—which was reckless for others—for the country. He feared rupture with Great Britain in particular. And why? For the reason, simply, that this power, having more and nearer points of contact with us—wider and more intimate, and more important relations—war with this power must be fraught with deeper injury to us. He must take this consideration into account, though the gentleman from Missouri would not. Aggression from any power was to be repelled, but not aggression made, because another power had the habit of aggression. This would be to take example from what we blamed. And he insisted that Great Britain, in availing herself of a larger and more beneficial use of the territory, under the compact for a common use, (all that had been shown against her,) practised no aggression; whilst we asserted, by this bill, an authority beyond a common use. Which was the party, then, that was to be considered as committing pacific relations to hazard?

Both the gentlemen from Missouri disclaimed, indeed, any purpose of provoking rupture with Great Britain; and doubtless they spoke in all sincerity. But what was the language they had employed, and reiterated, in speaking of Great Britain? If no provocation was designed or imputed by such language, what was the language they would resort to when provocation was designed? What language would import it? He should be glad to hear the distinction stated. Our negotiator had told us that, in his judgment, the tenacity of the British commissioners in the discussions of 1824 on this subject had been, in a great degree, attributable to proceedings here, and language held in Congress, by which the pride of the English Government had been wounded. Why should we have surprise at such an effect, at that time or this, when our own sensibility had been prompt to take exception at a mere suspicion of adroitness or success in turning the arrangement between the Governments to account?

Amid other topics of illustration of the encroaching temper of the English Government, the character of her policy towards China and Affghanistan had been introduced into the debate. Now he (Mr. A.) read the character of the latest proceedings in those quarters very differently since the present wise Administration had succeeded to the management of affairs in England. In the mid career of the most triumphant success in China, with no impediment to an unrestricted progress of her arms, what was the spectacle England had exhibited? Why, that she preferred the interests of commerce to conquest; as she would the larger interests of our commerce to Oregon, if the question were complicated with no provocation to her pride.

And, then, Affghanistan! What had been her recent conduct there? She had decided to retire from her establishments in that country, evidently from just perception of the impolicy of extension of dominion in that quarter. The present ministry were manifestly alive to the great truth, that commerce was the talisman of English prosperity—not the extension of territory, save for the interests of commerce. Before consenting to the abandonment of Affghanistan, however, let it be remembered that the English arms had returned there, after expulsion, to preserve the point of honor.

Did the history of this proceeding suggest to us no instruction? We too had an Affghanistan and a Hindostan. The Oregon Territory was as far beyond the region of our present interests of settlement and occupation, as Affghanistan was remote from any real connexion of interest with Hindostan. The valley region of the Mississippi, if its Ganges had seven mouths of discharge, as one time it must, would not be the empire of Hindostan, in its capacity of ministering to opulence and power. We could not withdraw entirely from our Affghanistan; but was it wise to make an effect to divert our population and resources from this Hindostan to that Affghanistan? No one thought of withholding protection from our people who had gone to Oregon, or might go there. The question was not on that point, but on the policy of instituting bounty on migration there; which the bill did. He (Mr. A.) made no objection to extending the jurisdiction of Iowa to Oregon, to the establishment of Indian agencies there, to an appropriation for exploration as regarded the occasion, and position of forts, and their future establishment if found to be required, (steps which England had taken;) he had no objection, in short, to any provision which would lead us pari passu with the action of the English Government, not inconsistent with reciprocal stipulations. Considering the clause of the bill so much discussed, in relation to the allodial grants of land, as presenting that inconsistency, he was obliged to wage opposition to this provision. He did so, not on this ground only; but on the farther ground, that the effect of such provision must be more probably to compromise than advance the objects of obtaining the territory eventually; and, in doing so, might also compromise the harmonious relations with the power with which we were litigating on this subject, on which great and equal interests of both parties were dependent.

SPEECH OF MR. BENTON,

OF MISSOURI.

In Senate, Thursday, February 2, 1843.—On the alteration of the boundary between Lake Superior and the Lake of the Woods.

Mr. BENTON said he had now finished all that he meant to say on the immediate subject before the Senate; but, in the progress of the debate, another question had grown up, springing out of the main one, and constituting a episode of some length as well as of much interest. The Oregon question connects itself with the merits of the late British treaty; and the refusal of the British minister to include this question in that treaty, has placed in higher relief the vices of the treaty itself; and, among others, the unexpected sacrifice of the old line of 1783, between the Lake Superior and the Lake of the Woods, and the free admission of British fur-traders and their goods to the places within our limits, from which they were removed under Jay's treaty, forty years ago. This vice in the treaty has been several times brought to the notice of the Senate by me; and, thanks to the opposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. CHOATE,] will now be kept before it until the attention of the Senate and the country is directed to it, and the public opinion determined and fixed.

The Senator from Massachusetts (said Mr. B.) is evidently much in earnest in all that he says; but he has fallen into two errors, which lead him entirely astray—the error of applying his testimony to the wrong river; and of confounding the treaty line of 1783, with the trading route followed at that time. The British letters, in the shape of affidavits, from which he read some parts as applicable to the northern branch of the Pigeon river route, were wholly applicable to the Kamanistiquia route, 50 miles further north; and the treaty line was the water communication along the northern branch of the Pigeon river and its connecting lakes, and not the trading route which was on the portage route of the same waters, but south of them. All this would be made clear on the maps, and would show the Senator the mistakes under which he labored, and which led to his erroneous convictions.

My complaint against the Secretary-negotiator is, that he sacrificed the boundary of the United States in this part of the northwestern line; gave up to the British what had belonged to us for sixty years, and which was all that was worth contending for in that quarter; and then affected to have made a grand acquisition, and to have secured to us four millions of acres of fine mineral lands, where he had actually made this sacrifice. By settling a disputed line, as he conceives, he has attained this fine result: when, in fact, there was no dispute about the line there; (Lord Ashburton refusing to second the British fur traders' demand of the St. Louis river;) and all the alteration made was to our prejudice—being the loss of all the territory between the two Pigeon river routes; the loss of the old trading route which commanded the Indian trade; and the loss of the revenue which the British fur company should have paid us on the goods carried through our territories.

The map which I have hung on the Secretary's table will explain what I say, and will show that from Lake Superior there are three routes (water and portage lines) leading from the west part of that lake to the Lake of the Woods; and that the middle one of these, (called the Lony Lakes, on Mitchell's map used in 1783, and Pigeon river in modern maps,) is the boundary under the treaty; has been so held and marked for sixty years; so admitted by the British fur traders in 1802; and so declared by Lord Ashburton at the late treaty. This route, by Pigeon river, divides, within twenty miles after leaving Lake Superior, into two branches; and, after joining and separating repeatedly, and going through a succession of small lakes and rivers, and sometimes diverging to the extent of half a degree, finally become united in Rainy Lake, at the distance of nearly two hundred miles from Lake Superior. The northern of these branches is called the water communication, because it approaches within six hundred and seventy-nine paces of the waters of the Lake of the Woods: the other is called the portage route, because it has thirty-six portages in it. The water communication is the boundary, under the treaty of 1783: the portage route was the trading one practised by the French when they occupied Canada, and by the British until they gave it up under Mr. Jay's treaty. This is the character of the two routes; though, in my speech upon the treaty, the northern branch was considered the trading route, which it is not. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CHOATE] has set me right in that particular; for which I have reason to thank him, as he shall soon see.

The other two routes are far to the north and to the south of this; the northern, fifty miles distant at the Kamanistiquia river, and through Dog Lake; the southern, at the St. Louis river, 240 miles south, at the western extremity of the Lake Superior. The Kamanistiquia route is called by the British the new route; being opened by them in 1802, when they had to give up the old French route. The St. Louis river route is called Fond du Lac, because at the extremity of the lake; and has no political, and but little commercial importance. The great points in the case are—1. The old British trading-post called the Grand Portage, or Fort Charlotte, at the entrance of Pigeon river, and a few miles south of its mouth. 2. The new British post at the mouth of the Kamanistiquia, and just north of it, called Fort William. 3. Hunter's Island, where these two routes unite. These three points are cardinal in this inquiry; for they are the landmarks of the national boundaries, as admitted, declared, and acted upon by the British themselves, from the time that Jay's treaty compelled them to remove from our limits. The Grand Portage, as seen marked upon every map, was evacuated by the British in 1802, under the article of Jay's treaty which stipulated for the surrender of the Western posts, and was abandoned to us as our property. Fort William, as seen upon the same maps fifty miles north, was established by the British at the same time, because it was on their territory; and it became the great depot of their goods and furs. This remained the case from Jay's treaty to Webster's treaty; but now it is the case no longer. What Jay's treaty—bad as it was—secured to us in that quarter, Webster's treaty—good as it is—has taken from us! And, more; it has drawn in the line for near two hundred miles, from the northern branch to the southern branch of the Pigeon-river route! has given the British all the territory between the two branches, including the large island called Hunter's! has given them the old trading-route which controls the Indians! and, in addition to all this, has exempted them from the payment of the duties, which they moved away to avoid at the time of Jay's treaty!

These are the allegations; and now for the proof. And the chief part of this proof shall be drawn from the British themselves—from the members of their powerful fur company, and from Lord Ashburton, who accomplished for them, in the late treaty, what they vainly attempted under the Ghent commission, and all they have been wishing for forty years.

I begin with the Grand Portage, on the western shore of Lake Superior, the former seat of trade and empire of the British Northwest Company;*

*"Lake Superior is the largest and most magnificent body of fresh water in the world: it is clear and pellucid, of great depth, and abounding in a great variety of fish, which are the most excellent of their kind. * * * The company keep a vessel of from 50 to 70 tons on this lake, to transport the goods coming from Montreal to the GRAND PORTAGE, and to return the furs. * * * The Grand Portage is situated on a pleasant bay on the north side of the lake, in latitude 48, and longitude 90 west from Greenwich. At the entrance of the bay is an island, which screens the harbor from every wind except the south. * * * The bay nd their reasons, given by themselves, for leaving hat great post—their grand quarters—in the year 802. I use seven affidavits from the partners and lerks of that company, used before the commisioners under the 7th article of the Ghent treaty, ear twenty years ago, and all preserved in our ublic documents of the session of 1837-38. The rst affidavit (in order to give a full view of the hole case) I read in full: from the others, short xtracts will be read, to sustain the material points:

The sworn affidavit of William Mackay, partner in the British Northwest Company, given at Montreal, June 12th, 1827.

"The undersigned, William Mackay, gentleman, now of the city of Montreal, in the Province f Lower Canada, doth hereby certify: That e was a partner of the Northwest Company, nder the firm of McTavish, McGillivray, and ompany, for the fur-trade of Lake Superior, and he countries east, north, and west of the said lake. That the great depot of the fur-trade was at the reat Carrying-place, a few miles west of Pigeon iver, in Lake Superior. That, from a strong beief, founded on the assertions of the United States fficers at the garrison of Michilimackinac, to imself in person, that the above depot was within he limits of the United States, and they would ey heavy duties on all merchandise, stores, &c., mported thereto, and on all furs, &c., exported herefrom, (which, had it taken place, would have een ruinous to the said company carrying on the ur-trade,) the said company was obliged to exmine the countries to the northward and eastward f the said Great Carrying-place, for another route o the interior countries." * * * "That the ndersigned, in the year 1801, at the orders of the aid Northwest Company, undertook, with Mr. ean Baptiste Pomainville, one of the clerks of he said company, eight experienced men, and a ative, in a canoe, to explore a route from Lac La luie to the mouth of the Dog river, in Lake Suerior, called Kamanistiquia; which they performed ith great difficulty and hard labor. That they ound the whole country through which they passed perfect wilderness." * * * "That, in the ear 1802, the undersigned explored another river n the said new route, which, from its continuous apids, was found impracticable for loaded canoes, nd the present new route was then determined on s that by which, in future, they would carry on he fur trade, as being a country in which the Jnited States had no claim.

"That, in the year 1802, the said company began learing the forests at Kamanistiquia, for the erecion of buildings, &c.; and that large parties of nen, for several years, were employed in making carrying-places through the forests, some of them over deep swamps and morasses, over which causeways were laid of logs, squared on one side; and hat on the Portage Savanne the causeway is more han two miles in length." * * * "That it was with difficulty, by making presents to some, and allowing extra wages to others, that the men engaged in the fur-trade could be prevailed on to transport the goods, furs, &c., by the new route. That, in the year 1802, the undersigned, from very good authority, received information that the United States troops had actually landed at Michilimackinac, the American garrison, for the purpose of proceeding to the depot of the fur-trade, at the Great Carrying-place, and there enforcing the duties contemplated to be levied on the merchandise, furs, &c., of the said Northwest Company, as British subjects, had they not learned the said company were then beginning to evacuate the said depot, situated at the east end of the said Great Carrying-place.

"Thus, the undersigned considers the new route from Kamanistiquia to be more dangerous, of greater length, and requires more labor than the old route by the Great Carrying-place, &c."

Extract from the sworn affidavit of John McGillivray, a partner in the Norhwest Company, given at Glengarry, in Upper Canada, June 27, 1827.

"John McGillivray, of Glengarry, in the said district, gentleman, being duly sworn, deposeth and saith: That he was a partner of the ci-devant Northwest Company, furnished with capital and goods by the firm of McTavish, Frobisher, & Co., and McTavish, McGillivray, & Co., of Montreal, for the purpose of carrying on the fur-trade of Lake Superior, and the countries east, north, and west of the said lake. That the great depot of the association then composing the Northwest Company was at the Great Carrying-place, on the border of Lake Superior, a few miles west of the mouth of the Pigeon river. That from a strong belief, founded upon the assertions of the United States commanding officer then stationed at Mackinac, (and, indeed, others,) that the same depot was within the limits of the United States of America, and that it was the decided intention of the Government of that country to appoint and establish a military post there, in order that they might levy duties on all merchandise, stores, &c. &c. imported thereinto, and also on the furs exported therefrom, consonant with the laws and regulations of their own State, after mature and deliberate consideration it was then unanimously agreed to, by the association composing the Northwest Company, that the trade could not afford the heavy impost with which it most inevitably would have been burdened, and that it would ultimately prove ruinous to the concern at large.

"In the year 1802, this new route was again examined, and the road marked out then as the one by which in future the fur trade was to be carried on. That, at a very great expense, the concern had to clear away thick woods, to erect many buildings, &c., and for several years to employ large parties of men to open roads through the forests or carrying-places, to avoid many dangerous rapids and falls in the rivers, and to communicate with brooks, ponds, lakes, &c., which had no other communication. To all appearances, this route had never been practised, except by the natives whose hunting-grounds are in the vicinity thereof. It was with some difficulty, and by allowing extra wages, that the servants of the company employed in carrying on the fur-trade could be prevailed upon to undertake the transport of the goods, furs, &c., &c., by this new route. The deponent was several years in the fur-trade, both before and after that depot (or headquarters) was transferred from the Grand Carrying-place to Kamanistiquia, (or Fort William,) and was very well acquainted with both routes. The new route is more dangerous, is of greater length, and requires an infinite deal more labor, especially in years of low water, than the old route by the Grand Portage or the Great Carrying-place, Pigeon river, &c., to Lac La Croix."

Extract from the sworn affidavit of H. Magillis, a partner of the Northwest Company, given at Glengary in Upper Canada, June 8th, 1827.

"The undersigned doth hereby certify that he was a partner of the Northwest Company, under the firm of McTavish, McGillivray, and Company, for the fur-trade of Lake Superior, and the countries east, north, and west of the said lake. That the great depot of the fur-trade was at the Great Carrying-place, a few miles west of the sortie of the Pigeon river. That from a strong belief, founded on the assertion of the United States officers and others, that the above depot was within the limits of the United States, and that heavy duties would be levied on all merchandise, stores, &c., imported thereto, and on the furs exported therefrom, by the officers of the United States, which would have been ruinous to the said firm, they were obliged to examine the countries northward and eastward, for another route to the interior countries.

"That, at a very great expense, they had to clear a thick forest, to erect buildings, &c., and to employ, for several years, large parties of men, to open roads through the forests, to avoid dangerous rapids, falls, &c., in the rivers, as carrying-places for their goods, furs, &c., and to communicate with brooks, ponds, and lakes, which had no other communication known; and that much of the roads was over deep swamp and morass; and to cross these, causeways of logs, squared on the surface, were laid, in one place of more than two miles in length.

"That it was with difficulty, and by allowing extra wages, that the men employed in the fur-trade could be prevailed on to undertake the transport of goods, furs, &c., by this new route. The undersigned was several years in the fur-trade, both before and after the depot for the fur-trade was transferred from the Great Carrying-place to Kamanistiquia, and was well acquainted with both routes. That the new route is more dangerous, is of greater length, and requires more labor, than the old route by the Great Carrying-place, Pigeon river, &c., to Lac La Croix."

Extract from the sworn affidavit of Jean Baptiste Pomainville, a clerk in the Northwest Fur Company, given at Montreal, June 12, 1827.

"That in the year 1801, the undersigned, in his capacity as clerk to the said company, was placed under the orders of Colonel William Mackay (then one of the partners of the Northwest Company) with eight men and one native, in a canoe, to explore a route from the Rainy Lake to the mouth of the Dog river in Lake Superior, called Kamanistiquia. That they did explore a route from thence to the place called Kamanistiquia; that they found the whole country a perfect wilderness, and it was with great difficulty and hard labor that they reached Kamanistiquia. * * * * * That the undersigned was a clerk in the service of the Northwest Company several years before and after the depot for the fur-trade was transferred from the Great Carrying-place, a few miles west of the mouth of Pigeon river, in Lake Superior, to Kamanistiquia; and believes the said transfer of the depot to have been made on account of duties threatened to be levied on the goods imported to, and the furs exported from, the said depot at the Great Carrying-place by the officers of the United States. * * * * That the undersigned was well acquainted with both routes, and considers the new route (by the Kamanistiquia) as of greater length, more dangerous, and requiring greater labor than the old route by the way of the Great Carrying-place,(Grand Portage.")

Having read these affidavits, Mr. B. said there were others of the same tenor from other gentlemen of the late Northwest (now Hudson Bay) Company. They all testify to the same points, and so nearly in the same words, that it becomes a needless repetition to recite them. They establish, beyond controversy—1. That the Northwest Company occupied the Grand Portage, and made it the head-quarters of the company, and the great depot of their Indian trade, up to the year, 1802. 2. That they carried on their trade to the interior, up to that time, on the portage route of Pigeon river, which route commenced in the Grand Portage. 3. That the retention of Northwestern posts, in violation of the treaty of 1783, enabled them to retain possession of the Grand Portage, and the portage route, until after the surrender of those posts under Mr. Jay's treaty. 4. That they broke up from the Grand Portage, and abandoned the portage route in the year 1802, and opened a new route, and established a new post fifty miles further north. 5. That they did this for the avowed purpose of evacuating a post and retiring from a route which belonged to the United States, and to escape from the custom-house laws and the jurisdiction of the United States. 6. That they did this, upon the unanimous determination of the members of the company, at great loss and expense; and that the new route which they established was longer, more difficult, more costly, and worse in every respect than the one which they abandones. The bare reading of the affidavits establishes all this: and now the mere reading of the treaty of 1783, and that of 1842, will establish the remainder, and show that the boundaries of the orms an amphitheatre, and is clear and inclosed, nd on the left corner of it, beneath a hill three or our hundred feet in height, and crowned by others f still greater altitude, is the fort, (Fort Charlotte,) icketed in with cedar pallisadoes, and inclosing ouses built with wood, and covered with shingles. * * * The portage hence to Pigeon river is ine miles. * * * This is the GREAT DEPOT of he fur-trade, where the north men, coming from he interior—from the Assinaboin, the Saskatchiwine, the Atabasca, the Lake Winipec, and other ar interior lakes and rivers—and bringing the furs f a year's trade, meet the pork-eaters who bring he goods from Montreal, and where the two divisions of men exchange loads. * * * Twelve hundred men often meet here. * * * The proprietors, in part, reside there. It is the headquarters of the company. The mode of living at the Grand Portage is as follows: The proprietors, clerks, guides, and interpreters mess together, to the number, sometimes, of one hundred, at several tables, in one large hall; the provision consisting of bread, salt pork, beef, hams, fish, venison, butter, peas, Indian corn, potatoes, tea, spirits, wine, and plenty of milk—for which purpose, several milch cows are constantly kept. The mechanics have rations of such provisions; but the canoemen, both from the north and from Montreal, (often 1,200 in number,) have no other allowance, here or in the voyage, than Indian corn and melted fat."—McKenzie's History of the Fur-trade.

United States have been altered by Mr. Webster, for the purpose of restoring the British fur-traders to the post and route which Jay's treaty compelled them to abandon. These are the two treaties.

The treaty of 1783 says:

"Thence through Lake Superior, northward of the isles Royale and Philippeaux, to the Long Lake; thence, through the middle of said Long Lake, and the water communication between it and the Lake of the Woods."

The treaty of 1842 says:

"Thence, adopting the line traced on the maps by the commissioners, through the river St. Mary and Lake Superior, to a point north of Ile Royale in said lake, one hundred yards to the north and east of Ile Chapeau, which last mentioned island lies near the northeastern point of Ile Royale, where the line marked by the commissioners terminates; and from the last-mentioned point, southwesterly, through the middle of the sound between Ile Royale and the northwestern mainland, to the mouth of Pigeon river, and up the said river, to and through the north and south Fowl lakes, to the lakes of the height of land between Lake Superior and the Lake of the Woods; thence, along the water communication to Lake Saisaginaga, and through that lake; thence, to and through Cypress Lake, Lac du Bois Blanc, Lac la Croix, Little Vermillion Lake, and Lake Namecan, and through the several smaller lakes, straits, or streams, connecting the lakes here mentioned, to that point in Lac la Pluie, or Rainy Lake, at the Chaudière falls, from which the commissioners traced the line to the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods; thence along the said line, to the said most northwestern point, being in latitude 49 degrees 23 minutes 55 seconds north, and in longitude 95 degrees 14 minutes 38 seconds west from the observatory at Greenwich; thence, according to existing treaties, due south, to its intersection with the 49th parallel of north latitude, and along that parallel to the Rocky Mountains. It being understood that at all the water communications, and all the usual portages along the line from Lake Superior to the Lake of the Woods, and also Grand Portage, from the shore of Lake Superior to the Pigeon river, as now actually used, shall be free and open to the use of the citizens and subjects of both countries."

Such are the words of the two treaties! and the bare reading of them, without a recurrence to maps, announces a great difference. That difference is as great, in fact, as the words would import. To understand this difference, a modern map, or some large map of the United States, should be examined: one that would show, 1st. The two parallel (nearly) lines of the Pigeon river route; 2d. The Kamanistiquia route; 3d. The junction of these on the north side of Hunter's island. These three points being seen on a map, the explanation of the whole becomes intelligible, and the difference between the lines of 1783 and 1842 apparent to every eye.

The terms of these two treaties announce a great difference in the boundaries established by each of them. The treaty of 1783 follows the water communication between the Lake Superior and the Lake of the Woods: the treaty of 1842 designates a line of lakes, rivers, and portages; and concludes with making all the portages, and especially the Grand Portage on Lake Superior, free and open to the use of both parties. The treaty of 1783 contains nothing of this kind.

Admitting that the Pigeon river called for in the treaty of 1842 is the Long Lake called for in the treaty of 1783, and thus that the new line leaves Lake Superior at the right place:—admitting this, I proceed to point out the fact, that, within twenty miles of the lake, the Pigeon river divides into two branches—the southern bearing down through North and South Fowl Lakes; the other bearing almost due west, and taking the name of Arrow river. These two branches approach and diverge, passing through numerous small lakes, and forming many islands, until they reach the Height of Land, 40 miles from Lake Superior, and where the waters of that lake and those of the Lake of the Woods rise within 679 paces of each other. Passing the Height of Land, which is the dividing ridge which separates the waters of the St. Lawrence from those of Hudson Bay, the parallel routes again diverge, forming the large island called Hunter's, and many smaller islands, until they finally come together in Rainy Lake, whence they issue by a river as large as the Hudson, which flows into the Lake of the Woods, whence another large river flows into Lake Winnipec, whence the Missinnippi (of the Indians) now called Churchill river, flows into Hudson's Bay. These two parallel lines, from their first divergence near Lake Superior, to their final conjunction in Rainy Lake, a distance of more than 100 miles, are known by names as notorious and as distinct as any two objects in nature can be. The northern, or outer line, is called the Water Communication, because it is the most continuous water line; the southern, or inner line, is called the Portage Route, because it has numerous portages, or carrying places upon it. The former was the boundary of the United States, under the treaty of 1783: the latter was the trading route of the French when they owned Canada, and of the British from the time they conquered Canada in 1763, until they removed to the Kamanistiquia route in the year 1802. Following this southern, or inner route, upon any map on a scale to show small objects, and every landmark called for in the treaty of 1842 will be found, and will always be found to follow the most southern deflexions of every lake and river, so as to cut deepest at every possible point into the old and acknowledged territory of the United States! Look at those calls, both in the treaty and on the map. First, North and South Fowl Lakes, many miles south of Arrow river; then Lake Saisaginaga, Cypress Lake, and Bois Blanc Lake, which carry you south of Hunter's island; then Lake La Croix, and Vermillion Lake, which keep you south of the Namecan river; then the Namecan Lake, which takes you into the extreme southern limb of Rainy Lake. These are the new calls!—all to the south! every one pursuing each lake or river to its extreme southern deflexion! and then throwing in all the portages, and Grand Portage itself, into the bargain. This is the new line; and it will be shown in the proper place, that this precise line was begged by the Northwest Company, in 1827, and refused by General Porter, (the Ghent commissioner under the 7th article,) because it would alter the boundaries of the United States. What he refused, Mr. Webster granted.

This establishes the fact of the alteration of this boundary. The further fact, that it was wrongfully altered, and to the benefit of the British, and the injury of the United States, remains to be established; and to the proof of that I now proceed.

First, I point to the map now on the Secretary's table, and which shows the boundary of the United States marked up to the northern line of the Pigeon river routes, and going north of the large island called Hunter's. This is a late map. Forty others, of different dates, might be produced; and any person, in any part of the United States, who has a large map of the Union in his possession, may see the boundary as there traced.

Next, I point to the British route opened in 1802, after the removal of the fur company from the Grand Portage, which, passing up the Kamanistiquia, and through Dog Lake, and the Thousand Lakes, arrives at the boundary of the United States on the north side of Hunter's Island, opposite its middle, and follows the Maligne river, the acknowledged boundary of the United States, to Lac La Croix. This conjunction of the new British route with the United States boundary north of Hunter's Island, is proof, from the British themselves, that the boundary was on the north of that island, where the maps place it—and which decides the whole question; for that island is the great landmark between the two routes, which are there separated to their widest degree of divergence. The Webster line is on the south of this island; and will so be marked in every map made after this time.

Next, I refer to the eight affidavits of the gentlemen of the Northwest Fur Company, dated in 1826, all affirming that, in 1802, the company, by a unanimous decision of its managers, removed from the Grand Portage, on the south side of the estuary of Pigeon river, to Fort William, on the north side of the Kamanistiquia, for the purpose of getting out of the limits of the United States! and that this new route brought them into the Maligne river, (north side of Hunter's Island,) which river they followed west to Lac La Croix. Thus the British came into the northern branch of the Pigeon-river routes, and followed it west through the wicked Maligne river, because they had no right to go to the southern branch.

Next, I refer to the eight treaties which guaranty the northern of these routes as the boundary of the United States, and the sixty years' possession which we have had of that boundary. The treaties referred to, are—1, that of the preliminaries of peace, signed in 1782; 2, that of the peace itself, signed in 1783; 3, Jay's treaty of 1794; 4, Mr. King's, of 1803; (rejected by the Senate;) 5, Mr. Monroe's, of 1807, (rejected by Mr. Jefferson;) 6, the Ghent treaty of 1814; 7, the convention of 1818, by Messrs. Rush and Gallatin; 8, the renewal of that convention in 1828. All these treaties—some positively, others tacitly—confirmed the line from Lake Superior to the Lake of the Woods. Wherever the question was made, the attempt to alter these boundaries was instantly repulsed. The effort, especially of the British traders, to get back to the portage route, and to have the free and common use of our portages, and to be exempt from duties on our territory, was repulsed in every instance, except one, (Jay's treaty;) and even then, so restricted as not to be used by the British. That these eight treaties all maintained our rights west of Lake Superior, and that they have all been set at naught by the Webster treaty, is apparent from their terms and their history; and I now proceed to quote those terms, and to show that history, so far as it shall be necessary to establish my position.

1. The provisional treaty of peace, signed at Paris, November 30, 1782: Messrs. John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, John Jay, and Henry Laurens, the commissioners on the part of the United States. This preliminary treaty thus defines the boundary from Lake Superior to the Lake of the Woods:

"Thence through Lake Superior, northward of the isles Royale and Philippeaux, to the Long Lake; thence through the middle of said Long Lake, and the water communication between it and the Lake of the Woods, to the Lake of the Woods."

These are the words of the preliminary articles of peace; and these words have remained unaltered from the year 1782 to the year 1842, when they were changed by the Webster treaty.

2. The definitive treaty of peace of September 3, 1783. This treaty was signed by Adams, Franklin, and Jay; and in all that related to the boundary between Lake Superior and the Lake of the Woods, was a transcript, word for word, of the boundary described in the preliminaries of 1782.

3. Jay's treaty of 1794. The object of this treaty, as we all know, was to settle some difficulties which had grown up in the construction, or in the execution, of the treaty of 1783. Two of these difficulties related to the Northwest: 1. The retention of the northwestern posts by Great Britain: 2. The impracticability of the boundary calls between the Lake of the Woods and the Mississippi. The English retained the northwestern posts in defiance of the treaty; and the call from the Lake of the Woods to the Mississippi, being for a line due west, was impracticable, because the source of the Mississippi was south (nearly) from that lake. The posts were retained for the sake of the fur-traders, and to keep up a control over the Indians: the call for the Mississippi (regardless of the course) was adhered to by the British, for the purpose of founding upon it a claim to the navigation of that river. Mr. Jay went to London to adjust (among others) these two difficulties; and the adjustment of these questions brought out all the pretensions, in relation to boundaries and Indian trade, which the British then set up in that quarter. We will see what these pretensions were, and how they were met by Mr. Jay. Happily, there were protocols in those days; and, at the distance of half a century, we can trace the origin and progress of every proposition, rejected or not, which then engaged the attention of our negotiator. A point with the British negotiator (Lord Grenville) was, to obtain the admission of goods, duty free, from Canada, through the territories of the United States—a point which was instantly and decisively rejected by Mr. Jay. Under date of October 29, 1794, from London, he thus states the proposal, and his rejection of it:

"It was proposed that goods for the Indian trade should pass from Canada to the Indians within the United States, duty free: to this I could not consent."

Instead of acceding to this proposition, a restricted agreement for transportation of goods over the portages (where they were on the boundary) was inserted in the treaty, so little agreeable or available to the Northwest Company, that they had to abandon the portage route west of Lake Superior as soon as the treaty took effect. It was article 3 of the treaty, and in these words:

"And no duties shall be payable on any goods which shall merely be carried over any of the portges or carrying-places on either side, for the purose of being immediately reimbarked and carried o some other place or places. But as, by this stipulation, it is only meant to secure to each party a ree passage across the portages on each side, it is greed that this exemption from duty shall extend nly to such goods as are carried in the usual and direct road across the portage, and are not attempted to be in any manner sold or exchanged during heir passage across the same; and proper regulations may be established to prevent the possibility f any frauds in this respect."

This was the extent of Mr. Jay's concession—too estricted to be acceptable; and inapplicable, besides, to the portage route west of Lake Superior, ecause that route was not a boundary! The article as only applicable where the portages were on he water communications which were boundaries. The Northwest Company had no benefit from it n the portage route of Pigeon river; and, therefore, broke up soon after, and removed fifty miles orth into the wilderness route of the Kamanistiquia. There they have wandered ever since! but the Webster treaty, by making the portage route the oundary, has put an end to their exile, brought em back to the place from which they removed orty years ago, and made the portage privileges estimably valuable to them. They will return, nder this treaty! and no higher evidence could be iven of the change which it has made in the oundary. British territory will now be contiguus to our territory; and British stores, magaines, and warehouses skirt the line from which ey have so long been removed.

No application was made to Mr. Jay to alter e boundary from the outer to the inner line of e Pigeon-river routes: the only thing which ould be done for the traders, was to prolong the me for the surrender of the posts. This was exended two years; and the correspondence shows at the object of the extension was to enable the ritish fur-traders to collect their debts, and prepare for removal. The time for the surrender of e posts expired in 1796; the company, unwilling quit the Grand Portage till almost driven away, waited the threatened approach of troops from ackinaw, and only evacuated their position in 802.

4. Mr. Rufus King's treaty of 1803. This was treaty (though rejected by the Senate) of the ighest importance, as testimony, in the case. he settlement of the boundary in the Northwest, om the Lake of the Woods to the Mississippi, as one of the objects of Mr. King's negotiation. le was consequently employed on a boundary uestion, and a boundary west of Lake Superior; nd that, at the identical moment that the Northwest ompany were breaking up from the fine position f the Grand Portage, abandoning the portage oute, and going 50 miles north to explore, in the ilderness, a new route incomparably worse. That as the time to complain, if ever! That was the me to claim the portage route as the true one; r to ask for an alteration from the northern to the outhern route! They did no such thing—neither e one nor the other. The treaty is silent on the hole subject—the correspondence also! So that, this critical and opportune moment, the suffering company never even pretend to utter a comlaint! They did not even ask for the use of ortages and exemption from duties!

5. Mr. Monroe's treaty of 1807. This is almost important as that of Mr. King. It was soon ter the removal of the company, and while the jury to them, if any had been done, was still esh and recent. It was still a favorable time for em to complain, if wrong had been done them—duties had been illegally threatened, or a right oundary unwillingly surrendered. It was still in me for them to complain. But no; not a word. he treaty and the protocols are wholly silent upon e subject; and this silence is an emphatic declaraon that the Grand Portage, and the whole portage oute to Rainy Lake, then belonged to the United tates, and that the British traders were justly exluded from them.

6. The Ghent treaty of 1814. It was at the negotiation of this treaty that the British first suggested a proposal for altering the boundary between ake Superior and the Lake of the Woods. The merican ministers heard the suggestion with incredulity, and supposed it to be a mistake, and that was the boundary between the Lake of the Woods nd the Mississippi which was intended; but the ritish ministers repeated their suggestion, coupled with the old demand for the free navigation of the Mississippi, and the new one for an alteration of the boundary between Quebec and Halifax. All these demands the American ministers (Messrs. J. Q. Adams, J. A. Bayard, H. Clay, Jonathan Russell, and Albert Gallatin) unanimously and instantly rejected. The protocols and correspondence show these proceedings on these points:

BRITISH PROPOSITIONS.

"The boundary line west of Lake Superior, and thence to the Mississippi, to be revised; and the treaty-right of Great Britain to the navigation of the Mississippi to be continued. When asked whether they did not mean the line from the Lake of the Woods to the Mississippi, the British commissioners repeated that they meant the line from Lake Superior to that river.

"A direct communication from Halifax and the province of New Brunswick to Quebec, to be secured to Great Britain. In answer to our question, In what manner that was to be effected? we were told that it must be done by a cession to Great Britain of that portion of the district of Maine, in the State of Massachusetts, which intervenes between New Brunswick and Quebec, and prevents that direct communication.

"There will then remain for discussion the arrangement of the Northwestern boundary between Lake Superior and the Mississippi, the free navigation of that river, and such a variation of the line of frontier as may secure a direct communication between Quebec and Halifax.

AMERICAN ANSWER.

"The undersigned further perceive that, under the alleged purpose of opening a direct communication between two of the British provinces in America, the British Government require a cession of territory forming a part of one of the States of the American Union; and that they propose, without purpose specifically alleged, to draw the boundary line westward—not from the Lake of the Woods, as it now is, but from Lake Superior. It must be perfectly immaterial to the United States whether the object of the British Government, in demanding the dismemberment of the United States, is to acquire territory as such, or for purposes less liable, in the eyes of the world, to be ascribed to the desire of aggrandizement. Whatever the motive may be, and with whatever consistency views of conquest may be disclaimed, while demanding for herself or the Indians a cession of territory more extensive than the whole island of Great Britain, the duty marked out for the undersigned is the same. They have no authority to cede any part of the territory of the United States; and to no stipulation to that effect will they subscribe."

These were the British demands, and the American answers, at Ghent! and mark them well. The British propositions are put forth as matters of favor, and not of right; and the gentlest language is used to veil their pretensions. A revision of the line from Lake Superior—a variation of the line between Quebec and Halifax—a cession of territory for the benefit of Great Britain in the Northeast, or of her Indian allies in the Northwest. This is the form of her request. No error in either existing line suggested! No right pretended! Favors only requested for herself and her Indians! and these favors instantly rejected by the unanimous voice of the five American commissioners. Who would have believed, at that time, that what was then asked as favors, should afterwards be demanded as rights? and what was then rejected by five American commissioners, should, forty years afterwards, be granted by one Secretary-negotiator? The Ghent commissioners refused either to revise the boundary beyond Lake Superior, or to vary the line between Quebec and Halifax: and they refused both for the same reason—that they could not dismember the United States, or cede away any part of its territory!

The time of these requests deserves to be marked: it shows the spirit in which they originated, and that both were—what our Secretary-negotiator properly characterized one of them to be—the progeny of the late war! The war had shown the value of a direct communication through Maine from Halifax to Quebec; and, therefore, they asked for a grant of that direct communication, to facilitate their operations against us in future wars. The same war had also shown the power and efficiency of the Northwest Company in directing the Indians against us; and, therefore, they sought to increase the advantages of this company in the great seat of their empire west of Lake Superior, in order to make them still more efficient and still more powerful against us in future wars. This was the origin of the two requests at Ghent: and the five American commissioners then there, having American hearts in their bosoms, instantly and utterly rejected both propositions, and in the same words. They declared that they would subscribe to no such propositions: and there ended the attempt either to revise the Lake Superior line, or to vary the Maine boundary at Ghent.

Instead of revision or variation—instead of cession or dismemberment—articles were agreed upon for running and marking the true boundary, according to the terms of the treaty of peace of 1783. Messrs. Adams, Clay, Bayard, Russell, and Gallatin, with true American feeling, adhered to the sacred revolutionary boundaries traced by the venerable hands of Franklin, John Adams, and Jay. They adhered to these boundaries, and adopted measures to ascertain and perpetuate them. Leaving out all that relates to Maine, I quote the article (the 7th of the treaty) for the purpose of showing what they did in relation to the Lake Superior boundary, now the subject of controversy before the Senate. It is in these words:

"It is further agreed, that the said two lastmenioned commissioners, after they shall have executed the duties assigned to them in the preceding article, shall be, and they are hereby, authorized, upon their oaths, impartially to fix and determine, according to the true intent of the said treaty of peace of 1783, that part of the boundary, between the dominions of the two powers, which extends from the water communication between Lake Huron and Lake Superior to the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods, to decide to which of the two parties the several islands lying in the lakes, water communications, and rivers, forming the said boundary, do respectively belong, in conformity with the true intent of the said treaty of peace of 1783; and to cause such parts of the said boundary as required it to be surveyed and marked," (with reference to a friendly sovereign in case of difference of opinion, as in the case of the Maine boundary.)

This was the end of the attempt to revise the Lake-Superior boundary at Ghent. The American commissioners unanimously refused the revision; and the British commissioners agreed to an article to have the treaty of '83 carried into effect according to its true intent. For this purpose, commissioners, under oath, were to examine the localities, set apart the islands in the water communications to the parties to which they belonged, and to mark the boundary where necessary. The 7th article of the treaty contained this agreement; and under it, Gen. Porter, on the part of the United States, and Mr. Barclay, on the part of Great Britain, were appointed commissioners. They were employed on this part of the line, at different periods, from the year 1824 to 1827; and now the whole secret came out, which had been concealed from our commissioners at Ghent. When asking for a revision of the Lake-Superior and Lake-of-the-Woods boundary, the British commissioners kept their fur-traders out of view, and put forward the Indians as the people for whose benefit an alteration of the line was wanted. No sooner has the board met, under the Ghent treaty, to act upon this part of the line, than the Indians are dropped! —the true parties, and the true object, appear!—and this true party is the Northwest Fur Company; and the true object is the return of this company from the wilderness of the Kamanistiquia to the Grand-Portage route within the United States, and to be exempt from duties when so returned!

It was now that propositions for altering the boundary were made by McGillivray, the head of the fur traders—now, that he pleaded for the southern-portage route—now, that he begged in vain for the identical boundary which the Webster treaty has granted: and it was at that time that all the affidavits were taken to show that the portage route was the old route—that the British had practised it before they went to the Kamanistiquia: and it was now that the absurd pretension to the St. Louis river as a boundary was brought forward, in order to be surrendered as a compromise for that southern portage route which commanded all their affections. It was at that time, in fact, that the attempt was made to substitute the old trading route for the water communication—the very attempt which the Senator from Massachusetts [MR. CHOATE] is now making, and for which he is using their affidavits!

The reports of the commissioners to their respective Governments prove all this, and show that General Porter was as decisive in refusing, as the traders were pertinacious in demanding, the alteration of the boundary, and a return of the Fur Company to the trading route which they had lost by the treaty of 1783, enforced by the treaty of Mr. Jay. Document No. 451, of the executive papers of 1837-38, proves all this, and shows that the British fur-traders were the real party which appeared before the commissioners under the 7th article of the Ghent treaty, that to get back to the Grand Portage, and to be exempt from duties, was their open object; and that, to effect this, they used all the arguments there, which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CHOATE] has here repeated; and without effect then, whatever influence they may have now. Mr. William McGillivray, the head of the company, was the principal organ of these traders; and had candor enough to show, from the beginning, that the pretension to the St. Louis river as a boundary was a mere manœuvre to get a compromise for the portage route, exemption from duties, and the free and common use of all our portages. Hear him in his letters and affidavits before the Ghent commissioners: I quote from his letter of Sept. 4, 1824, to Mr. Hale, the British agent before the Ghent commissioners:

"The surveys made of the Lake Superior last summer, and the previous examination of its coast by Mr. Thompson and others, show sufficiently that no inlet (to deserve the name) is to be found on its northern shore. Opposite to the west end of Isle Royale (or isle Minong, as it is generally called) is a small inlet, or bay, into which falls the Riviere aux Tourtres (Pigeon, or Dove river,) which is navigable for about half a mile, when you come to the rapids. About nine or ten miles westward of this river is the Grand Portage, a carrying-place near three leagues in length; at the north end of which you again find the Riviere aux Tourtres; this river, or, rather, a chain of portages and rapids, is followed up to its source—perhaps in all forty miles—when you come to the height of land dividing the waters which fall into Lake Superior from those falling ultimately into Hudson's Bay, through the Lake of the Woods and Lake Winnipec. At first, these waters are so trifling and shallow as not to have sufficient depth or width to pass a canoe of twenty-five feet with any loading; it, however, soon increases by the addition of several other small streams, and forms, by the time it falls in Lac La Pluie, a river of considerable magnitude; but the route of the voyageur from the height of land is impeded by many carrying-places and rapids, which connect the little lakes into which it frequently widens its course. These lakes are, in succession, (going into the interior,) 1st, Sasiganiga; 2d, Lac des Bois Blanc; 3d, Lac Croche; 4th, Lac La Croix; and 5th, Namecan Lake; then Lac La Pluie. But these lakes are very distant from each other, though connected by rapids and carrying places, except the two last mentioned, which are only separated by one carrying-place of no great length. How this route between Lake Superior and Lac La Pluie could ever be called the Long Lake, I cannot conceive; for it is made up of shallow and narrow small rivers and rapids without number, and thirty-six carrying-places, together with the lakes above mentioned, with many others not worthy of a name.

"By this route, and this route only, was the trade to the northwest country carried on by the French while in possession of Canada, and from the conquest until the year 1803 by the English traders; when the difficulties and expense attending the transportation of goods from Lake Superior, by way of the Grand Portage, to Lac La Pluie, became so great that the Northwest Company removed the general depot to Kamanistiquia, since called Fort William, stationed about fifty miles eastward of the Grand Portage. The whole length of the carrying-places from Lake Superior to Lac La Pluie, by this route, (portage,) is twenty-seven miles; which is less, by five or six, than the other, (Kamanistiquia.)"

"If the route by the river St. Louis, or Fond du Lac, could be established as the boundary, it would be gaining a great extent of country. The distance computed from the Grand Portage to Fond du Lac is eighty leagues. Such an arrangement, however, cannot be hoped for; although it may be stated as one of the routes connecting Lake Superior to the Lake of the Woods. To the new route from Fort William they (the Americans) have no pretensions whatever, as it was never practised by the French, nor by the English traders until 1803; and one reason for the Northwest Company's abandoning the Grand Portage at the time, (which was done at a great sacrifice,) was a fear that the collector of the customs at Michillimackinac would send officers to raise duties on our goods. This had been threatened, and I have no doubt would have been attempted had we remained much longer at the Grand Portage. As to whether the *Riviere aux Tourtres, already mentioned, from its debouche into the lake, or the road in the Grand Portage until it strikes the said river, (which is really the ancient route, as the river to this point is altogether impracticable,) is perhaps the only question; and the space of country to be gained or lost by either party is of little or no consequence, as it is a mountainous, sterile tract; but, by making the river the boundary from the lake, there is no means of getting to the north end of the Grand Portage, (the point of embarcation for canoes;) it would, therefore, be excluding British subjects from going into the interior by that route; whereas, by making it through the Grand Portage to the same point of embarcation, it leaves the road open to both parties. This route is new but little practised, as most of the canoes going in pass by the Fort William route."

Such is the letter of Mr. McGillivray, and it covers every point in the case. It presents every demand made of General Porter, and refused by him, and now granted by the Webster treaty, and defended by the Senator from Massachusetts; and it presents every argument in favor of these demands which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CHOATE] now presents to the Senate.

The British commissioner, Mr. Barclay, became the strenuous advocate of the traders; entering with zeal into their scheme of establishing the old trading route on the portage line as the boundary of the United States, for the purpose of getting them back to that route. Following the lead of McGillivray, he offered his first proposition of compromise in these terms.

"The British commissioner, on the other hand, offered to abandon the river St. Louis, on condition that his colleague [General Porter] would agree to accept the Grand Portage route, commencing on Lake Superior, about six miles to the southwest of the mouth of the Pigeon river; thence, up that river, and following the portage route, alternately by land and water, to Lac La Pluie, as described on the journal."

General Porter objected to the portage route, and adhered to the water communication of Pigeon river in these words:

"The American commissioner proposed to relinquish the Kamanistiquia route, provided that his colleague would consent to run the line from the mouth of the Pigeon river, Riviere aux Tourtres, up the middle of that river, and thence, through the most continuous water communication, to Lac La Pluie, as described on the journal.

Mr. Barclay insisted for the portage route, as the Senator from Massachusetts now does; and General Porter shows that, in this, he was enforcing the proposition of Mr. McGillivray. He says of Mr. Barclay's proposition:

"This last is the route assumed by Mr. McGillivray; and it appears from his letters, that the only question in his mind as to the course of the boundary intended by the treaty was, whether it should follow this route, or take the water route proposed (by way of compromise) by the undersigned, commencing in and proceeding up Pigeon river, &c.; and that he has been induced to adopt the former, on the ground that it would accommodate each party with a convenient thoroughfare for their trade to the Northwest."

This is General Porter's remark upon it; and it shows that Mr. Barclay's proposition was Mr. McGillivray's, and that the question was between the WATER COMMUNICATION called for in the treaty of '78 and the PORTAGE TRADING ROUTE, practised before that treaty, and afterwards until Jay's treaty. Gen. Porter adhered to the WATER COMMUNICATION, as his oath and his duty required him to do; and thus expresses both his determination and his reason for it in his report to his Government. He says:

"Although the difference between the two commissioners was by the above propositions greatly narrowed, and, indeed, rendered of little consequence in point of territorial extent and value; yet the undersigned, considering the obligation imposed by the treaty to follow a water communication, where one could be found, as imperative, did not feel himself at liberty to accede to the proposition of his colleague."

Such was the answer of General Porter, and no stronger or higher evidence could be given of the truth of the boundary, as established by the treaty of 1783, in the water communication, and not in the trading route. He was under oath—on the spot—had access to all testimony—and adhered to the water line as the new boundary. That line had but one interruption; and that at the Height of Land, of six hundred and seventy-nine paces, as shown by Sir Alexander McKenzie:* the other has thirty-six portages, and twenty-seven miles of land carriage, as just shown in the letter of Mr. McGillivray. Foiled in this proposition to begin the line at the Grand Portage, and go over land to the trading route, the British commissioner then proposes another—namely, to begin in the mouth of Pigeon river, follow it to the separation of the streams at Arrow river; then follow the southern portage route, and make all the portages free and common to the use of both parties. This was his last proposition, and is thus stated, and thus refused by General Porter:

"To a subsequent modified proposition of the British commissioner, to take a water line commencing in the mouth of Pigeon river, and thence proceeding to Rainy Lake, accompanied by a stipulation that the Grand Portage route should be made free and common to the use of both parties, he also felt it to be his duty to object, on the ground that such a stipulation would involve the exercise of powers not confided to him by his commission."

This is the account given of these propositions and of their fate, by General Porter. The British commissioner (Mr. Barclay) gives the same account in his report to his own Government; with the important additional particular, that General Porter's refusals were in conformity to the advice which he had received from his own Government! Hear him:

"'And as to the proposition of Mr. Porter, to conduct the line from Lake Superior to the mouth of Pigeon river; thence, through the middle of said river, proceeding to Lake La Pluie by the most direct and continuous water communication, Mr. Barclay consented to adopt a route from Lake Superior, by the Grand Portage, to Pigeon river; and thence, by the most easy and direct route, to Lac La Pluie, provided the American commissioner would consent that the boundary should be conducted from water to water, over land, through the middle of the old and accustomed portages, in those places where—from falls, rapids, shallows, or any other obstruction—the navigation and access into the interior by water are rendered impracticable. Such a route, with all the portages, is here described by Mr. Barclay, for greater certainty;' the particulars of which route will be seen in the section last referred to.

"The commissioner of the United States having declined accepting the modification of his proposal for a compromise, as above set forth, the undersigned shortly after made another proposition to him, to the following effect: That, for the purpose of effecting a compromise—an object so desirable to both parties—the undersigned would consent to relinquish the proposed establishment of the boundary through and over the middle of the portages, and to fix it as a water line in the course of the water communications described for that purpose by the undersigned, provided he (the American commissioner) would unite in declaring the portages common and free to the lawful use of both nations; the undersigned always alleging that he deemed it a part of the duty of the commissioners to preserve the communication open.

"This proposition, also, was lately declined by the commissioner of the United States, by the advice (as he stated) of his Government."

Thus the American and the British commissioners are accordant in their account of this whole affair. They show that the British fur-traders were the real parties to this question of boundary—that a compromise of this line was their policy—that the portage line, and the free and common use of the portages, was their object—and that all this was declined by General Porter, because contrary to the treaty of 1783, and because he was so advised to decline it by his own Government. That Government (or rather the administration of it) was then in the hands of gentlemen who had acted on this subject at the Ghent negotiations. Mr. John Quincy Adams was President; Mr. Clay was Secretary of State; and their advice to General Porter was in exact conformity to their answer to the British commissioners at Ghent in 1814—namely, a peremptory refusal to revise this line for any object whatever!

And now, is anything further wanting to show that this whole question, so tardily got up after the late war—this whole question about the boundary west of Lake Superior—was a conception of the British fur-traders, got up for their own interest, and to redeem them from the wilderness of the Kamanistiquia, and to restore them to the Grand Portage, and the whole portage route, from which they removed in the year 1802, because that route was on the territory of the United States? Is there anything more wanting to prove this? If there be, here it is! The express declaration of Mr. Barclay in the concluding paragraphs of his report to his Government. In that report he says:

☞"It is a fact, familiar to every person who has investigated this point, or who is conversant with the interests concerned in it, that the traders are extremely desirous of returning from the Kamanistiquia route to the more southern routes; and that they are resolved to do so, if the boundary be established in such a manner as to authorize them."

This brings me to the end of the proceedings under the Ghent treaty, and to the end of the sixth treaty, which consecrated our title to the boundary of 1783 between Lake Superior and the Lake of the Woods. But two other treaties remain to be noticed: and the notice of them shall be brief; for they are silent upon this boundary; and this is a case in which silence is as expressive as words. They are:

7. The convention of 1818, in regard to the boundary from Lake Superior to the Lake of the Woods, and for the joint occupation of the Columbia. This convention is silent on the subject of the boundary on this side of the Lake of the Woods; and this proves that the question was then at rest.

8. The continuation of that convention in 1828,

*Pigeon river.

*"From hence the course is on the lake of the same name, west-southwest three miles to the Height of Land (Hauteur de Terre, of the French,) where the waters of Dove or Pigeon river (Riviere aux Tourtres, of the French,) terminate, and which is one of the sources of the great St. Lawrence in this direction. Having carried the canoe and lading over it, six hundred and seventy-nine paces, they embark on the lake of Hauteur de Terre, which is in the shape of a horseshoe. It is entered near the curve, and left at the extremity of the western limb, through a very shallow channel where the canoe passes, half loaded, for thirty paces, with the current, which leads through the succeeding lakes and rivers, and disembogues by the river Nelson into Hudson's Bay."—McKenzie's History of the Fur trade, London quarto of 1801, p. 51. Geographers have done injustice to the works of nature in this quarter, in not presenting, as one river, the great stream which rises within six hundred and seventy-nine paces of the head of the St. Lawrence, and makes its way through many small, and some large lakes, into Hudson's Bay. Even before it reaches the Lake of the Woods, this river is as large as the Hudson, with fertile and well-timbered banks.

which the same silence is observed, and the same difference is to be drawn.

Thus, eight treaties, and sixty years' possession, consecrated our boundary in this quarter: yet the treaty of 1842 disregarded these eight treaties, this sixty years' possession, and the uniform and unanimous voice of all negotiators, and of all administrations; and delivered up this important boundary to the powerful British fur traders, now more powerful than ever, whose dominion extends from ocean to ocean, and from the lakes to Hudson's Bay! whose strength is now united under a single charter—that of the Hudson Bay Company; who employ many thousand men, control innumerable Indians, and whose forts, formed into regular chains, cover all the country west and north from Lake Superior to the coast of the Pacific, and to the shores of Hudson's Bay. The treaty of 1842 restores these powerful and now united traders to their former headquarters—the seat of their ancient empire at the Grand Portage—and to the great trading route, which the treaty of 1783 gave to the United States. The treaty of 1842 does all this: and now some notice of this treaty is to be taken; and from this notice it will be seen that our Secretary-negotiator, in the Northwest as in the Northeast, became the advocate of the British; acted as the agent or solicitor of Lord Ashburton, in seeking testimony against his own country; and depreciated the value of our territory, as well as the importance of our boundaries, for the sake of having an excuse to give them away! The correspondence, meagre as it is, and destitute of protocols, still proves this; and to this proof we will now have recourse.

On the 16th day of July, 1842, Lord Ashburton, in his letter of that date, in arriving at the boundary west of Lake Superior, and reciting the differences between the British and American commissioners in relation to that boundary, proceeds to say to Mr. Webster:

"In considering the second point, it really appears of little importance to either party how the line be determined through the wild country between Lake Superior and the Lake of the Woods, but it is important that some line should be fixed and known."

* * * * * *

"The American commissioner asked for the line from Lake Superior up the river Kamanistiquia to the lake called Dog Lake, which he supposed to be the same as that called Long Lake in the treaties; thence through Sturgeon Lake to the Lac la Pluie, to that point where the two lines assumed by the commissioners again meet."

* * * * * *

"The British commissioner, on the other hand, contended for a line from the southwestern extremity, at a point called Le Fond du Lac, to the middle of the mouth of the estuary, or lake of St. Louis river; thence up that river, through Vermillion river, to Lac la Pluie."

* * * * * *

"I would propose that the line be taken from a point about six miles south of Pigeon river, where the Grand Portage commences on the lake, and continued along the line of said portage, alternately by land and water, to Lac la Pluie; the existing route by land and by water remaining common to both parties."

To this intimation from Lord Ashburton, that some line from Lake Superior to the Lake of the Woods should be fixed and known, it would have been sufficient for Mr. Webster to have answered, that such a line was fixed and known!—had been for sixty years!—and, for forty years of that time, had been conformed to by the British themselves! And to his proposition to take the portage route of Pigeon river for this boundary, it would have been sufficient for him to have answered, that the Northwest Company retired from that route under Jay's treaty; were still fifty miles beyond it; and that all administrations, and particularly Mr. Adams's in 1827, had refused to alter the water boundary, and permit them to return to the trading route. This would have been sufficient, one would think. But not so, thought Mr. Webster. The first thing we see of him is a correspondence with Messrs. Delafield and Ferguson, (one of whom had been the agent, and the other the astronomer and surveyor, on the part of the United States, under the 7th article of the Ghent treaty,) bearing date the 20th and 25th days of July; which was two days and seven days before he answered Lord Ashburton's letter! which answer happens to bear date on the 27th day of the same July!

In this correspondence we find these passages in a letter from the Secretary-negotiator to Mr. Ferguson:

"What is the general nature of the country between the mouth of the Pigeon river and the Rainy Lake? Of what formation is it, and how is its surface? and will any considerable portion of its area be fit for cultivation? Are its waters active and running streams, as in other parts of the United States; or are they dead lakes, swamps, and morasses? If the latter be their general character, at what point, as you proceed westward, do the waters receive a more decided character as running streams?

"There are said to be two lines of communication, each partly by water and partly by portages, from the neighborhood of Pigeon river to the Rainy Lake: one by way of Fowl Lakes, the Saganaga Lake, and the Cypress Lake; the other by way of Arrow river and lake, then by way of Saganaga Lake, and through the river Maligne, meeting the other route at Lake la Croix, and through the river Namecan in the Rainy Lake. Do you know any reason for attaching great preference to either of these two lines? Or do you consider it of no importance, in any point of view, which may be agreed to?

These are the inquiries; and they are put, as the lawyers say, leadingly—that is to say, they are so put as to lead the witnesses' minds to the answers wanted. The desired answers evidently were—first, that the country was worth nothing; secondly, that it was immaterial which route was taken for the national boundary. The object of getting these answers was evidently to have a pretext for giving up the territory between the two routes to the British, and to give them the choice of the routes—as if the British were silly enough to be struggling for forty years for sterile land, and an immaterial boundary. The gentlemen answer; and, in all that relates to the character of the soil, are explicit as to its worthlessness; but not so as to the two routes. On this point, Mr. Delafield, the United States astronomer and surveyor under the Ghent commission, answers:

"There is, nevertheless, much interest felt by the fur-traders on this subject of boundary. To them it is of much importance, as they conceive; and it is, in fact, of national importance. Had the British commissioner consented to proceed by the Pigeon river, which is the Long Lake of Mitchell's map, it is probable there would have been an agreement. There were several reasons for his pertinacity, and for this disagreement—which belong, however, to the private history of the commission, and can be stated when required."

Here the answer disappoints the inquiry. Instead of following the lead held out by the question, and answering "that it was of no importance, in any point of view, which route may be agreed to;"—instead of this, he answers that it is of much importance—of national importance—and that the fur-traders take much interest in it. Thus, the answer disappoints the question; but to no purpose. Our Secretary pays no attention to his own testimony, when it makes in favor of his own country; and readily gives the British all they ask, and restores them to the route they had to relinquish under Jay's treaty. The testimony proves the importance of this boundary; but why resort to testimony? The conduct of the British is itself the strongest of all testimony, and should supersede the resort to any other. Up to the year 1802, they held on to this route in defiance of the treaty of 1783; in 1802 they removed from it, in consequence of Jay's treaty, and explored the new, difficult, dangerous, costly route of the Kamanistiquia; to get back from which, and especially to recover the master post of the Grand Portage, had been the object of their labors for forty years. The value which they placed upon the recovery of the old route, should have been sufficient to open the eyes of our Secretary to the sacrifice he was making. But, neither this conduct, pregnant as it was; nor the testimony of Mr. Ferguson, pointed as it was; nor all that passed before the Ghent commissioners, could check his desire to oblige the British at the expense of his own country. He perseveres in his design to grant Lord Ashburton all he demanded; and this he hastens to do, although Mr. Ferguson, the other witness to whom he appeals, gives him pointed testimony, derived from their own conduct, against the fur-traders' claim. He says:

"I have no doubt that the bay of the Pigeon river is the Long Lake of the treaty of 1783. It is designated by the name on Mitchell's map, which, at that time, was the only map existing of these regions; and was proven, by the evidence of Mr. John Adams and Mr. John Jay, to have been the only geographical description before the negotiators of the first treaty. Though evidently defective and erroneous, it is but fair to take it as an evidence of the intention. In addition to this evidence of the construction of the treaty of 1783, at the time it was concluded, we have this fact further—that, immediately after the peace, the traders of the Northwest Fur Company destroyed their forts and warehouses at the Grand Portage, and removed themselves to Fort William, ten leagues on the other side of the Pigeon river—a course which could only have been adopted for the reason that they supposed their previous location would now be on foreign territory. In addition, I have never heard this construction of the treaty of 1783 questioned by any of the partners of the British Fur Company whom I have met in that quarter."

Both the gentlemen appealed to, give testimony in favor of their own country; but all to no purpose. One asserts the importance of the boundary in a national point of view; the other quotes the conduct of the fur traders against themselves; but no matter—our Secretary persists in his design to treat the choice of boundaries as of no importance, and to give the British their own choice, and to re-establish them in their old headquarters. On the 27th day of July, in the same letter in which he "proposes" to Lord Ashburton the new Maine boundary, he also "proposes" to him the new Lake Superior boundary; and does it in the precise words proposed by Mr. William McGillivray, the chief of the then Northwest Company, to the board under the Ghent commission in 1824–'27. The Pigeon river—North and South Fowl Lakes—the Lake Saganaga—Cypress Lake—Lac du Bois Blanc—Lac La Croix—Little Vermillion Lake—Lake Namecan—are all followed in this letter with minute particularity and Oriental scrupulosity. And then he adds a clause in relation to the portages, which is a copy of Lord Ashburton's demand, as Lord Ashburton's is a copy of Mr. Barclay's, which is itself a copy of Mr. William McGillivray's. Here is the Webster proposition for the portages in this portentous letter of July, 1827, consisting of the precise words which now constitute a part of the treaty:

"It being understood that all the water communications, and all the usual portages along the line from Lake Superior to the Lake of the Woods, and also Grand Portage, from the shore of Lake Superior to the Pigeon river, as now actually used, shall be free and open to the use of the subjects and citizens of both countries."

And this ends the chapter of our wrongs on this section of our boundary between Lake Superior and the Lake of the Woods. The great united Hudson Bay and Northwest Company can now return as masters to the place from which they retired as trespassers forty years ago. After forty years wanderings in the wilderness of the Kamanistiquia, a deliverer and a leader has appeared to lead them forth. A new Joshua, in the person of our Secretary-negotiator, has come to the rescue; and the GRAND PORTAGE and the SOUTHERN ROUTE are again to become the seat of TRADE and EMPIRE to a SOVEREIGN company, whose control over the Indians has cost the United States a myriad of lives, and a hundred millions of MONEY.

It is in vain that the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. CHOATE,] feeling the overwhelming effect of this concession, labors to establish a distinction between the possession of the portages and their use. It is to no purpose, he alleges, that the late treaty has only granted the use of the GRAND PORTAGE, and the thirty-six other portages, formerly ours; it is a distinction without a difference. The new treaty alters the boundary; and then makes these portages free and common to each party. And this makes the treaty-rights of the British equal to our own; while their actual rights will be far superior to ours. The treaty makes us equal: the power of the company will make us unequal! They will have the exclusive use and possession on this line, as they have, under the same words, on the Columbia river. Every American who ventures on these portages will be shot by British Indians, as a thousand of them have been shot who have ventured to hunt or trade on the Columbia since the convention of 1818. It is in vain for the Senator to say the British cannot build and establish posts and depots on these portages: I answer, under the treaty their rights are equal to ours! that, in fact, they will be greater! and that British territory being now brought down to contiguity with all these portages, they can build and fortify adjoining to them, and still be upon their own territory. It is in vain that he relies upon the portage privileges in Mr. Jay's treaty. Those privileges only applied to the portages on the existing boundaries under the treaty of 1783; while the Webster treaty alters that boundary to confer these privileges in a new place! in a place from which Mr. Jay's treaty compelled these traders to remove in 1802! It is in vain that he pleads the immateriality of the routes. That plea is invalidated by the conduct of the British themselves, in holding on to the portage route for twenty years after the peace of '83, and by forty years' exertion since to get back to it. It is invalidated by the testimony of Mr. Delafield. It is invalidated by every British affidavit produced before the Ghent commissioners. It is in vain to prove that the land is poor and steril. What do the British want with our poor land? That is the same plea on which Maine was dismembered and mutilated, and our military frontiers there given up. If poor land is a plea for the surrender of our territory, the mouth of the Mississippi, and all the Gulf coast, and much more, may be surrendered: for it can be proved to be unfit for cultivation. Mr. Webster can get affidavits to that effect, and surrender half the frontiers of the Union in his next British treaty. These pleas will not do. They will not justify or excuse the sacrifice of ancient boundaries, the concession of territory, the grant of privileges, and the exemption from duties to a powerful and hostile company, wielding innumerable Indian tribes against us.

While making this sacrifice of an ancient and valuable boundary in this quarter, and bringing back the British to the ground from which they retired so long ago, our Secretary-negotiator has had the modesty to affect an acquisition of four millions of acres of fine mineral land in the same place; and our President has been good-natured enough to intimate the same thing in his message of August last. They do not exactly say so; but they make people believe it. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CHOATE] says their words are literally true. I say so likewise, but that they excite a belief entirely untrue. The words are—that, by this treaty, four millions of acres of fine mineral land, between Pigeon river and St. Louis river, northward of the claim set up by the British (Ghent) commissioner, are included within the United States. Very good! They were never excluded from the United States! And Lord Ashburton set up no pretension to them! He asked for a change of boundary to our prejudice, and for our portages, and for exemption from duties; and he got all that he asked, with all the territory (including Hunters' Island, a large body of land, and many smaller islands) which lies between the two Pigeon river routes in the whole extent of their divergence, nearly 200 miles in length, and frequently half a degree apart. He got this territory, amounting to some hundreds of thousands of acres, in addition to all the advantages of the only good trading route, and the Grand Portage; and now to be entertained with a false belief, created by true words, of a fine mineral acquisition of four millions of acres, is carrying fiction, in a State paper, rather too far.

The Senator from Massachusetts, who defends the Secretary on this occasion, makes it matter of objection that I did not mention the portages in my speech of August last. True, I did not mention them, and for the best of all reasons. I had not then read the stipulation in relation to them. Stuck in, as they were, at the end of a long article about boundaries, I read far enough to see what this new boundary was, and denounced it as it deserved; but the portage clause I did not read until the present session. Happily, it is a case in which the statute of limitations does not apply! and having now made the discovery, the Secretary shall have the full benefit of it. Certainly it was not anticipated that my speech on the treaty—forty mortal columns of the imperial Globe—certainly it was not anticipated that there should be a complaint against that speech for defect of accusatory matter. But the complaint is made; and I must justify, by bringing up the omitted accusation. I say, then, this affair of the portages—and, especially of the Grand Portage, and this exemption of a powerful company's goods from duties—constitutes one of the heaviest charges which I have found against the treaty. In the first place, it seems to militate against that clause in the Constitution which requires duties to be uniform throughout the United States. Next, it is manifestly unjust to our fur-traders, (who pay enormous duties,) to exempt their foreign competitors from the same burden. Then the stipulation itself is a cheat. It provides for the joint use of these portages, when everybody knows that in this case—the Columbia river has proved it—joint means exclusive; and that every American trader that dares to tread the same ground with them will be shot by British Indians. No palliation for this fatal concession can be found in Jay's treaty. That treaty only permitted the use of portages where these portages were on established boundaries; this treaty alters a boundary, to get a pretext for favoring the British! These traders could carry nothing on the portage route under Jay's treaty, because that route was not a boundary. They will now carry what they please upon it—and all free—because Webster's treaty has made it a boundary. He has altered the line for this purpose; and the long exiled Kaministiquia wanderers will come rushing back to take possession of their restored haunts. And who is it to whom this unconstitutional, unjustifiable, injurious, and dangerous advantage is given? Is it not that same powerful body of British traders to whom we are indebted for every Indian war in the Northwest, from the Revolution to the present day? to whom we are indebted for fourteen years retention of the Northwestern posts? and to whom we are now indebted for all the dangers which environ our settlement of the Oregon? Is it not this same company which has cost us a myriad of lives—the babe and its mother, as well as the father—and which cost us during the late war alone, (to say nothing of other Indian wars,) sixty millions of dollars? The whole cost of the late war was one hundred and twenty millions; the one-half of which was sunk in the Northwest, making head against the Indians which this company excited against us. And who is it that is now rewarding this company for past injuries, and rendering them more potential for the future? Is it not the same gentleman whose voice was on the side of the British and the Indians, when their feet were on the soil of our country, and their knives in the throats of our people?—who denied us men, and money, and ships, during the late war, and then taunted us with our defeats, and sarcastically demanded, after the horrid massacre of the river Raisin, if that was the entertainment to which we had been invited? Surely it is the same man!, and his treaties and negotiations now are in exact accordance with his votes and speeches then;—all on the side of the British, and all against his own country. And where did he get the power to demolish boundaries, release duties, and surrender portages? Where did he get the power for these acts? From President Tyler? If so, show us the warrant. As Secretary, he is nothing but head clerk to the President, and can only act by his permission or command. He must have the President's instruction! and if we can believe what was said at Boston, that instruction was a blank; and the head clerk headed his master!

Mr. President, we have fallen upon evil times; and great and strange are the calamities of the day. Modern Federalism sits at the head of our Government, and its genius is far more deleterious than the Federalism of ancient times. The old Federalists did many evil things; but they had their high points, from which they would never descend. They made a national bank, but did not christen it an exchequer. They made a bankrupt system, but did not systematize the repudiation of debts. They levied grievous taxes, but did not exempt foreigners from the levy. They invaded the State Governments at many points, but still left them their poor insolvent laws. They made treaties with England, but did not place our frontiers in her hands. Above all, they did not bring the British traders, red with the blood and loaded with the scalps of our citizens, within our borders; but sent them out, far away into the hideous wilderness. Modern Federalism has done all that ancient Federalism would not; and, for one, I infinitely prefer the old to the new. Give me John Jay, John Adams, and Rufus King—all leading Federalists in their day—in preference to Daniel Webster, Federal leader in this day, and John Tyler, his Democratic follower!

SPEECH OF MR. CALHOUN,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

In Senate, January 24, 1843—On the Oregon bill.

Mr. CALHOUN said it ought to be borne in mind, in the discussion of this measure, that there is a conflict between our claim and that of Great Britain to the Oregon Territory; and that it extends to the whole territory from the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific ocean; and from the northern limits of Mexico, in latitude 42, to the southern limits of the Russian possessions, in latitude 54. Nor ought it to be forgotten that the two Governments have made frequent attempts to adjust their conflicting claims, but, as yet, without success. The first of these was made in 1818. It proved abortive; but a convention was entered into, which provided that the territory should be left free and open to our citizens and the subjects of Great Britain for ten years; the object of which was to prevent collision and preserve peace, till their respective claims could be adjusted by negotiation. The next was made in 1824, when we offered to limit our claim to the territory by the 49th degree of latitude; which would have left to Great Britain all north of that latitude to the southern boundary of Russia. Her negotiator objected, and proposed the Columbia river as the boundary between the possessions of the two countries. It enters the ocean about the 46th degree of latitude. It follows, that the portion of the territory really in dispute between the two countries is about three degrees of latitude—that is, about one-fourth of the whole. The attempt to adjust boundaries again failed, and nothing was effected. I learn from our negotiator, (a distinguished citizen of Pennsylvania, now in the city,) that the negotiation was conducted with much earnestness, and not a little feeling, on the part of the British negotiators.

In 1827, just before the termination of the ten years, another attempt was made at an adjustment. The negotiation was conducted on our part by Mr. Gallatin. The whole subject was discussed fully, and with great ability and clearness on both sides; but, like the two preceding, failed to adjust the conflicting claims. The same offers were made respectively by the parties that were, in 1824, and again rejected. All that could be done was to renew the convention of 1818; but with the provision, that each party might, at its pleasure, terminate the agreement, by giving a year's notice. The object of the renewal was, as in 1818, to preserve peace for the time, by preventing either party from asserting its exclusive claim to the territory; and that of the insertion of the provision, to give either party the right of doing so whenever it might think proper, by giving the stipulated notice.

Nor ought it to be forgotten, that, during the long interval from 1818 to this time, continued efforts have been made, in this and the other House, to induce Congress to assert, by some act, our exclusive right to the territory; and that they have all heretofore failed. It now remains to be seen whether this bill, which covers the whole territory, as well north as south of the 49th, and provides for granting land, and commencing systematically the work of colonization and settlement, shall share the fate of its predecessors.

To determine whether it ought or ought not, involves the decision of two preliminary questions. The first is, whether the time has now arrived when it would be expedient on our part to attempt to assert and maintain our exclusive claim to the territory, against the adverse claim of Great Britain; and the other, if it has, whether the mode proposed in this bill is the proper one.

In discussing them, I do not intend to involve the question of our right to the territory, nor its value, nor whether Great Britain is actuated by that keen, jealous, and hostile spirit towards us, which has been attributed to her in this discussion. I shall, on the contrary, assume our title to be as valid as the warmest advocate of this bill asserts it to be; the territory to be, as to soil, climate, production, and commercial advantages, all that the ardent imagination of the author of the measure paints it to be; and Great Britain to be as formidable and jealous as she has been represented. I make no issue on either of these points. I controvert none of them. According to my view of the subject, it is not necessary. On the contrary, the clearer the title, the more valuable the territory; and the more powerful and hostile the British Government, the stronger will be the ground on which I rest my opposition to the bill.

With these preliminary remarks, I repeat the question, Has the time arrived, when it would be wise and prudent for us to attempt to assert and maintain our exclusive right to the territory, against the adverse and conflicting claim of Great Britain? I answer, No, it has not; and that for the decisive reason, because the attempt, if made, must prove unsuccessful against the resistance of Great Britain. We could neither take nor hold it against her; and that, for a reason not less decisive—that she could in a much shorter time, and at far less expense, concentrate a far greater force than we could in the territory.

We seem to forget, in the discussion of this subject, the great events which have occurred in the eastern portion of Asia, during the last year, and which have so greatly extended the power of Great Britain in that quarter of the globe. She has there, in that period, terminated successfully two wars; by one of which she has given increased quiet and stability to her possessions in India; and by the other, has firmly planted her power on the eastern coast of China, where she will undoubtedly keep up, at least for a time, a strong military and naval force, for the purpose of intimidation and strengthening her newly acquired possession. The point she occupies there on the western shore of the Pacific, is almost directly opposite to the Oregon Territory, at the distance of about five thousand five hundred miles from the mouth of Columbia river, with a tranquil ocean between, which may be passed over in six weeks. In that short time, she might place, at a moderate expense; a strong naval and military force at the ıth of that river, where a formidable body of ı, as hardy and energetic as any on this conti-t, in the service of the Hudson Bay Company, numerous tribes of Indians under its control, ld be prepared to sustain and co-operate with it. :h is the facility with which she could concen-e a force there to maintain her claim to the ter-ry against ours, should they be brought into lision by this bill.

now turn to examine our means of concentra-; an opposing force by land and water, should it ome necessary to maintain our claim. We 'e no military or naval position in the Pacific an. Our fleet would have to sail from our own res, and would have to cross the line and double pe Horn in 56 degrees of south latitude; and, ning north, recross the line, and ascend to lat-le 46 north, in order to reach the mouth of Co-mbia river—a distance from New York (over the ıightest and shortest line) of more than 13,000 les, and which would require a run of more n 18,000 of actual sailing on the usual route. tead of six weeks, the voyage would require six nths. I speak on the authority of one of the st experienced officers attached to the Navy. De-rtment.

These facts are decisive. We could do nothing water. As far as that element is concerned, we uld not oppose to her a gun or a soldier in the ritory.

But, as great as are the impediments by water, ey are, at present, not much less so by land. If assume some central point in the State of Mis-uri as the place of rendezvous, from which our ilitary force would commence its march for the rritory, the distance to the mouth of the Columbia ver will be found to be about two thousand miles; which much more than a thousand miles would over an unsettled country, consisting of naked ains or mountainous regions, without provisions, cept such game as the rifle might supply. On a eater portion of this long march, the force would liable to be attacked and harassed by numerous id warlike tribes of Indians, whose hostilities ight be readily turned against us by the British aders. To march such a distance without oppo-tion would take upwards of 120 days, assuming e march to be at the usual rate for military forces. ıould it be impeded by the hostilities of Indians, e time would be greatly prolonged.

I now ask, How could any considerable force ıstain itself in so long a march, through a region destitute of supplies? A small detachment might ve on game; but that resource would be altogether ıdequate to the support of an army. But admit-ng an army could find sufficient supplies to sus-in itself on its march to the territory, how could sustain itself in an uncultivated territory, too re-ıote to draw supplies from our settlements in its ear, and with the ocean in front, closed against by a hostile fleet? And how could supplies be ound to return, if a retreat should become neces-ary? In whatever view the subject may be re-arded, I hazard nothing in asserting, that such is ıe difficulty at present, on our part, of concentra-ng and maintaining a force in the territory, that few thousand regulars, advantageously fortified n the Columbia river, with a small naval force to ıpport them, could, with the aid of the employees f the Hudson Bay Company, and the co-operation f the Indians under its influence, bid defiance to ny effort we could make to dislodge them. If all ther difficulties could be surmounted, that of trans-orting a sufficient battering train, with all of its ppurtenances, to so great a distance, and over so ıany obstacles, would be insuperable.

Having now made good my first position—hat the attempt, at present, to assert and maintain ur exclusive claim to the territory, against the ad-erse claim of Great Britain, must prove unsuc-essful, if she resisted, it now remains to inquire whether she would resist. And here let me say, whatever might be the doubts of others, surely they who have, in this discussion, insisted so strongly n her power, her jealousy, and her determination o hold the territory, cannot doubt that she would esist. If, indeed, provoking language can excite ıer to resistance, or if half which has been said of ıer hostile disposition be true, she not only would esist, but would gladly seize so favorable an occa-ion to do so, while we are comparatively so weak, and she so strong in that quarter. However un-favorable the time might be for us, for her it would be the most propitious. Her vast resources and military power in the East are liberated, and at her disposal, to be directed to assert and maintain her exclusive claim to the territory against ours, if she should determine to follow our example, in case this bill should pass. Even I, who believe that the present Ministry is disposed to peace; that the recent mission to this country originated in the spirit of peace; and that Sir Robert Peel has exhibited great wisdom and moderation—moderation in the midst of splendid success, and therefore more to be trusted—do not doubt she would resist, if we should adopt this measure. We must not forget, as clear as we believe our title to be, that the right to the territory is in dispute between the two countries; and that, as certain as we regard our right to be, she regards hers as not less so. It is a case of adverse conflicting claims; and we may be assured, if we undertake to assert our exclusive right, she will oppose us by asserting hers; and if the appeal should be to force, to decide between us at present, the result would be inevitable—the territory would be lost to us. Indeed, this is so incontestable, that no one has ventured to deny it; and there is no hazard in asserting that no one will, who understands the subject, and does not choose to have the soundness of his judgment questioned.

But it may be asked, What then? Shall we abandon our claim to the territory? I answer, No. I am utterly opposed to that; but, as bad as that would be, it would not be as much so as to adopt a rash and precipitate measure, which, after great sacrifices, would finally end in its loss. But I am opposed to both. My object is to preserve, and not to lose, the territory. I do not agree with my eloquent and able colleague that it is worthless. He has underrated it, both as to soil and climate. It contains a vast deal of land, it is true, that is barren and worthless; but not a little that is highly productive. To that may be added its commercial advantages, which will, in time, prove to be great. We must not overlook the important events to which I have alluded as having recently occurred in the eastern portion of Asia. As great as they are, they are but the beginning of a series of a similar character, which must follow at no distant day. What has taken place in China, will, in a few years, be followed in Japan, and all the eastern portions of that continent. Their ports, like the Chinese, will be opened; and the whole of that large portion of Asia, containing nearly half of the population and wealth of the globe, will be thrown open to the commerce of the world, and be placed within the pales of European and American intercourse and civilization. A vast market will be created, and a mighty impulse will be given to commerce. No small portion of the share that would fall to us with this populous and industrious portion of the globe, is destined to pass through the ports of the Oregon Territory to the valley of the Mississippi, instead of taking the circuitous and long voyage round Cape Horn; or the still longer, round the Cape of Good Hope. It is mainly because I place this high estimate on its prospective value, that I am so solicitous to preserve it, and so adverse to this bill, or any other precipitate measure which might terminate in its loss. If I thought less of its value, or if I regarded our title less clear, my opposition would be less decided.

Having now, I trust, satisfactorily shown, that, if we should now attempt to assert and maintain our exclusive right to the territory, against the adverse claim of Great Britain, she would resist; and that if she resisted, our attempt would be unsuccessful, and the territory be lost,—the question presents itself, How shall we preserve it?

There is only one means by which it can be; but that, fortunately, is the most powerful of all—time. Time is acting for us; and, if we shall have the wisdom to trust its operation, it will assert and maintain our right with resistless force, without costing a cent of money, or a drop of blood. There is often, in the affairs of government, more efficiency and wisdom in non-action, than in action. All we want to effect our object in this case, is "a wise and masterly inactivity." Our population is rolling towards the shores of the Pacific, with an impetus greater than what we realize. It is one of those forward movements which leaves anticipation behind. In the period of thirty-two years which have elapsed since I took my seat in the other House, the Indian frontier has receded a thousand miles to the West. At that time, our population was much less than half what it is now. It was then increasing at the rate of about a quarter of a million annually; it is now not less than six hundred thousand; and still increasing at the rate of something more than three per cent. compound annually. At that rate, it will soon reach the yearly increase of a million. If to this be added, that the region west of Arkansas and the State of Missouri, and south of the Missouri river, is occupied by half-civilized tribes, who have their lands secured to them by treaty, (and which will prevent the spread of population in that direction, and that this great and increasing tide will be forced to take the comparatively narrow channel to the north of that river and south of our northern boundary, some conception may be formed of the strength with which the current will run in that direction, and how soon it will reach the eastern gorges of the Rocky Mountains. I say some conception; for I feel assured that the reality will outrun the anticipation. In illustration, I will repeat what I stated when I first addressed the Senate on this subject. As wise and experienced as was President Monroe—as much as he had witnessed of the growth of our country in his time, so inadequate was his conception of its rapidity, that near the close of his Administration, in the year 1824, he proposed to colonize the Indians of New York, and those north of the Ohio river and east of the Mississippi, in what is now called the Wisconsin Territory; under the impression that it was a portion of our territory so remote, that they would not be disturbed by our increasing population for a long time to come. It is now but 18 years since; and already, in that short period, it is a great and flourishing Territory, ready to knock at our door for admission as one of the sovereign members of the Union. But what is still more striking—what is really wonderful and almost miraculous, is, that another territory (Iowa) still further west, (beyond the Mississippi,) has sprung up, as if by magic, and has already outstripped Wisconsin, and may knock for entrance before she is prepared to do so? Such is the wonderful growth of a population, which has attained the number ours has, and is still yearly increasing at the compound rate it is; and such the impetus with which it is forcing its way, resistlessly, westward. It will soon—far sooner than anticipated—reach the Rocky Mountains, and be ready to pour into the Oregon Territory, when it will come into our possession without resistance or struggle; or, if there should be resistance, it would be feeble and ineffectual. We would then be as much stronger there, comparatively, than Great Britain, as she is now stronger than we are; and it would then be as idle in her to attempt to assert and maintain her exclusive claim to the territory against us, as it would now be in us to attempt it against her. Let us be wise, and abide our time, and it will accomplish all that we desire, with far more certainty, and with infinitely less sacrifice, than we can without it.

But, if the time had already arrived for the successful assertion of our right against any resistance which might be made, it would not, in my opinion, be expedient, in the present condition of the Government. It is weak—never more so; weak politically, and from the state of the finances. The former was so ably and eloquently described by my colleague, that I have nothing to add, but a single remark on the extraordinary state of parties at present. There are now three parties in the Union; of which one is in possession of the Executive department, another of the Legislative, and the other, judging by the recent elections, of the country; which has so locked and impeded the operations of the Government, that it is scarcely able to take measures necessary to its preservation.

In turning from this imbecile political condition of the Government, and casting my eyes on the state of its finances, I behold nothing but disorder and embarrassment; credit prostrated; a new debt contracted, already of considerable amount, and daily increasing; expenditures exceeding income; and the prospect, instead of brightening, growing still more gloomy. Already the debt falls not much short of thirty millions of dollars; to which will be added, from present appearances, by the end of the year, (if the appropriations are not greatly curtailed, and the revenue improved,) not less, probably, than ten millions, when the interest would be upwards of two millions of dollars annually—a sum more than equal to the net revenue from the public lands. The only remaining revenue is derived from the foreign commerce of the country; and on that, such heavy duties are imposed, that it is sinking under the burden. The imports of the last quarter, it is estimated, will be less than nine millions of dollars—a falling off of about two-thirds, compared with what it ought to be, according to the estimate made at the last session by those who imposed the burden. But, as great as it is, the falling off will, I understand, be still greater, from present indications, during the present quarter; and yet, in the face of all this, we are appropriating money as profusely, and projecting schemes of expenditures as thoughtlessly, as if the treasury were full to overflowing. So great is the indifference, that even the prostrated condition of the treasury attracts no attention. It is scarcely mentioned or alluded to. No one seems to care anything about it. Not an inquiry is made, how the means of supplying the acknowledged deficit to meet the current demands on the treasury, or to cover the extraordinary expenditures which will be incurred by this measure, should it be adopted, is to be raised. I would ask its advocates, Do you propose to borrow the funds necessary for its execution? Our credit is already greatly impaired, and our debt rapidly increasing; and are you willing still further to impair the one, and add to the increase of the other? Do you propose to raise them by increasing the duties? Can you hope to derive additional revenue from such increase, when the duties are already so high as not only to paralyze the commerce, agriculture, and industry of the country, but to diminish, to an alarming extent, the revenue from the imports? Are you prepared to lay a duty on tea and coffee, and other free articles? If so, speak out; and tell your constituents plainly that such is your intention; that money must be had; and that no other source of revenue is left, which can be relied on, but a tax on them. It must come to that; and before we incur the expense, it is but fair that our constituents should know the consequence.

But we are told the expense will be small—not exceeding one or two hundred thousand dollars. Let us not be deceived. What this bill appropriates is but the entering wedge. Let it pass, and no one can tell what it will cost. It will depend on circumstances. Under the most favorable, on the supposition that there will be no resistance on the part of Great Britain, it would amount to millions; but if she should resist, and we should make it a question of force, I hazard nothing in saying it would subject the country to heavier expenditures, and expose it to greater danger, than any measure which has ever received the sanction of Congress.

Many and great are the acts of folly which we have committed in the management of our finances in the last fourteen or fifteen years. We doubled our revenue when our expenditures were on the eve of being reduced one-half by the discharge of the public debt. We reversed that act of folly, and doubled our expenditures, when the revenue was in the course of reduction under the compromise act. When the joint effects of the operation of the two had exhausted the treasury, and left the Government without adequate means to meet current demands, by an aptitude in folly, unexampled, we selected that as the fit moment to divest the Government of the revenue from the public domain, and to place the entire burden of supporting it on the commerce of the country. And then, as if to consummate the whole, we passed an act at the close of the last session, which bids fair to cripple effectually this, our only remaining source of revenue. And now what are we doing? Profiting by the disastrous consequences of past mismanagement? Quite the reverse; committing, if possible, greater and more dangerous acts of folly than ever. When the Government and the country are lying prostrate by this long series of errors and mismanagement; when the public credit is deeply impaired; when the people and the States are overwhelmed by debt, and need all their resources to extricate themselves from their embarrassments,—that is the moment we select to bring forward a measure, which, on the most favorable supposition, if adopted, cannot fail to subject the Government to very heavy expenditures, even should events take the most favorable turn; and may—no, that is not strong enough—would probably subject it to greater than it ever has heretofore been. Where would the Government find resources to meet them? Not in its credit, for that would be extinct. Not in the impost, for that is already overburdened. Not in internal taxes; the indebted condition of the States forbids that. More than half of the States of the Union are in debt; many deeply—and several even beyond their means of payment. They require every cent of the surplus means of their citizens, which can be reached by taxes, to meet their own debts. Under such a state of things, this Government could not impose internal taxes to any considerable amount, without bankrupting the indebted States, or crushing their citizens. What would follow, should the Government be compelled, in consequence of this measure, to resort to such taxes, I shall not undertake to trace. Suffice it to say, that all preceding disasters, as great as they are, which followed the preceding acts of folly, would be as nothing compared to the overwhelming calamities which would follow this. Our system might sink under the shock.

If, Senators, you would hearken to the voice of one who has some experience, and no other desire but to see the country free and prosperous, I would say, Direct your eyes to the finances. There, at present, the danger lies. Restore, without delay, the equilibrium between revenue and expenditures, which has done so much to destroy our credit, and derange the whole fabric of the Government. If that should not be done, the Government and country will be involved, ere long, in overwhelming difficulties. Cherish the revenue from the lands and the imports. They are our legitimate sources of revenue. When the period arrives—come when it may—that this Government will be compelled to resort to internal taxes for its support in time of peace, it will mark one of the most difficult and dangerous stages through which it is destined to pass. If it should be a period like the present—when the States are deeply in debt, and need all their internal resources to meet their own engagements—it may prove fatal; and yet it would seem as if systematic efforts are, and have been, making for some time, to bring it about at this critical and dangerous period. To this, all our financial measures tend,—the giving away the public lands; the crushing of the customs by high protective, and, in many instances, prohibitory duties; the adoption of hazardous and expensive measures of policy, like the present; and the creation of a public debt, without an effort to reduce the expenditures. How it is all to end, time only can disclose.

But, if our finances were in ever so flourishing a state; if the political condition of the country were as strong as it could be made by an administration standing at the head of a powerful dominant party; and if our population had reached the point where we could successfully assert and maintain our claim against the adverse claim of Great Britain, there would still remain a decisive objection to this bill. The mode in which it proposes to do it is indefensible. If we are displeased with the existing arrangement, which leaves the territory free and open to the citizens and subjects of the two countries; if we are of the opinion it operates practically to our disadvantage, or that the time has arrived when we ought to assert and carry into effect our claim of exclusive sovereignty over the territory, the treaty provides expressly for the case. It authorizes either party, by giving a year's notice, to terminate its existence whenever it pleases, and without giving reasons. Why has not this bill conformed to this express and plain provision? Why should it undertake to assert our exclusive ownership to the whole territory, in direct violation of the treaty? Why should it, with what we all believe to be a good title on our part, involve the country in a controversy about the violation of the treaty, in which a large portion (if not a majority) of the body believe that we would be in the wrong, when the treaty itself might so easily, and in so short a time, be terminated by our own act, and the charge of its violation be avoided? Can any satisfactory reason be given to these questions? I ask the author of the measure, and its warm advocates, for an answer. None has been given yet; and none, I venture to assert, will be attempted. I can imagine but one answer that can be gsven—that there are those who will vote for the bill, that would not vote to give notice, under the delusive hope that we may assert our exclusive ownership, and take possession, without violating the treaty, or endangering the peace of the country. Their aim is, to have all the benefit of the treaty, without being subject to its restrictions; an aim in direct conflict with the only object of the treaty—to prevent conflict between the two countries, by keeping the question of ownership or sovereignty in abeyance till the question of boundary can be settled. That such is the object, appears to be admitted by all, except the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WOODBURY,] whose argument, I must say, with all deference for him, was, on that point, very unsatisfactory. The other advocates of the bill, accordingly, admit that a grant of lands to emigrants settling in the territory, to take effect immediately, would be a violation of the treaty; but contend that a promise to grant hereafter would not be. The distinction is, no doubt, satisfactory to those who make it; but how can they rationally expect it will be satisfactory to the British Government, when so large a portion of the Senate believe that there is no distinction between a grant and a promise to grant lands, as it relates to the treaty, and hold one to be as much a violation of it as the other? We may be assured that the British Government will look to the intention of the bill; and, in doing so, will see that its object is to assert our exclusive claim of sovereignty over the entire territory against their adverse claim, and will shape their course accordingly. Our nice distinction between actual grants and the promise to grant will not be noticed. They will see in it the subversion of the object for which the treaty was formed, and take their measures to counteract it. The result will be, that, instead of gaining the advantage aimed at, we shall not only lose the advantages of the treaty, but be involved in the serious charge of having violated its provisions.

I am not, however, of opinion that Great Britain would declare war against us. If I mistake not, she is under the direction, at this time, of those who are too sagacious and prudent to take that course. She would probably consider the treaty at an end, and take possession adverse to us, if not of the whole territory, at least to the Columbia river. She would, at the same time, take care to command that river by a strong fortification, manned by a respectable garrison, and leave it to us to decide whether we shall acquiesce, or negotiate, or attempt to dislodge her. To acquiesce under such circumstances, would be a virtual surrender of the territory; to negotiate with adverse and forcible possession against us, would be almost as hopeless; and to dislodge her at present, would, as has been shown, be impracticable.

Such, in my opinion, would be the probable result, should this bill be passed. It would place us, in every respect, in a situation far less eligible than at present. The occupation of British subjects in the territory, as things now stand, is by permission, under positive treaty stipulation, and cannot ripen into a title, as it was supposed it would by the Senator from Illinois. [Mr. MCROBERTS.]

But if their occupancy was adverse, (as it would be, should this measure be adopted,) and Great Britain should resist, then his argument would be sound, and have great force. In that case, the necessity of taking some decisive step, on our part, to secure our rights, would be imperious. Delay would then, indeed, be dangerous. But as it is, no length of time can confer a title against us; and it is that, considering what advantage Great Britain has over us at present, either to take or hold possession, which ought to give to the treaty great value in our estimation. It is a wise maxim to let well-enough alone. We can do little at present to better our condition. Even the occupation and improvement by British subjects, against which so much has been said, will, in the end, if we act wisely, be no disadvantage. Neither can give any claim against us when the time comes to assert our rights, if we abide faithfully by the treaty. They are but preparing the country for our reception; and should their improvements and cultivation be extended, it would only enable us to take possession with more ease if it should ever become necessary to assert our claims by force; which I do not think probable, if we shall have the wisdom to avoid hasty and precipitate action, and leave the question to the certain operation of time.

In conclusion, I might appeal to the authority of the preceding Administrations from 1818 to the present time, in support of the views I have taken. On what other supposition can it be explained, that the administration of Mr. Monroe should assent to the treaty of that year, which left the territory open and free to the citizens and subjects of the two countries for the period of ten years? Or that of Mr. Adams should revive it, with the provision, that either might terminate it by giving one year's notice? Or, still more emphatically, how can it be explained, that with this right of terminating the treaty, the Administration of General Jackson, and that of his successor, should, for the period of twelve years, acquiesce in it, but on the conviction it was the best arrangement which could be made, and that any change or movement n our part would but render our situation worse nstead of better, in relation to the territory? It annot be said that the present is a more favorable eriod to assert our exclusive right, than during ither of the preceding Administrations. The reerse is the fact. It is, in every view, far less favorable than either, and especially than that of eneral Jackson, when the treasury was overowing, and the head of the Administration possessed greater influence and power than any other hief Magistrate that ever presided over the ountry. That, if ever, was the time to assert our xclusive ownership; particularly as those who are o earnestly pressing it on the Government were ien in power, and would have been responsible or its execution. How is it to be explained, that ney were then so passive and are now so urgent or the passage of this bill?

Entertaining these views, I hope that the moion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ARCHER] rill prevail, and the bill be referred to the ommittee on Foreign Relations. The subject is ne of great importance and delicacy, and ought o be carefully examined by the appropriate organ f the body. Should it be referred, I trust the ommittee will report amendments to strike out ll the provisions of the bill which, by any reasonable interpretation, might be regarded to be in onflict with the stipulations of the treaty between ne two countries, or which might incur any conderable expense in the present exhausted conition of the treasury. As at present advised, I m not indisposed to the provision, if properly uarded, which proposes to extend our jurisdiction ver our citizens in the territory. It ought not, owever, to be carried farther than the provisions f the act of Parliament of 1821. I am opposed to olding out temptation to our citizens to emigrate o a region where we cannot, at present, protect nem; but if there be any who may choose to emirate, I would be far from opposing them; and am nwilling that they should lose, by emigration, ersonally the benefit of our jurisdiction and aws.

I have now said what I intended in reference to his bill; and shall conclude by noticing some remarks which fell from the Senator from Missouri [Mr. LINN] who introduced it. When he rst addressed the Senate, in reply to my former emarks, he spoke a good deal about opposition nd injustice to the West, and referred to some of ne acts of the Government at an early date, which e supposed partook of that character. I do not uppose that he intended it; but his remarks were alculated to make the impression (taken in conexion with the time and subject) that he regarded ne opposition to the passage of this bill as originating in unfriendly feelings to the West. But he so regards it, and if he intended to apply his emarks to me, I would appeal to my acts to repel ne unjust imputation.

[Here Mr. LINN disclaimed any intention of attributing to Mr. CALHOUN hostile or unkind feelings to the West.]

Mr. CALHOUN. I am happy to hear the disclaimer of the Senator. I felt assured he could not have ntended to do me so much injustice as to attribute o me the slightest hostility to the West. No one nows better than he does that my opposition to ne bill originates in public considerations, free om all local feelings, and that my general views f policy have ever been friendly, and even beral, towards the West; but as there are others ot so familiar with my course in reference to that reat and growing section, I deem it proper to vail myself of the opportunity briefly to allude to , in order to repel any improper imputation which ay be attempted to be attributed to me, from any uarter, on account of my course on the present ccasion.

I go back to the time when I was at the head of ne War Department. At that early period I turned my attention particularly to the interest of the Vest. I saw that it required increased security to s long line of frontier, and greater facility for carying on intercourse with the Indian tribes in that uarter, and to enable it to develop its resources—specially that of its fur-trade. To give the equired security, I ordered a much larger porion of the army to that frontier; and to afford facility and protection for carrying on the ur-trade, the military posts were moved much igher up the Mississippi and Missouri rivers. Under the increased security and facility which hese measures afforded, the fur-trade received a great impulse. It extended across the continent, in a short time, to the Pacific, and north and south to the British and the Mexican frontiers; yielding in a few years, as stated by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. LINN,] half a million of dollars annually. But I stopped not there. I saw that individual enterprise on our part, however great, could not successfully compete with the powerful incorporated Canadian and Hudson Bay Companies, and that additional measures were necessary to secure permanently our fur-trade. For that purpose, I proposed to establish a post still higher up the Missouri, at the mouth of the Yellow Stone river, and to give such unity and efficiency to our intercourse and trade with the Indian tribes between our Western frontier and the Pacific ocean as would enable our citizens engaged in the fur-trade to compete successfully with the British traders. Had the measures proposed been adopted, we would not now have to listen to the complaint, so frequently uttered in this discussion, of the loss of that trade.

But that is not all. I might appeal to a measure more recent, and still more strongly illustrative of the liberal feelings which have ever influenced me, whenever the interest of the West was concerned. I refer to the bill relating to the portion of the public domain lying within the new States, which I introduced, some time since. It is true, indeed, that I looked to the interest of the whole Union in introducing that measure; but it is not the less so that it would, if it should become a law, more especially benefit the West. In doing that, I exposed myself, in my own section, to the imputation of seeking the friendship of the West—as I do, on this occasion, to that of hostility towards that great and growing section. As the hazard of the former could not deter me from doing my duty then, so that of the latter cannot from doing my duty now. The same sense of duty which on that occasion impelled me to support a measure in which the West was peculiarly interested, at the hazard of incurring the displeasure of my own section, because I believed it calculated to promote the interest of the whole,—impels me on this occasion to oppose this measure, at the hazard of displeasing the West, because I believe, in so doing, I not only promote the interest of the Union generally, but that of the West especially.

REMARKS OF MR. C. BROWN,

OF PENNSYLVANIA.

In the House of Representatives, February 3, 1843—On a motion to reduce the pay of the officers of the navy, and in reply to the speech of Mr. WHITE of Indiana, in defence of the Whig party.

Mr. CHARLES BROWN said he had tried repeatedly, for the last two or three days, to get the floor, to give his views on the subject of the navy generally; but at that late hour, when the hands of the clock had nearly reached the point at which all debate must cease, under the arbitrary rules of the majority, he would leave all he had purposed to say to some more convenient season, if any such should come, and only refer to that part of the bill which particularly interested those he immediately represented—the Philadelphia navy yard; and give the rest of his time and attention to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WHITE] and the Whig party, which had been thus thrust upon the House out of season, apparently for the sole purpose of talking up the sinking—or sunken—fortunes of Whigery.

The Navy Department had asked for an appropriation of $28,000 to put the Philadelphia navy yard in a proper situation; $24,000 of which was to extend the wharves into the deep water of the river—a work, the department said, of "indispensable necessity;" and yet the Committee of Ways and Means had stricken out all the latter item, and only provided for a few small repairs, to the amount of $4,000. While they had thus treated the Philadelphia yard, the committee had appropriated to the Portsmouth navy-yard the sum of $40,411—all that the department asked; and asked by it not as indispensably necessary, but as the sum that could be profitably laid out in permanent improvements—not works of indispensable necessity. For the Boston navy-yard $64,371 had also been appropriated—two-thirds of the whole sum asked by the department. And for what? Why, "boundary walls" and "additional store-houses," &c., not at all of "indispensable necessity," as was the appropriation asked and refused to the Philadelphia yard. So with the New York yard. The committee had appropriated $40,500 to this yard, when the department, in its report, states that "the uncertainty of a permanent location within the waters of New York had prevented this point from being settled." Forty thousand dollars to be thrown away, probably! Such manifest partiality and injustice ought to be rebuked by the House; and he hoped that, when the proper time came, the House would insert in the bill the amount shown by the department to be of "indispensable necessity" for the Philadelphia navy yard. Such treatment as that yard had had from the Government, was an insult to those among whom it was located.

The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WHITE,] with whom he had to deal (said Mr. B.) for the remaining time allowed him, took the floor about two hours before the time that was fixed by his vote, and that of his party, that all debate upon the bill must stop. He was one of the boasted reformers of the House; one of those who claim to have reformed its manners and habits, by the introduction of rules to gag the mouths of its members; and that gentleman, (said Mr. B.,) and his votes, and his speeches, were fair samples of the Whig party and their reforms. He had spoken his hour, or nearly so. The subject was an amendment, proposed by one of his Whig friends, to retrench the expenditure of the Government some hundreds of thousands of dollars annually; and how much of the gentleman's speech went to show the necessity or propriety of that retrenchment? Not one word! He never alluded to the navy bill—a bill appropriating nearly ten millions of dollars—nor to the amendment that proposed to lessen that appropriation some hundreds of thousands! These subjects were either above or beneath his notice. He could see nothing but the Whig party—its hopes and its fears. His speech was all about president-making. And yet he was one of those who had talked, and would talk the loudest, about retrenchment and reform—and had boasted, and would boast, how they had prevented a waste of the public time and the public money in useless debates upon that floor. As it had been, and was, with the gentleman from Indiana, so had it been, and so would it be, with the whole Whig party. They were all promise—all boast—but no performance. If it were not for the gag rules they had adopted, and the worse than useless waste of words of the Whigs in debate, some reform might be made—some retrenchment expected. On this very navy bill, if a proper discussion could be had, a large sum would most probably be thus saved. But as it was, the committee and the House would be obliged, from the time wasted by the gentleman from Indiana and his Whig friends in party slang-whanging, to strike in the dark, or vote for it all without knowing wherefore or why. And who was to blame for all this? The House had a Whig Speaker, and the committee a Whig chairman, who were responsible for all irrelevant debate. These, and the Whig rules of the House, had made it anything but a deliberative assemblage of the Representatives of the American people. There never had been, (Mr. B. said,) since the beginning of the Government, a House of Representatives so disorderly, or one that had indulged in so much criminating and recriminating debate—and that, too, by Whigs upon Whigs. Day after day had he and the other Democratic members sat in silence and sorrow, listening to one Whig member abusing, ridiculing, and reviling another; and one after another, by dozens, abusing, ridiculing, and reviling the President of the United States—that President that their votes had elected. And that was what they called reform!

Mr. KING here rose, and asked leave to explain.

Mr. BROWN. No; the gentleman had said nothing, and therefore had nothing to explain; and he would not yield the floor at that late hour to any one who had voted to stop all explanations on a bill so important at so short a time.

Mr. KING said he had voted against it.

Mr. BROWN. Had not the gentleman vote for the "rule," by which discussion might be stopped by his friends whenever they pleased? [To which, Mr. KING made no reply.] Then, said Mr. BROWN, the gentleman from Georgia had put a loaded gun into the hands of madmen, and he ought not to complain when he was shot down by its discharge.

[Mr. KING sat down amidst general laughter, and cries of good! good!]

of it, complained that the President had thwarted all their plans, and that it was necessary for the people to elect another Whig President and Congress, before all the great reforms and relief they had promised the people in 1840 could be accomplished; and laid down, as the means of their accomplishment, and as the Whig creed, the "distribution of the proceeds of the sales of public lands," a "protective tariff," and a "national bank." Without noticing the gentleman's crude conception of the principles of the Democratic party, or his misrepresentations of some of its prominent men and measures, he would ask the gentleman with what face he [Mr. WHITE] could go before his constituents, or the people of the United States, and ask them to trust him and his Whig friends with power again, when they had abused, and were abusing so shamefully, the trusts already reposed in them. He was willing to give them the benefit of the opposition of the President to their bank and distribution they had proposed; and how would their account then stand? Had they not distributed the poor pittance of the sales of the proceeds of the public lands? When the General Government was borrowing money to meet and pay their Whig appropriations, had they not sent the land revenue to all the States that would receive it? And yet what State had been benefited by it? Had it increased the value of any of their stocks? or reduced any of their taxes?

Had they not passed a "protective tariff?" And what good had it done? [Here a member said, in an under tone, "And you voted for it."] Yes, (said Mr. B.,) I did vote for it—and as an honest politician, too. I did not approve of the bill, nor did I believe that it would relieve the oppression under which labor and productive capital and industry were suffering. Though it could do no good, I thought it could do little or no harm. In the present state of the country and the world, I did not think the importation or exportation could be very much diminished or enlarged by a tariff of any kind. But if anything was calculated to diminish both, it was just such a tariff as was passed; and it certainly had not enlarged the market for American produce abroad, or increased its price at home.

He voted for it on another account. Petitions were circulated through a part of his district, and manufacturers and politicians had raised the cry that all the depression of the times was owing to a reduced tariff; and that if a high tariff was laid, all would be prosperous again in a single day. And yet, what had been the consequence? The tariff was no sooner laid, than the wages of many of the operatives had been reduced, and many turned out of employment altogether. To resist the low wages offered by the manufacturers to the operatives, a war had been going on in his district, and the adjoining one, ever since the tariff bill had been passed.

He had voted for it on still another account. He wished the Whig party to carry out all their projects of government that would not entail lasting injury upon the country. Temporary derangement of the functions of the Government would be more than compensated by the experience they would bring with them. A year or two of slight suffering would be well repaid by the returning sober sense and second thought of the American people, and the utter prostration of all Whig humbugs for the next twenty years.

The tariff itself had been the best argument that could be offered against its oppressive and prohibitory features. It had failed to increase the revenue, or to promote the prosperity of the people. The actual distribution of the sales of the public lands, like the tariff, had demonstrated its entire inadequacy to accomplish what its authors led the public mind to anticipate. The bankrupt law had worked so badly, that its Whig makers had already almost unanimously condemned it; and such, he had no doubt, would have been the case with a national bank, if one had been made. It would most likely have died in its birth. But had it gone into operation, it would have failed to benefit the country, though it might have accommodated a few favorites.

He would ask the gentleman from Indiana what it was they expected from a national bank? He asked this, as it was the only Whig measure not carried into effect by this Congress; and as it was now put forth as the leading article of their faith, and their last hope in their future contests for power. Was it to loan money to politicians, or political newspaper editors? Or was it to regulate the exchanges, and furnish a national currency? These last they held out to the people as the objects to be attained by a national bank.

For himself, Mr. B. said he did not want any other regulation of the exchanges, nor any other national currency, from the hands of the Government, than gold and silver coin—this was the best, and only true regulator of exchanges—the only true national currency. But if the Whigs honestly wanted the exchanges regulated by the General Government, had not the President offered them full and adequate means in the exchequer? Would not that regulate all the exchanges at the public expense and risk? And did not the President's exchequer offer to them a sufficiently large paper currency also? Three dollars of paper for one of gold and silver! Would not that give them paper money enough? He thought the exchequer might have satisfied their largest desires—their most insatiate appetites for paper money. But they rejected it, not because it would not regulate the exchanges, or give them a national currency; but because it was not their favorite corporation—a bank. Would they tell the people that a currency based upon the revenues, the property, the faith of the nation, was not good enough—not so good as that issued by a corporation? Or would they tell the people that President Tyler had defeated all their efforts to give them a regulator of exchanges, a maker of currency, when they had thus rejected his offered boon? It would seem, however, that there was to be no "loop to hang a doubt upon" in their future party arrangements—no Whig skulking in the next presidential campaign—(if the speech of the gentleman from Indiana was to be taken as their rule of action)—no more Tylerism—no concealments—no "generous confidence," as in 1840; all was to be open, defined, and foreordained; he who would be a Whig, must be "every inch a Whig," and shout, at the top of his bent, hosannas to a bank! He must be for a bank, and a bank only, as fit to be the treasury, hold the money, make the currency, and, in fact, govern these United States. The only cry that was to be allowed or heard throughout the Whig camp, was to be bank! bank! bank! Let the appeal be made, (said Mr. B.) and he had no fear of the decision of the people upon it.

All the measures matured or proposed in this Congress, that had thus far marked the course of the Whig dynasty, had only tended to their destruction. They had been sinking deeper and deeper at every step they had taken in the accomplishment of their party objects, until the whole country had repudiated them. Defeat after defeat, from the opening of the extra session, had everywhere fixed upon them, and their course, the deepest and darkest condemnation. [A member here said: "What of the late Georgia election?"] Ay, (said Mr. B.) and what of the late Georgia election? The Whigs had elected a member for some six weeks—a single member to serve out the tail end of a session; and that was all that had been saved from the wreck of their whole reign; and that had been trumpeted from one end of the Union to the other as a "glorious Whig victory!" At the election for members to the next Congress some sixty-eight thousand votes were polled, and the Whigs were defeated. They were told that that defeat was owing to General Apathy! At the late election for a single member, to serve but for six weeks in a Whig Congress, only about forty-five thousand votes were polled, and that was called a "glorious Whig victory." But who achieved that victory? Was it not that same general that defeated them before—General Apathy? It was a victory; but it appeared it was won for them by General Apathy fighting for them, instead of against them. And what a Whig victory! Would the member elected, or any other Georgia Whig member, rise in his place and tell the House and the country to which of the Whig measures of this Congress that victory was to be attributed? Was it the distribution law? Was it the bankrupt law? Was it the tariff? Had the people of Georgia so fallen in love with any or all of these Whig laws, that they had taken Whigery again into their embraces? Or did they elect the member from Georgia to carry out further and more fully the Whig doctrines advanced by the gentleman from Indiana—distribution, high tariff, and a bank? He had not observed how the new member from Georgia had voted; but he much mistook the Whigs of Georgia if such were the inscriptions on their banner at the late "glorious victory."*

Now, (said Mr. B.,) a few words on the subject of retrenchment generally, and that proposition particularly by the amendment under consideration, and he had done. That was the most powerful of all the party war-cries of the Whigs in 1840. "Retrenchment and reform!" was everywhere the first and last notes sounded on their bugles; and now, after they had been ruling in those halls for near eighteen months, and from which they must depart in about as many days, forever, he would ask them the question, one and all, in what they had retrenched or reformed? [Some member was heard to say they had cut down the pay of the "pages."] No, (said Mr. B.) they raised the pay of the boys; but they had retrenched the pay of one man—the Commissioner of Public Buildings; and his alone! No! Not his alone. There was another that had felt the weight of the mighty reforming hand of the great Whig party; and he was the man who swept the House, made their fires and carried the water—literally "their hewer of wood and drawer of water"—nearly, if not quite the only laboring-man about the Capital. He was retrenched fifty cents a day! What a bright page—a green spot in the history of the Whig Congress that retrenchment would form. Such was the truth—the truth to the letter. Who would deny it? And who had prevented them from reforming anywhere and everywhere, and retrenching the expenses of the Government anywhere and everywhere? Let them look to the record, and it would be found not to be the Democrats. They had generally given their votes for all retrenchment. Even the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ARNOLD] had acknowledged that it was the Democrats who had always voted with him to take up the bill to reduce the compensation of members of Congress, and all the other officers of the Government—a bill, though it had been sneered at and voted down by the Whigs, ought to be passed, and would, if they were true to those they represented, but which never would be passed if left to the Whigs to do it. Yes, (said Mr. B.) he would pledge himself to any and all retrenchment of the expenses of the Government, and he thought he might safely pledge a majority of the Democrats on that floor to any and every measure that was honestly calculated to bring down the expenses of the Government to its revenues, and that would obviate the necessity of imposing any other duties or taxes on the people. He hoped the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WHITE] would tell all this to the people of Indiana—tell them of all the Whig party had done when in power, and all they had not done. When he tells them of their tariffs, their distributions, their bankrupt laws, let him not forget to tell them of their reforms and retrenchments!

Mr. PROFFIT, (in an under tone.) We did not go at the last election for "retrenchment;" we went for "reform."

Mr. BROWN. What sort of reform?

Mr. PROFFIT, (in an under tone.) To get such Locofocos as you out of power.

Mr. BROWN. Yes, that is true! The gentleman from Indiana before me [Mr. PROFFIT] says, truly, that the reform they went for in 1840 was "to get *Extracts from the proceedings of the House of Representatives of February 9th, as reported for the Globe.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CRAWFORD (the recently elected Representative from Georgia, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. HABERSHAM) rose, and . . . was understood to call upon the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHARLES BROWN] to say whether he had intended to cast any personal reflection by those remarks made the day before.

Mr. C. BROWN said he would answer the question of the gentleman. . . . He knew nothing that could justify him in imputing anything wrong to the gentleman from Georgia; on the contrary, he had always understood that he was a high-minded, honorable man; and . . . that he was surprised that the gentleman should suppose that there was anything disrespectful meant by the remarks to which his attention had been called; and he thought the gentleman from Georgia was the only gentleman in this House who would so interpret them.

Mr. CRAWFORD was understood to say, that as the gentleman from Pennsylvania had disclaimed any disrespectful imputation, he had nothing more to say.

Mr. C. BROWN would, however, be pleased if the gentleman from Georgia would respond to the questions which he yesterday submitted, as it was important that the House should know whether he was elected in consequence of any of the Whig measures of this Congress, or to sustain those Whig principles which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WHITE] had laid down—[laughter]—namely, a national bank, a tariff, and distribution.

Mr. CRAWFORD did not respond, and here the conversation terminated.

uch Locofocos out of power"—and I suppose to et themselves in. And they did get in, and a pretty iece of business they have made of it. Like many thers who get into places they are not fit for, by mproper means, they are about to be put out again. They have digged a pit for others, and have fallen nto it themselves. Their days are numbered—nd soon all that will be left of the great Whig arty, or its victory of 1840, will be a blotted page n the records of the legislative history of the coun-ry, and a debt of some thirty millions of dollars or the people to pay as the price of their folly in iving such a party the power to misgovern them.

Having now squared the accounts with the gen-leman from Indiana, Mr. B. said he had but a few ords to say on the amendment before the commit-ee—the reduction of 20 per cent. on the pay of all aval officers. If it could be done, he would rather his reduction could be made more equitable than t will be by this horizontal per centage; and that it hould be made in some general bill, operating on ll or many of the other officers of the Government, ivil and military. But they must begin some-here; and he would vote for it here, and regulate t, and extend it to others elsewhere, if it could be one. In 1835, the pay of the navy officers was ncreased, in many cases, far beyond what was hought proper by the Navy Department and Navy oard, though the latter was composed of navy offi-ers. In some cases, it had gone $1,000 beyond; nd in others, $500; and so on, down to $100. The ay of all the grades of officers below a captain was ar higher in the United States service, than in any oreign service—a midshipman three or four times s much as in the French or British navy. He ad made a comparison, on a former occasion, be-ween the members of Congress, when their pay vas but six dollars a day, and those who now occu-ied their places; and he would now ask the com-ittee to make a similar comparison between the fficers of the navy under the old pay, (which, in nany cases, was but little more than half what it ow is,) and those who are now receiving the high ay. Who was it that had gained for the navy and or the country its fame and glory? Was it not of-icers under the low pay? Look at the achieve-nents of Preble and Decatur in the Mediterranean, nd compare them with what had been recently ex-ibited there. Look at Lawrence, Perry, Macdon-ugh, Hull, Jones, Bainbridge, Stewart, and their ellow-sailors of 1813-'14; and where are their su-eriors now? Take from the navy the character won for it by the officers under low pay, and it would ave but comparatively little to claim the public egard in its favor. He did not wish to disparage t, or its officers; many—by far the larger number—were gallant men, and would do their countrygood ervice if it required it from them. But this they ad done under lower pay; and would do again, f their pay was brought down to a fair standard. He believed them generally patriotic. As good atriots, they ought to be willing to make some little acrifice, when their fellow-citizens, who paid them or their services, had to sacrifice so much. The tate of the treasury required a reduction of ex-enses, or an increase of revenue. No honest man would continue to employ agents and servants, and ay them high wages, when his income was inade-uate, and he was obliged to resort to borrowing.

The pay of everybody in private life was being educed. The farmer could not sell his produce as igh as he did; nor could the mechanic or manufac-urer his wares. The price of labor and service f all kinds was reduced. The people had not the eans to pay their agents so ample as they once ad. Was it not, therefore, right and just to make hose who served the country, and who had enjoyed ts prosperity, feel with their fellow-citizens its ad-ersity? In the State of Pennsylvania, they had axed the salaries of all State officers; they did not hink it equitable to tax the landholder and the la-orer to pay the office-holder, and let the latter go ree. In Alabama, he understood, the salaries of ll State officers had been reduced 10 or 20 per ent. In New York, and elsewhere, they were re-ducing; and it was right and proper in the present tate of the business of the country, and the relative alue of money, that reductions should be made verywhere in salaries. A post-captain—and a allant one, too, Mr. B. said—had told him, some ime since, that he had saved money while a lieu-enant, though his pay had never been more than 700 a year; and that, he feared, was more than ould be said of many lieutenants now; hence they hould learn a little old-fashioned economy. [Mr. MALLORY, in an under tone, said: "Perhaps he was a bachelor."] No, said Mr. B., he was not a bach-elor. But suppose he had been, he (Mr. B.) had yet to learn that a bachelor lived cheaper than a mar-ried man. He understood from the Scriptures that woman was made by God a "help meet for man;" and such he had been led to believe a good wife al-ways was to her husband. He considered it a slan-der upon the wives of the United States to say they were a bill of expense to their husbands; and it was calculated to degrade their high characters to ask the Government to give a bounty to their husbands to support them. He did not believe there was an officer in the navy whose wife would ask or re-ceive from the treasury of the country a single dol-lar on her own account, that the services of her husband, in and of themselves, did not fully entitle him to. He had misunderstood the character of the American women, if they did not repudiate all such doctrine as that. It was the officer, not the wife, whose services were to be paid for; and it was those services, and not the cost of a wife, or his ex-penses, that ought to form the measure of his pay. For them, he ought to be paid fully, but not extrav-agantly. And this rule ought to be applied alike to all who served their country—civil or military.

SPEECH OF MR. McDUFFIE, OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

In Senate, Monday, February 13, 1843—On the following resolutions, submitted by him, viz:

Resolved, That it is the solemn and urgent duty of the present Congress to adopt, without delay, efficient measures to revive the crippled and decaying commerce, replenish the impoverished exchequer, and arrest the alarming accumulation of the public debt of the United States.

Resolved, That a modification of the existing tariff on foreign imports, such as will render it strictly and in good faith a mere revenue measure, is indispensable to the accomplishment of those objects; and that the recent measures of the British Parliament, partially adopting the principles of free trade, the public indications of a disposition on the part of the present ministry to extend those principles still further, and the probability of the speedy organization of an extensive system of smuggling on the long line of our frontier, furnish pressing motives to Congress for acting on the subject during its present session.

Resolved, That a rigid system of retrenchment, economy, and accountability, such as will bring the annual expenditures within the annual income of the Government, is not less indispensable; and that, while this is rendered necessary by the deplorable state of the public finances, it is rendered just, and not injurious to the public service, by the great reduction of the currency, and consequent appreciation of the value of money.

Mr. PRESIDENT: In submitting these resolutions, respectfully, to the consideration of the Senate, I have taken counsel solely and exclusively from my own profound sense of my duty as a Senator of the United States.

I presented them, sir, without consultation with any human being; and I can assure Senators on all sides of this chamber, that they need not apprehend that the resolutions aim to accomplish any disguised or oblique purpose, but that their object is clearly and unequivocally indicated upon the face of them.

I am aware, Mr. President, that some persons may suppose that resolutions of this description would come more appropriately from another quarter. I know it is the opinion of some, that those who constitute the majority of the Legislature are solely responsible for existing evils; and perhaps it may be regarded by them as a rule of party tactics to permit those evils to increase and accumulate, in order that additional odium may be brought upon the party which is supposed to be responsible.

This, Mr. President, is not my political morality. I hold that every party—whatever may be the relative position it occupies; nay, every individual member, however powerless he may be—is under the most solemn obligation to use every fair and honorable effort for the removal of those evils with which the country is unhappily afflicted.

What, sir, is the condition of this country? We exhibit to the world an unexampled spectacle. With the most unbounded resources—with all the blessings that a beneficent Providence can confer upon a people—with a fertile soil, abounding in every production that is necessary, not only for the support of human life, but to minister to the comfort and happiness of the people—at a time of profound peace, and after that peace has continued for nearly a quarter of a century;—with all these advantages, and in the midst of this unbroken peace, we find the whole country involved in one universal scene of distress.

Under these circumstances, sir, are we to stand still, dealing in mutual crimination and recrimination as to who are the authors of these calamities? Can we soothe or sear our consciences by exclaiming, in the language of Macbeth, while our country lies bleeding at every pore, "Thou can'st not say I did it?"

No, Mr. President, it is time that every patriot—every man who feels an interest in the prosperity of his country—should earnestly apply his shoulder to the wheel. I shall not pretend to decide upon the causes of the existing calamities, inasfar as they are to be ascribed to one political party or another. I will barely remark, in passing, as an admonition to all parties, that I consider both the great political parties into which this country is divided, in some sort responsible for the evils which now afflict us.

After the expiration of the charter of the Bank of the United States, the Administration, then in power, unquestionably committed a very great error. Holding the opinion, as the then President did, that the several State banks could furnish a currency equally sound as that which then existed, he selected certain State banks as the depositories of the public treasure, accompanied by an injunction, almost amounting to a law, that they should afford credits to merchants and others to a sufficient extent to supply the place of that accommodation which had been furnished by the United States Bank. Under this system, we all know what took place, necessarily; for it is too recent to be forgotten by any. As had been predicted by many of those who entered into the discussion of the question, State banks sprung up by scores in all parts of the Union; and the currency, in the course of a few years, was expanded to a degree of which we had previously no example. All sorts and descriptions of credits were enlarged; and such was the infectious nature of the mania which prevailed, such the universal delirium which seized upon the nation, that every sort of speculation was stimulated to the highest possible point.

Yes, sir, penniless adventurers could obtain credit for thousands, to enable them to enter into the wildest speculations. But very soon after this system was adopted, the banks of the several States suspended payment, and the Administration, finding their expectations disappointed, showed a very rare and commendable wisdom in instantly retracing their steps, and remedying, as far as possible, the error they had committed. The State banks were abandoned; the confidence which had been reposed in them being justly forfeited, and a system was proposed which tended to disconnect entirely the financial operations of the Government and the banks.

Thus far for the responsibility of the then existing Administration. Now let us look at the responsibility of the other party. When the scheme of an independent treasury, and a total separation of the Government from the banks, was introduced by the Administration, what was the course adopted by the other party? The leading statesmen of that party, who, in common with myself, wished to maintain the Bank of the United States as it was already in existence, believing that it had performed its functions beneficially for the public, immediately turned round and became the advocates of the system so justly abandoned. The instant the Administration, discovering their error, attempted to correct it, the opposite party—perhaps from instinctive propensity of all political parties to assume antagonist positions; I will not undertake to say for what cause—adopted the exploded system as a half-way house to a national bank. Both of the great political parties, then, being, in some degree, the authors of the state of things which now unfortunately exists, it is the duty of them both to unite in applying some appropriate remedy. What is that remedy? How are we to relieve the distress and pecuniary embarrassment which pervade the country?

I am aware, sir, that an idea very extensively prevails, that the sole remedy in the power of Congress to administer, is a restoration of the currency by some Federal regulation of the paper circulation; and the resolutions introduced by the honorable Senator from Maine will make it my duty to submit a few brief remarks on this subject.

It appears to me, Mr. President, (and I say it with great deference—for the opposite opinion is held by some of the most able men in the country,) that all hopes, founded upon any scheme which the wisdom of man can suggest for the restoration of the currency of this country, will be fatally delusive, so far as it regards a remedy for the distresses and pecuniary embarrassments which now prevail. It will be a mere superficial remedy; it cannot reach the seat of the disease. What is the cause of the present distresses? The remote cause is undoubtedly the expansion of the currency; and the more immediate cause, its sudden contraction. From facts which I have before me, it appears that, in the course of three years, the currency of this country expanded from ninety-four millions of dollars to one hundred and forty-nine millions; and, in a similar period, sunk down to some seventy millions. Now, I beg Senators to impress upon their minds this single circumstance. It furnishes a lesson which ought not to be forgotten; it is a lesson which we have but too much cause to remember.

When, from any cause, the bank circulation of a country is extended beyond a certain degree—for instance, fifty millions beyond the proper and natural amount of the circulation demanded by the business of the country—this redundancy of circulation, by a law as immutable as the law of gravitation, tends to carry down the quantity of the circulation even below its natural level. This is the cause of the existing distress. Our currency was unnaturally expanded, and prices swelled to a hundred per cent. beyond their natural average. The system, of course, could not continue in this state of inflation. Any currency professing to rest upon a specie basis must sink into utter ruin, as the inevitable result of such an expansion. Now, sir, what has actually taken place? The currency has been reduced to one half its former dimensions. In the very nature of things, it was obliged to be thus reduced, if the system was to rest on a specie basis, affording a sound and uniform currency. That reduction has, perhaps, not gone to the extreme point which it must reach. And now what are we about to do? After the country has suffered the utmost distress, and been driven to the verge of bankruptcy—after we have gone through the painful process of contracting our circulation—after we have suffered all the evils which must follow from its undue expansion;—after all this, what is the remedy proposed? Why, sir, some seem to imagine that, in legislation, according to the old adage, "the hair of the mad dog is good for the bite." And now, after we have suffered the evils incident to reforming a rash and ill-devised system of bank credit and bank circulation, and see the dawn of returning prosperity; after natural causes and the laws of trade have nearly corrected them, and we are once more almost standing on a platform of a sound and uniform currency, the most intelligent and sagacious minds of the country are calling out for a new system of paper circulation, which must carry the country through the same circle of expansion, contraction, and ruin, from which we are just recovering.

Sir, we find the patient in a state in which the administering of medicine is no longer salutary; and when, though at present debilitated, he is about to recover by a natural process, we are required to continue tampering with his system, by the use of new and additional nostrums. Believe me, sir, any scheme—the Bank of the United States, under any possible modification—an exchequer board, with all the checks and guaranties which human wisdom can provide—will be utterly inadequate to furnish a remedy. The truth is, the country is very much in the condition of a patient who is unwilling to trust to the vis medicatrix naturæ, but is perpetually calling out for medicine; and, as is usual in such cases, mistaking entirely the nature of the remedies required. What do gentlemen propose to do? They tell you that their object is to reform the condition of the currency, and to establish a bank circulation on a sound basis and of uniform value. Now, in regard to the stimulating causes of these schemes of currency—the existing sufferings of the people—a restoration of the currency to a state of soundness is the very last thing in the world which the patient could endure, or which his real wants require. A sound currency! Why, gentlemen seem to imagine that the Government possesses a sort of political legerdemain, by which it can accomplish direct incompatibilities. Can you reform the currency and expand it at the same time? The very act of increasing the circulation would defeat your professed object of reforming the currency. You can reform a vitiated currency by no other process than by curtailing it.

But, Mr. President, under existing circumstances, as to those who have fallen victims to the popular delusions and speculations produced by the excesses of the credit system, their case is hopless; it is beyond the power of surgery or even of galvanism, to revive them. However rapidly you hurry on these schemes, they will come too late for them. But I am aware there is a very plausible argument which gentlemen have frequently urged on this point—that their desire is not so much to increase the quantity of circulation, to induce the banks to go into a system of excessive discounts and circulation, as to restore confidence. Yes, sir, that is the watchword—to restore confidence to the country. Confidence! Mr. President. Confidence in what? Confidence in banks, that have made promises only to violate them? How can we have confidence in a system which all experience proves must, in the nature of things, result in those very revulsions and distress, the consequences of which we are at this moment experiencing? Are we to encourage the people of the United States to indulge false hopes, which must inevitably be disappointed? God forbid that this sort of confidence ever should be restored. No, sir; like the confidence that Eve reposed in the serpent, and by which she was tempted to eat of "that forbidden fruit, whose mortal taste brought death into the world," it is the real source of all our woes—all our calamities.

But, Mr. President, when you attempt to establish a sound system of currency; when you endeavor to lay the foundation for a just and well-founded confidence, having reference to the future—no bank, no exchequer board will be necessary to enable the country to recover from the distress into which it has been thrown. No man can be more sensible than I am of the necessity of a sound and stable currency; but how is this to be effected? If I were asked what system of currency I would now propose, I would candidly confess that I am not prepared at the present moment to fix upon any. I should say this much, however, with entire confidence: leave nature to work in her own way for a time; leave the people to their own industry and resources; do not place too much reliance upon artificial systems and legislative contrivances.

Is it supposed by any one (I will not say in this Senate, but in the country) that the mere issue of a bank circulation—if you could to-morrow restore the delusive confidence which formerly existed, so far as to create seventy millions in addition to our present circulation—will add one solitary cent to the wealth of the United States? You have no creative power. There is no power in legislation by which you can add a single blade of grass, a grain of corn, or a pod of cotton, to the wealth of the country. The remedy is not to be found in legislation, or in any artificial contrivances. Our only hope is in undoing the mischief which such artificial contrivances have already done.

Sir, upon the subject of bank circulation, I feel that it is due to myself that I should read a sentence or two from the first public document which I ever presented to the Congress of the United States in relation to it. They are contained in a report which I submitted to the House of Representatives on the question of renewing the charter of the Bank of the United States, which always sustained a salutary check on the State banks, and was a means of preserving the soundness of the paper currency, by preventing them from running into excessive issues. In that document the following opinion is expressed on the general question of currency:

"It must be assumed, as the basis of all sound reasoning on this subject, that the existence of a paper currency, issued by banks deriving their charters from the State Governments, cannot be prohibited by Congress. Indeed, bank credit and bank paper are so extensively interwoven with the commercial operations of society, that, even if Congress had the constitutional power, it would be utterly impossible to produce so entire a change in the monetary system of the country as to abolish the agency of banks of discount, without involving the community in all the distressing embarrassments usually attendant on great political revolutions, subverting the titles to private property. The sudden withdrawal of some hundred millions of bank credit would be equivalent, in its effects, to the arbitrary and despotic transfer of the property of one portion of the community to another, to the extent, probably, of half that amount. Whatever, therefore, may be the advantages of a purely metallic currency, and whatever the objections to a circulating medium partly composed of bank paper, the committee consider that they are precluded, by the existing state of things, from instituting a comparison between them, with a view to any practical result.

"If they were not thus precluded, and it were submitted to them as an original question, whether the acknowledged and manifold facilities of bank credit and bank paper are not more than counterbalanced by the distressing vicissitudes in trade incident to their use, they are by no means prepared to say that they would not give a decided preference to the more costly and cumbersome medium."

Such were then my sentiments, and such are they at this time; and the course of events has now brought us to such a condition, that, without any further revulsion or suffering, specie may be made not only the basis of our circulation, but to constitute a large portion of that circulation. Let us attempt to create no system by which the bank may be again drawn into their former excesses but leave them, with their recent experience, and under the salutary restraints of public opinion, to recover public confidence by a prudent course of self-reform, by which they will deserve it. The course of events will do infinitely more than we can do by legislation.

If I were clothed with unlimited power at this moment to regulate the currency, I would say I am not prepared to decide. And no man ought to decide upon any specific plan in regard to it, until we have had the experience of some years. Believing, then, as I confidently do, that all plans of relief heretofore proposed must be absolutely impotent to relieve the existing distresses; and that a system of currency having reference to the future should be a work of mature deliberation, I am decidedly of opinion that the time has not arrived when any legislative enactment should take place upon the subject. The relief which the country demands is of a much more radical character. What is that relief? It has been indicated in the first of those resolutions which I have had the honor to submit to the Senate. The commerce of this country is in a state of decay; and, from the documents which I have before me, I may almost say in an expiring condition.

What shall be done, then, to restore this important source of the nation's wealth? Shall we hope to revive commerce by continuing that system of policy by which it is now shackled? Shall we invent new contrivances of a similar character for the future? No, sir: undo the mischief you have done; knock off the fetters you have already imposed; leave trade to her own laws; permit your people to enjoy their natural advantages, and the fruits of their industry, free from all unjust restrictions. Do this, and you will insure prosperity to the country; and, at the same time, replenish your exhausted treasury.

I come, therefore, to the consideration of the second resolution, which proposes reducing the existing tariff from its present prohibitory character, to a proper and reasonable revenue standard, so as to make it in reality what it professes to be—a constitutional measure merely for the purpose of raising revenue.

And here, Mr. President, I cannot but remark that there never was a time more inappropriate for the introduction of such a measure, than the moment selected for the introduction of the tariff of the last session, in view of what had taken place, and of what was then in progress in other countries, as well as in our own. Sir Robert Peel, the British minister, yielding to the force of public opinion, had mitigated, to a very great extent, the commercial restrictions which existed in Great Britain. Had we pursued our true national policy, we would have met these advances to a system of free trade in a liberal spirit of reciprocity. But what did we do? Instead of reciprocating the advances which Great Britain made to us, we turned our backs upon her at the very moment when measures were taken by Great Britain to enable your farmers of Pennsylvania, of New York, and of all the grain-growing States of this Union, to find a market abroad for their produce. Our Legislature—thinking, perhaps, that these great advantages tendered to our farmers might seduce them into the heresy of free trade—passed the tariff bill of last session, more prohibitory than any of its predecessors.

I have before me a letter from an officer of the Treasury Department, showing, from the custom-house returns for the city of New York, the extraordinary falling-off which has been occasioned by the passage of the measure in question. In a statement showing the monthly income from customs, we have for the month of January $1,963,000, while that of December amounts to but $955,000, and the intervening months exhibit a regular falling off, from the time it was expected the tariff bill would pass, until the close of the year. Now, if the month of December is a fair indication of what the revenue is to be next year, the whole revenue from customs at New York will not be more than three millions of dollars. This, of itself, is alarming enough, as it regards our financial prospects; to say nothing of the more important considerations of commerce destroyed, and the people oppressed by unjust burdens. Now, what are the consideray which we are called on to submit to these unnat-ıral and unjust exactions?

To protect the domestic industry of the United States! To carry out the American system! These elusive phrases have operated so extensively, as almost to confound the understandings of the people.

I pray you to bear with me for a moment while take a brief review of the commerce and the evenue of the United States. And I will, at the lose of that review, ask the Senators who voted or the tariff of the last session, to tell me on what round it was they thought it necessary to sacrifice hose great interests?

From the very beginning of the Government, ith the exception of a few years of war, the whole evenue by which the machinery of Government as been kept in motion, has been derived exclu-ively from foreign commerce. But that to which beg leave to call the particular attention of the enate, is, that since 1816, at least three-fourths of he revenue, which has not only paid the current xpenses of the Government, but performed the un-xampled achievement of extinguishing the public ebt, has been derived from that branch of your ommerce which consists entirely of the exchanges eceived for the agricultural exports of the South-rn and Southwestern States—less than one-third f the Union; and that it is against this very ranch of commerce that the whole power of your rohibition tariff is directed, professedly with a iew to destroy it! Yes, sir; this great branch of our national industry has done all this, and more.
t has made us a great commercial and naval powr, and contributed largely to enrich the people, by upplying them with the comforts and luxuries of ife cheaper than they could be obtained from any ther source. And for all these great services to he country and the Government, what grateful reurn have you made? What acknowledgment of our obligations? None, sir; but, on the contrary, nd to the eternal reproach of this Government, it as destroyed what it was under the most sacred bligations to protect and defend—like an unnatural onster, plunging a dagger into the bosom of his est friend and benefactor. And on what ground is his monstrous outrage to be justified? What great ival interest is there in this country, which can ssert a paramount claim to the protection of the overnment?

It is the domestic manufactures of the country hich demand the sacrifice. The protection of me industry!—the suffering industry of the coun-y! These are the watchwords. But what, I ask, s that industry which has supplied you with all he blessings of an enriching commerce? Is it not omestic industry? Is it not home industry? Do ou get from abroad foreign manufactures to the alue of a dollar, that are not procured by means of omestic industry? Unless you rob—unless you teal—unless you obtain by fraudulent devices,— ou cannot get the worth of a farthing, but by an xchange of the products of domestic industry. In his respect, commerce and manufactures, then, tand upon the same footing precisely.

There is a vast interest represented by those ho are engaged in the production of the great aple articles of exportation—in exchanging those rticles for foreign manufactures, by means of cap-al; in transporting them to foreign ports; and in onveying foreign merchandise, received in exhange for them, to the United States. These onstitute the great exporting interest identified with oreign commerce. Whatever destroys the one, de-troys the other. And, although the States pro-ucing these exports constitute, perhaps, less than ne-third of the Union; and although they have een contemptuously reproached as being barren nd-hills,—yet they have mainly sustained the ommerce of the United States—having furnished wo-thirds of the entire exports of the Union, since otton and rice and tobacco have become the reat staples of exportation. Two-thirds of the roductions which sustain foreign commerce have een furnished by less than one-third of the Union.
nd upon this great branch of domestic industry, ith the capital which it employs, has devolved the hole burden of supporting the Government, by arnishing the subjects of taxation. Now, I ask he friends of the tariff, in all candor, and with the most respect, what is that branch of industry for hich they exclusively claim the name of domestic ndustry? They will answer, home manufactures!

Upon what ground are we to destroy commerce
o sustain the manufacturers? Why should these be protected by the sacrifice of foreign commerce, and at the expense of this Government? Has the Government ever derived a solitary cent of revenue from domestic manufactures? Does this branch of domestic industry contribute one solitary cent to the support of the Government? Do they not, on the contrary, diminish the revenue? And yet, you are to destroy that great branch of national industry which has supported the Government and enriched the people, in order to afford assistance to a branch of domestic industry which has been itself an enormous tax both upon the people and the Government. A more monstrous combination of injustice and ingratitude can hardly be conceived. To destroy commerce, the great agent of civilization, and bond of peace among nations, to foster a rival branch of industry, by measures which convert the United States from mutual customers to commercial rivals, is as unwise and impolitic as, in reference to other considerations, it is unjust and oppressive.

But there is yet a larger and more pervading view of this subject, showing the suicidal character of a prohibitive tariff. The great exporting interest—that of the planters, merchants, and ship-owners—say to the Congress of the United States, If you will permit us freely to exchange the productions of our industry for the productions of other countries, subject to a revenue duty merely, even with this discrimination of 20 per cent. against us, we will pledge ourselves to supply the people with all the manufactures they need one-third cheaper than they now obtain them from the manufacturers of the United States.

To this the tariff majority in Congress practically reply, that they regard cheap manufactures a great national evil, if obtained by exchanging the products of domestic agriculture for foreign manufactures; that this cheapness is the very reason they prohibit their importation; and that they would rather the people should pay a third more for the manufactures they consume, and that the treasury should be impoverished, than the manufacturers of the United States should not receive from 33⅓ to 100 per cent. more for their fabrics than their natural price.

Such is a true exposition of the misnamed protective policy.

But I am aware of the arguments with which I shall be met on this subject. After the experience of twenty years, and the lessons to the contrary which that experience has taught us, gentlemen will still urge those arguments by which they sustained their policy in its incipient stages. I remember well, on my first entry upon the stage of public life, how confidently the manufacturers of the United States predicted, if you would only give them protection for a few years, they would be able to supply all your wants with articles cheaper and better than you could procure them from abroad. This was their confident prediction. And in that day, Mr. President, no man dared to rise and avow the purpose of making this system of unjust and oppressive restriction a permanent measure of national policy. Our establishments, said they, are in a state of infancy. Protect them for a few years, and we will ask no further aid, but will defy competition. I well remember the reply I then made to these promises—which subsequent experience and the conduct of the manufacturers have confirmed even beyond my anticipations. I showed, from documents of undoubted practical authority, that the cost of producing manufactures in Great Britain consisted of three elements—viz., three-eighths of the wages of labor, three-eighths of the interest upon capital, and one-fourth of the cost of the raw material; and I then argued that, as capital could be obtained in England at half the interest at which it could be obtained here, and labor be procured for less than half the wages, it was apparent that the cause of the inability of the American manufacturers to maintain a competition with the foreign was founded on permanent causes—the low wages of labor, and the low rate of interest; causes which, I trust, will be eternal; for no patriot can desire that wages here should be reduced to sixpence a day, or the profits of capital to three per cent., even to enrich our manufacturers. And now, after the lapse of twenty years, the wages of labor and the rate of interest in Great Britain are as much below what they are here as they ever were; and, though the machinery employed in our manufactories is in many respects superior to the British, our manufacturers clamor as loudly for protection as they did in 1824. Is this oppressive system, then, to last forever? Have gentlemen reflected on the consequences which must result from it, if thus perpetuated? Have they estimated the frightful amount of burdens imposed by it on the people of the United States?

I believe, sir—though I have not the documents before me, but from a general recollection—that the amount of manufactures of this country, which are embraced in the operation of the protecting laws, was, in 1841, about nine times as large as the amount of foreign importations of the same description; that is to say, that the amount of such importations was about forty millions of dollars, and the amount of domestic manufactures of a similar kind three hundred and sixty millions. Now, I beg gentlemen to dwell a moment on these facts, and consider what is the amount of the tax imposed on the people of the United States, estimated from these statistics? An average duty of thirty-five per cent. on forty millions of foreign imports, would impose a burden of $14,000,000, though the revenue should be less, by means of its prohibitory operation. The price of these imports must rise 35 per centum, or the trade will cease. This duty upon foreign imports would be distributed among the consumers, and would be cheerfully borne if it ended here. But this is by far the smallest part of the burden it imposes; for the law cannot raise the price of imported manufactures, without raising in the same degree the price of similar domestic manufactures. This is a self-evident proposition—as much so as any in mathematics. No ingenuity can evade it. Now, sir, my mind shrinks back from the contemplation of such enormous burdens! Three hundred and sixty millions of domestic manufactures indirectly taxed at the rate of thirty per centum, as a bounty to incorporated wealth! Sir, will gentlemen deny that this tax is real? Will they come forward now, and contend that they can manufacture cheaper than we can import, in the very face of the law passed by themselves? Not satisfied with the duty imposed by the fair operation of the compromise act, and in palpable violation of its solemn pledges, they have made the duty on many articles prohibitory; thus clearly admitting that they cannot compete with the importers, even with the protection afforded by a revenue duty.

Such, sir, are the enormous burdens imposed on the people of the United States! Make any allowance you please—reduce the rates I have stated, even to the revenue standard of 20 per cent; and yet the burden exceeds anything which human patience would endure, if the people were actually sensible of the true extent of those burdens. But, sir, it is the result of an indirect system of taxation, which imposes these burdens upon the people under such disguises that they know not what they suffer. They are sinking under the weight of their burdens; and yet, like a man who falls a victim to the influence of a corrupt atmosphere, they are totally unconscious of the real causes of their distress.

So much, Mr. President, for the operation of the tariff, and the claims of the manufacturers to special protection. In regard to the influence of the system upon the great mass of the people of the United States, it is distinctly making an issue whether you will sustain a few wealthy capitalists at the expense of the country at large.

But there is one portion of the Union which has an especial claim to our consideration. I allude to the States which produce the great staples of exportation. Upon these States, this tariff operates with a crushing weight of oppression. And no man, who nourishes in his bosom a proper sense of justice, can fail to give an attentive consideration to the gross and monstrous inequality of their burdens. Independently of the tax they pay as consumers, they are exposed to a burden incomparably greater from the prohibitory effect of the tariff upon that branch of commerce which regulates the value of their staples. In fact, sir, these prohibitions have reduced the planting States to a condition of strict colonial dependence on the manufacturing States. They are excluded from the best markets, and confined to the worst, both for selling their staples and purchasing merchandise in exchange. While they were dependent upon Great Britain, their colonial vassalage was not, in point of fact, half so oppressive as that under which they at this moment labor. What are their real interests, and the sources of their prosperity? What the productions of their industry? They cultivate the soil, and thank God for the bounties of his providence in giving them a genial sun and productive soil. Providence has done much for us; but what has the Government done?

Before I proceed, allow me to remark, that the first object which gave cause to the formation of the Federal Government was the protection of foreign commerce. The first convention called to meet at Annapolis, was for that especial and avowed purpose. Such was the main purpose of the Government formed by our forefathers. The power of "regulating foreign commerce" was obviously conferred solely for its protection. And what, I pray, has Congress been doing, since 1824, under its constitutional obligation to protect and preserve the most beneficial and enriching commerce ever enjoyed by any people? It has, deliberately, avowedly, and perseveringly, levelled the power which imposed on it the sacred duty of protecting this great branch of national industry, at its very existence, in order to foster a less beneficial one, over which it has no constitutional power whatever.

Sir, all the pirates that ever infested the ocean—all the stormy elements that ever agitated the surface of the Atlantic—all the disasters occasioned by human villany and the other perils of the deep combined—cannot produce half the injury to the exporting States to which I have alluded, that Congress is now producing, deliberately and intentionally, by its unjust and destructive legislation. And let me add, that you violate one of the most sacred of all the rights of property by this iniquitous system of legislation. It is in vain that I flatter myself that I own property, while any man, or any combination of men, by unconstitutional and irresponsible legislation, claim the right, and exercise the power, of taxing it at pleasure, to provide bounties for themselves. What, sir, is involved essentially in the first elementary notion of the right of property? Have I property in my cotton—in that which I have lawfully and honestly produced by my capital and labor? Is it really and exclusively my own? If so, it follows, as a necessary consequence, that I may rightfully dispose of it, whenever and wherever I please—provided I violate the rights of no other man, by fraud or violence. It is one of the natural and inalienable rights of man—a right which no Government on earth can constitutionally violate.

It is no exaggeration, therefore, to say this is a system which reduces the exporting States to a condition of colonial bondage, as it makes their interests subservient and tributary to the interests of distant States, by pecuniary penalties restricting their natural rights, and constraining them to go to a market, every way unfavorable to their interests.

Sir, I have turned over in my mind the various systems of policy of the different Governments of Europe, and, as God is my judge, I do not think my mind was ever brought to contemplate anything in the form of human legislation more unjust than the system I have attempted to delineate in its most striking features.

To render still more plain the injustice and inequality of this system, and to show that this is really a competition between different branches of domestic industry, I will now present a practical illustration, which will address itself to the common sense of every just and unprejudiced mind. I, sir, as a cotton-planter, have been in the habit, for several years, of exporting my crop to Europe. I have not, to be sure, exchanged the whole for merchandise; but I had a right to do so. Now, let us suppose that I had done so, to supply the community around me with the manufactures they might require. It will not be denied that the manufactures thus imported would be as rightfully and truly the productions of my industry as the cotton I exchanged for them. Yet, sir, when I bring that merchandise to the port of Charleston, I meet there a manufacturer who has goods of the very same description, fabricated in a distant State. He comes to the custom-house, and, clothed with the exclusive privileges of your tariff laws, introduces his manufactures into my own State, without duty; while I cannot introduce the same description of manufactures, the exclusive production of my own industry, without paying a high discriminating duty, to provide a bounty for a distant rival, and diminish the value of my manufactures, as compared with his, precisely to the amount of the duty. For it is an undeniable proposition, that, after paying say 35 per cent. as a protective duty, I could not obtain a cent more for my manufactures, than the Northern manufacturer could obtain for his, paying no duty at all. If human injustice can go further than this, I am entirely at a loss to conceive how. But I shall not go at large into this subject; but will briefly call the attention of the Senate to one or two items in the present tariff, which I regard as peculiarly illustrative of the genius of this system.

In the first place, I shall call your attention to the duty on iron—a duty which I believe has mainly contributed to draw the honest farmers of Pennsylvania, and of some other States, into the support of the protective system; though that system imposes a very high duty—more, I believe, than 100 per cent. on rolled iron—operating as a tax upon all the farmers and agriculturists of the United States, to promote the interest of a few wealthy iron-masters. Now, sir, this is a material of universal use, out of which the implements of the agriculturist and the tools of the mechanic are made, while the shipping interest consumes it to a very large amount. Now, a system of free trade on our part—reciprocated as it would be by foreign countries—would give the farmers of Pennsylvania a market for their products, of much more value to the State than any benefit the iron-masters can derive from the high duties imposed upon iron.

I must here beg the attention of Senators, particularly those from Kentucky—to another item in the tariff of the last session—the duty upon cotton-bagging, raised to from 50 to 100 per cent., according to the cost of the article, and which should certainly have gone down to 20 per cent. under the pledges of the compromise act. But, at the very moment of violating these pledges, by the act of the last session, which struck a fatal blow at the whole commerce of the cotton States—as if to add a sting to injustice and violated faith, this duty was enhanced beyond the rate imposed by the tariff of 1828. Now, sir, this duty is distinguished from others, as unjust as they are, in this: that the whole of its burden is imposed on the cotton-planters, and its whole benefits upon some twenty-one manufacturers of cotton-bagging. No other class in the country has any interest in it, one way or the other. It is, then, a duty which simply takes money out of the pockets of the planters, to put in the pockets of a few manufacturers of cotton-bagging. Now, sir, when I tell you that the duty on the bagging I annually use to bale my crop exceeds the amount of the taxes I pay to my State, you may form some estimate of its gross injustice—inflicted, I suppose, by the paternal authority of a protecting Government, to punish the planting States for opposing the protective system.

But I can assure the Senators from Kentucky, that, in supporting this, and all other items of protection in the tariff, they are pursuing a suicidal policy as regards the great interests of their State. For, let me tell them that, under the combined influence of interest and indignation, the people of the cotton States are not only making their own bagging out of cotton, but raising their own supplies of live stock. And I can, moreover, assure them, that where they can add one hundred dollars to the demand for their bagging, by this policy, they will diminish the demand for their live stock to the amount of ten thousand. Sir, I confidently believe that Kentucky and all the Northwestern States are as deeply interested in free trade, and the consequent prosperity of the exporting States, as those States themselves. There is the great market for their live stock. And, although the manufacturing States furnish them with scarcely any market at all, they are destroying the prosperity of their best customers, and the price of their own staple of trade, to give bounties to the Eastern manufacturers, at the expense of the great body both of their own producers and consumers. And I will here state, in confirmation of these views, that the price of Kentucky pork in South Carolina, in the last year, sunk down from four to two dollars a hundred—a depression wholly without example.

A few words, Mr. President, as to the mode in which a prohibitive tariff, whether partial or absolute, operates to reduce the value of the staples of exportation—an operation now in active progress. Your tariff, to the amount of its prohibitions, creates a necessity of importing specie to pay for the staples we export. It may be safely assumed that the present tariff excludes twenty-five millions of foreign manufactures, annually, that would be imported under a revenue duty of 20 per cent. This gives rise to the importation of specie to a large amount. Now, every dollar of specie imported, diminishes, in that proportion, the value of the whole mass; and, if we assume that in two or three years the imports beyond the exports would amount to thirty-five millions, our currency being seventy millions, the value of money for all domestic purposes would be depreciated in proportion, and every domestic article increased in its money price. But the very operation which would depreciate the value of specie, and increase money prices here, by draining the specie from the nations of Europe who consume our cotton, would appreciate the value of specie, and depress money prices there. Such was the experience of Great Britain in 1840, from having to export specie to the continent for grain. Now, as the price of the staples of exportation is fixed by the money price abroad—principally in England—it is clear that a prohibitive tariff depresses the price of our staples at home and abroad, while it increases that of every species of protected articles.

Having thus examined the operation of the present tariff as a general burden upon the great consuming interest, and a special one upon the exporting interest, I will say a few words on its operation on the revenue. I have shown that the gross income from imports in New York has been reduced from $1,263,000 in January, to $255,000 in December. If this latter month be assumed as a criterion for the present year, the custom-house at New York will yield only about $3,000,000; and all of them together, probably, not more than six or seven millions. If this falling off in the customs should continue, the Government will have to live principally on loans, or by direct taxes, or come to a stand. As I am sure the country is prepared to sanction neither of these, the only remaining course is to reduce the tariff so as to render it a mere revenue measure; and I confidently believe this would increase the revenue five millions of dollars. Let the average duties be twenty per cent.—none rising above twenty-five per cent.; and I will hazard my reputation on the result. The experienced statesmen of England concur in the opinion that, even there, with a limited coast covered with revenue-cutters, that rate of duty gives indemnity to the smuggler for all his hazards. How much more truly must this be the case here, with our immense maritime and inland frontier, the latter of which offers such temptations and facilities for smuggling from the British provinces?

Then, sir, if we look to the people at large—the wealth of the country, the credit and honor of the Government—every consideration requires us to fulfil the terms of the second resolution, in so modifying the tariff as to reduce it to a fair constitutional measure.

I have occupied the attention of the Senate so long upon these topics, that I shall make but a few very brief remarks upon the third resolution. No reform can be radical which does not reduce the expenditures of the Government. These expenditures have enormously increased since I first entered Congress; and it is almost astounding to look at the progress of this increase in the last twenty years. I will first remark, that the current expenses of this Government since the year 1823—viz: the expenses of the army, the navy, and all the branches of the Government—have increased 100 per cent. But, to give the Senate some idea of this tendency to increase—surpassing that even of the currency—I will call its attention to some of the contingent branches of expenditures: they will serve to illustrate the effects of our system of duties, more than any reasoning. In 1823, the expenses of collecting the customs were $756,000 with a revenue of $19,000,000. In the year 1840, the expenses of collecting the public revenue were $1,542,000, more than double the amount, with a revenue of but $16,000,000. The contingent expenses of Congress for the year 1823 were $50,000. The contingent expenses of the same body for the year 1840 were $276,000—an enormous increase! This serves to illustrate the genius of the times. We are going on in a course of extravagance, the natural result of which must inevitably be the utter destruction of the Government, sinking under its own corruptions.

Mr. President, I have very great doubt (and it has been a subject of consideration with me for many years) whether a free representative Government can permanently exist under any system of indirect taxation. But I have no hesitation in expressing the opinion, that a federal republic like ours, embracing manifold pursuits and conflicting interests, affected by taxation, cannot endure under system of impost duties combining revenue and protection. Such, unfortunately, is our system: and I now propose to show that it renders Congress practically an irresponsible and despotic power, in exercising the greatest and most vital of all the functions of Government—that of imposing the burdens of taxation on the people. To be satisfied, we need only to look around us. Never, since I entered Congress—more than twenty years ago—have I known a time when a fixed majority, which controlled our legislation on the subject of taxation, were not in favor of high duties, and heavy taxation. In this they were sustained, and many of them urged on, by the clamors of their constituents.

Now the apparent anomaly is easily comprehended by those who have studied the philosophy and marked the working of the protective system. It confers bounties, instead of imposing burdens, upon the constituents of those who constitute a legislative majority on all measures in relation to the subject. This majority which impose taxes, so far from contributing to pay them, actually receive the largest portion of them in the shape of bounties. They have a pecuniary interest in the taxes—receiving nine dollars where they pay one, or the Government receives one. Thus, the entire balance of the Government is destroyed. The majority here impose burdens upon those to whom they are not responsible. If we had an equal system of taxation, every member would feel his responsibility to his own constituents, and, through them, to the whole country; as it is, he is not responsible to his constituents for imposing taxes, but for not imposing them. His greatest political offence would be, to reduce taxation. Now, I ask you, what hope is there that economy and retrenchment will ever supersede waste and extravagance while we adhere to the protecting system? We see members of Congress, representing States proverbially economical in the management of their own affairs, voting here for all sorts of extravagant appropriations. Now I invoke Senators to bring their minds to the solemn consideration of this subject. They cannot long evade it.

The welfare of the country, and the very existence of the Government, are involved in it. Let us, then, retrace our steps, and bring back the Government to the good old doctrines of the primitive days of Jefferson. Reduce the duties to a revenue scale; reduce the expenses of the Government to a scale of rigid economy; leave industry unshackled; protect every one from violence and injustice, and leave him to enjoy, undiminished, the fruits of his labor. Do all this, and you will restore the people to prosperity and contentment; restore the credit of the Government, replenish its exhausted treasury; arrest the Government's sinking under its own corruptions, and make it—what our ancestors intended it to be—an example and a light to all the nations of the earth.

SPEECH OF MR. TAPPAN, OF OHIO.

In Senate, January 16, 1843—On the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, so as to limit the term of office of the judges of the supreme and inferior courts, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of both Houses concurring therein,) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the said States, shall be valid as a part of said Constitution; namely:

The judges of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices for the term of seven years, if so long they shall behave themselves well; and the commissions of all judges of said courts who may be in office at the time of the adoption of this amendment shall expire as follows—that is to say: those who shall have been in office twenty years, shall expire in one year; those who have been in office ten years, shall expire in three years; and the commissions of all who have not been in office ten years, shall expire in seven years.

Mr. PRESIDENT: If any man supposes that the Constitution of the United States is so perfect that no alteration in any part of it would make it better, he is as far from truth, in my opinion, as he who seeks to change it to suit the party tactics of the day; and who, finding himself thwarted in some favorite project, by the independent exercise of some constitutional power, should, for that reason, seek to abrogate that power. The Constitution was formed by as wise and patriotic a body of men as ever assembled together; but they were men, who were agreeing upon the mode in which a new and untried experiment in government should be made. With but limited experience in the working of a Government founded on the principle of popular sovereignty, it is astonishing that their work is as perfect as it is; that it is so well adapted "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

But, sir, the Constitution did not come from the hands of its founders perfect in all its parts. The State conventions, in adopting it, recommended many alterations and amendments, which have been agreed to; and other amendments have from time to time been made; so that it is, in many particulars, changed from its original form. It should be further amended, from time to time, as experience may point out its defects; and so as to adapt it more and more to the objects which the States of this Union had in view in establishing it; and especially should it be amended, whenever it is found to contravene those principles upon which our Governments are founded. I think that the Constitution, in establishing the judicial department of our Government, does contravene those fundamental principles. I am satisfied that experience has proved its defects, and that public opinion calls loudly for its amendment. I therefore perform an obvious duty in proposing this resolution.

The Constitution of the United States substantially and practically makes the judges of the United States courts officers for life. In form they are to hold their offices "during good behavior;" they may "be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors;" but no judge "shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members [of the Senate] present" [at his trial.] The power of impeachment has been tried, until it is well settled that no judge can be removed from office in that way. This Senate is a political as well as a judicial body. Our judges are most of them zealous, if not active politicians; and when impeached, find, in more than one-third of the Senate, political friends willing to screen them from punishment. A judge may become insane the day after his nomination is confirmed; and yet he remains a judge for life: no power but death can constitutionally remove him from office. So, if he becomes an habitual drunkard, drunkenness is not technically a crime, or misdemeanor. So it is of many things which disqualify a man from being a judge, and which (if the office were elective) would induce the people to leave him out as totally unfit. They are not impeachable offences, and therefore not sufficient to remove him from office.

To discharge the duties of a judge, it is requisite that the individual should have "a sound mind in a sound body." The duty of a judge cannot be well performed without great labor. There is no occupation of the mind which requires more study. In the prime and vigor of life, this labor may be performed, and its performance may be a pleasure; but your judges grow old, and infirm; neither fit for, nor capable of, the bodily or mental labor exacted by their station. In consideration of this, some States have introduced a limitation of age, and do not allow a judge to remain on the bench after he has arrived at the prescribed time of life. We have no way to get rid of such a judge, but by impeachment.

Many cases have occurred since the adoption of the Federal Constitution, of judges having become unfit to discharge their duties. Two in our history place the operation of the constitutional provision as to tenure of office, in such a strong and absurd point of view, as to justify their special notice. The first is the case of Judge Pickering, formerly of the United States court for the district of New Hampshire. He had become insane by sickness, or intemperance, (it does not appear clearly which,) and was wholly incapable of performing his duty. The people of New Hampshire wished to get rid of the judge, and there was no way in which this could be done, but by impeachment. He could not regularly be impeached, unless he had committed "treason, bribery, or some other high crime or misdemeanor;" all he had done, was, to go on the bench in court time, either insane or drunk, swear some profane oaths, and decide a cause differently from what, by law, it ought to be decided: all this was bad enough; but it would not have happened, if the persons attending the court had conducted with propriety, and had left the judge to hold his court by himself, if they could in no other way prevent such outrageous conduct. But in all this, the judge had committed no impeachable offence. There was no treason or bribery to charge him with; and to determine what were crimes or misdemeanors, it was necessary to examine the statute laws of the United States, and in no other place could a description of them be found; but no law of the United States made it a crime or misdemeanor in a judge to make an erroneous adjudication. Nor did the law declare it a crime to be insane, or drunk, or to use profane language. The United States have no common-law offences, and these were not declared such by statute. This was a sad dilemma for a great nation to be in; but the necessity of getting rid of the judge was imperative, and, instead of taking the straightforward course, and recommending an alteration of this absurd provision of the Constitution, which they had found so mischievous in practice, the House of Representatives exhibited four articles of impeachment against the judge: the three first were for his decisions in a cause on trial before him, which were undoubtedly erroneous, but not criminal; the fourth was for appearing on the bench of his court drunk, and using profane language; which was indeed highly reprehensible, but it was not contrary to law. And there is much reason to doubt whether insanity was not construed drunkenness, from the necessity of the case—it being more plausible ground for impeachment; for it seems, by the proceedings, that it was suggested to the court by a son of the judge, that, at the time of the conduct charged against him, he was insane, and remained so at the time of trial; which suggestion was supported by the testimony of two members of the court, and by the affidavits of several persons whose integrity and veracity were unimpeached. After having this matter before them a year, the Senate at last tried the judge in his absence, found him guilty on all the charges, and removed him from office.

The other case was that of Judge Duvall, of the Supreme Court, who sat on the bench of that court more than ten years after he had become so deaf that he could not hear a word that was spoken in court. If the whole court had been as deaf as Judge Duvall, they must have sat there until death removed them; for, after the farce of removing Judge Pickering, it was not possible to get up and carry through such another perversion of law and justice. Now, if a judge become insane, a drunkard, deaf, superannuated, or in any way incapable of performing his duty, he must remain an incumbent of the office. Let the necessity of getting rid of him be ever so urgent, he cannot be removed by impeachment, for he has committed no crime; and it would not now be suffered that any man should be impeached, and convicted of high crimes and misdemeanors, for acts which no court of law would dare to pronounce such.

The fundamental principle on which society and government repose in these States, is the perfect liberty and equality of our citizens. We adopt in theory, and without any limitation, the doctrine that the sovereign power exists at all times in the whole body of the people; and that so much of that power as the public peace and safety require to be exercised, can only act legitimately when it acts according to their will, as their instrument or servant. The State Governments and the General Government are differently organized, and have different duties to perform; but the same principles are the foundation of all of them in theory: in practice, there have been departures from them—one of which it is the object of this amendment to correct. I believe, sir, that, for the number of our people, we are the strongest Government on earth. We owe this strength to our institutions—to the extent to which, in practice, we carry out our theories of government. And does not this prove that it will add to our security and strength to conform the practice of our State and National Governments entirely to the principles we profess? For myself, I declare freely, that I have no doubt it would add greatly to our security in "the enjoyment of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," and strengthen our Government much more, to have the exercise of all power more immediately by the people, in the election of all officers (judicial, as well as executive and legislative) for short periods of time, and by direct vote of the people.

Government, with us, is a practical science; so that there is little or no danger that theories will stand their ground long, unless they are tested and approved by experience. If our Government, instead of being spread over a continent, was in cluded in a small territory, the inhabitants of which could meet with convenience in one assembly, to consult and agree on the manner in which their affairs should be conducted, no delegation of legislative power would be necessary; but, even then, the executive and judicial powers of such a community could not, with as much convenience, be exercised by the whole body of the people; and, therefore, the plan of delegating such powers to individuals, selected for their fitness to discharge such duties, would be adopted. Such has been the course of action of democratic communities in all ages. Power has been delegated from necessity, and always for short periods. Of the executive power of states, it is true that it has much oftener been held by usurpation, and force, or hereditary descent, than by delegation, in all Governments but our own. But the judicial power has, in all states, free or otherwise, been delegated by the sovereign for limited periods—generally not exceeding a year. I need not cite instances of such limited delegation of judicial power; history gives an account of no other. No nation or government ever made their judges entirely independent of themselves, until these States established their judicial tribunals.

We borrow, Mr. President, many of our fashions from England; but in giving our judges office during good behavior, removable only by impeachments, for high crimes or misdemeanors, we have committed a folly beyond what England or any other nation has given an example of. In England, at least from the time of the conquest, judges were appointed by the King, and held their offices during his pleasure. Their courts were often made the instruments of gross and outrageous tyranny—particularly under the Tudors; they became much more so under the Stuarts. This race of imbecility and vice (from the tyranny of whom our forefathers fled to America) exercised such a constant controlling power over their judges, and so openly dictated to them the judgments they rendered in prosecutions for political offences, that the impression became strong in the colonies in favor of a judiciary which should be independent of the appointing power. The same feeling had been created in England; so that at the revolution of 1688 the judges of England were made independent of the crown, by the enactment that they should hold their offices "so long as they should behave themselves well," but to be at all times removable by vote of both Houses of Parliament; so that every judge in that Government, since the revolution under William and Mary, has been dependent upon, and held his office at the will and pleasure of, the sovereign power in the state; for the Parliament in that Government is not only held to be omnipotent, but is, practically, the sovereign power.

In forming the Federal Constitution, the tenure of judicial office seems to have been settled without debate, and without much consideration; and we are left to conjecture why the great men who composed the convention went so much beyond every other Government in creating a judiciary. Mr. Hamilton, in discussing this subject in the Federalist, states the desire the convention had to establish independent courts; but he gives no reason why the convention deemed it necessary to establish a judiciary who were not to be removed from office for any cause of disqualification whatever, unless they were convicted of a high crime or misdemeanor, by a court so constituted as to render a conviction impossible. I consider this part of our Constitution grossly defective. It is worse than defective; it is a provision in direct opposition to the whole spirit and intention of our Government; a power in the state holding office independent of the people—existing, as Mr. Burke said of the nobility of England, in contempt of the people.

I have not offered this amendment, Mr. President, from any view of its effecting the removal of incapable incumbents of office. If I had, I might refer Senators to the judges in this District, for an illustration of the monstrous folly of creating an independent judiciary upon the plan of the Federal Constitution. No, sir: it is not because A, B, or C is weak or wicked, that I press this amendment; it is because its direct and inevitable tendency is to create imbecility, and perpetuate ignorance.

Men never have exerted themselves to acquire knowledge, or to be eminently useful to mankind, without the stimulus of ambition or necessity. Let your soldiers understand that no service they can perform will raise them from the ranks, or secure them anything beyond their monthly pay—they may stand firm in battle; they may perform the usual routine of their duty; but this is all. If you would incite to heroism; you must hold out the incentive to heroic action—honors, rewards, promotion. How is it with your judge? What inducement has he to acquire knowledge, to make himself useful to his country? None whatever. He has an office for life, with a competent salary, which no power can diminish. He may be as idle and careless as he pleases; he may sell off his library, and forswear study; he may become imbecile and childish, or wicked and immoral; and he cannot be removed from office, unless he commits some high crime or misdemeanor. He has nothing more to expect. By our habits, a judge is not considered eligible as a candidate for any other office. Some gentlemen of the Supreme Court have, by themselves or friends, made, occasionally, feeble attempts to become candidates for the Presidency; but it is very clear that no such attempt can succeed. They must resign, and come without the charmed circle of judicial independence, before they can be on an equality, in this respect, with their fellow-citizens. He is like the soldier, who, by the usage of the service, can never become a captain. He may perform his circle of duty, and nothing more.

In an office which would seem to require more laborious study to qualify a man for the discharge of its duties than any other in our Government, you have made his continuance in office to have no dependence whatever on his industry or learning. "I have been appointed" (I have heard a judge say) "for the learning I had, not for what I was expected to acquire." The judge performs his part of the contract with good faith if he does not become more ignorant, stupid, and vicious, as he grows older. Why is it that our chief executive officers are elected for short periods, but because reason and experience prove it necessary to secure the faithful performance of their duties, that they should be kept in constant dependence on the people? We would not have presidents or governors elected for life, or even for a long term of years; because it has been found unsafe and dangerous to intrust men with irresponsible power. It is as necessary to have wise and good men to expound, as to execute your laws. Like causes will always produce like effects. If it would be likely to corrupt the character, and destroy the usefulness of a president, to give him office for life, why would it not have the same effect upon a chief justice? If providing one with an office for life, with an ample salary, which cannot be diminished during his continuance in office, would render him an unsafe depositary of power in a free Government, why would it not the other? In both cases, the officer would have nothing more to expect from the people; it would, therefore, be altogether indifferent to him whether they were pleased with his conduct or not. The danger of removal is nothing, and to be left out is impossible to the judge; and yet you expect that he will be faithful to the Constitution; that he will be a vigilant guardian of public liberty, and feel a common sympathy with his countrymen in the support and maintenance of free principles of government.

Mr. President, the article in our Constitution which I seek to amend is utterly repugnant to, and at variance with, not only our principles of government, that the people are the sovereign power, but it is equally repugnant to our practice in every other office. All other officers—executive and legislative—in the Federal and State Governments, are elected periodically. And for what reason are they so elected? Because, in no other way yet discovered can the Commonwealth be sure of being constantly served by the most capable men. All officers of Government are servants of the sovereign; but, in these United States, the freest country on earth, we have invented a plan by which the public servant is altogether above his master, and accountable to no one for his conduct. The only person who is free from all responsibility, independent of all control, is the judge. It was the intention of the convention which formed the Constitution to establish an independent judiciary, say the defenders of this article. "A judiciary, independent of a king or executive alone, is a good thing; but independence of the will of the nation is a solecism, at least in a Republican Government," says Mr. Jefferson. Of what, it may be asked, was it the intention of the convention to render the judges independent? By adequate salaries their pecuniary independence may be secured; but office for life does not secure them from private and personal influences. They will have as strong political attachments as other men; and they will make their judicial action subservient to party purposes, if so disposed, the more readily, as they are in no danger of loss by it. Office for life place them above or beyond the influence of personal prejudices for or against those who may be suitors in this court? Most certainly it will not; but it will leave them free to indulge such prejudices to any extent.

This clause of the Constitution was inserted by the enemies of free government—by those who did not believe in the people governing themselves—who wanted to build up some power in the State which should exist and act independent of the will of the people, and should also control that will. The real friends of freedom in the convention—the majority—were deceived by the notion of an independent judiciary, without seeing clearly of what it was sought to render judges independent, and without reflecting upon the inevitable consequences of building up in the State a power not independent, but really hostile to its fundamental principles.

"The judicial power" (says Mignet) "may be temporary when it is derived from the people, because, being dependent on all, it is dependent on no one."

The two great parties that exist in all free governments (which may justly, and without offence to any one, be styled the conservative and the movement parties,) had their representatives in the convention which formed the Federal Constitution, as they have their representatives now in Congress. It was this conservative party which wanted an Executive and Senate for life, and which obtained a judiciary, that, from its organization, naturally belongs to them. With the fact that the judiciary are of the conservative party, I find no fault: if the majority of the people are of that party. But, if the conservative party in our Government is in a minority, (as it has been most of the time since the adoption of the Constitution) then the arrangement which gives to that minority the whole judicial power of the nation is extremely unjust; it is what the majority ought not for a day to submit to. If the conservative party persuade a majority of the people of the United States to adopt and act on their theories of government, they can, on my principles, elect a judiciary to please them, and I will be content; but I cannot consent that their influence should be made perpetual in any department of the Government, whatever may be the fluctuation of parties. We have seen the consequences which have resulted from a conservative judiciary opposed to a majority of the nation in political principles. More than two generations of men have passed off the stage while the late Mr. Marshall was chief justice of the United States; he and his brethren were Federalists or conservatives, liberal constructionists, and interpreted the Constitution in a way to strengthen and consolidate the Federal power; while the executive and legislative officers, and a great majority of the people of the United States, were of the movement party—were Democrats, and in favor of a strict construction of the Constitution, and of preserving to the State Governments every power not expressly delegated to the General Government. The judiciary of the United States, (says Mr. Jefferson,)

"Is the subtle corps of sappers and miners, constantly working under ground to undermine the foundations of our confederated fabric. They are construing our Constitution from a co-ordination of a general and special Government to a general and supreme one alone. This will lay all things at their feet, and they are too well versed in English law to forget the maxim "Boni judicis est ampliare jurisdictionem."

After the election of Mr. Jefferson, the judiciary of the United States ceased to be the representative or servant of the people in our courts; but it was the faithful representative of exploded principles and obselete maxims in government. It perpetuated the power of the Federal or conservative party, and gave them, though a small minority in the nation, the whole judicial power. Equally wrong would it have been in principle, had all this been reversed—had the court been of the Democratic or movement party, and the majority of the people of the Federal or conservative; because, in such case, as in the real one, they would not have been the true exponents of the public will on the bench of justice. As well might we allow a foreign Government to appoint our judges, as to allow a generation of men to appoint them, who, with all their principles of government, have departed from the stage of human action.

Our Constitution gives men a power after death, (permitted, to a certain extent, over property,) for reasons wholly inapplicable to a Government such as ours professes to be. On this part of our system, I will again call your attention to Mr. Jefferson's opinions, in his letter to Mr. Barry:

"We already see (says he) the power installed for life, responsible to no authority, (for impeachment is not even a scarecrow,) advancing, with a noiseless and steady pace, to the great object of consolidation. The foundations are already deeply laid, by their decisions, for the annihilation of constitutional State rights, and the removal of every check, every counterpoise to the ingulfing power, of which themselves are to make a sovereign part. If ever this vast country is brought under a single Government, it will be one of the most extensive corruption, indifferent, and incapable of a wholesome care over so wide a spread of surface. This will not be borne; and you will have to choose between reformation and revolution. If I know the spirit of this country, the one or the other is inevitable. Before the cancer is become inveterate, before its venom has reached so much of the body politic as to get beyond control, remedy should be applied. Let the future appointments of judges be for four or six years, and renewable by the President and Senate. This will bring their conduct, at regular periods, under revision and probation, and may keep them in equipoise between the General and special Governments. We have erred in this point, by copying England; where, certainly, it is a good thing to have the judges independent of the King. But we have omitted to copy their caution also, which makes a judge removable on the address of both legislative houses. That there should be public functionaries independent of the nation, whatever may be their demerit, is a solecism in a Republic of the first order of absurdity and inconsistency."

I agree that it is essential to a correct administration of justice, that judges should be independent men. The Constitution proceeds on the hypothesis, that independence in men is a quality which can be created by legislation. It assumes, by giving office for life, to create wisdom and virtue, and give them certain duration; but this hypothesis is proved false by the common sense and experience of mankind. The independent man—or, in other words, the just and upright man—is not made so by operation of law, but by careful training from infancy, aided by a happy temperament. A man whose habits of thinking and acting are loose and vicious, cannot be transformed into a fit man for a judge, by giving him office for life, with any amount of salary. The independence the Constitution gives to judges, has an almost irresistible tendency to make them worthless; and, if such has not been the effect upon our judges, it is because they have been men of uncommon strength and energy of character. I assert that the best possible way of securing good judges is to have them elected by the people for short periods. If they are constantly dependent on the people, they will endeavor to make themselves acceptable to the people; and how is this to be done? What judges are the most popular everywhere? Are they those who are believed to take bribes? are they those who are known to be under the influence of other men, whose decisions are always governed by personal considerations? Are they not, on the contrary, those men whom the public believe to be disinterested, free from prejudice, free from personal or party influence? And if so, will not a dependence on the people, by compelling judges to seek popularity, compel them to take that course which will secure popularity? I hold that judge to be a fool, sir, who does not make it the great object of all his labors to acquire popularity; to gain the good opinion of his cotemporaries, "that his name may be honored in the land."

It is a great mistake to make our judges independent of the people; but it is a mistake made by all the States who formed constitutions for their government, during or at the close of the Revolution, as well as by the convention which formed the Federal Constitution. They knew from history the danger of the judicial tribunals being dependent on weak and profligate princes, and supposed that, to render them independent, it was necessary to place them above the power of the people. On this subject, it is very evident that the people of the United States have changed their opinion; they have experienced the evils which have resulted from making judges permanent, and are from time to time changing their constitutions in respect to their courts, while the new States commence their Government upon the more correct principles. Eleven States now elect their judges for limited periods of time—Pennsylvania, fifteen years; Arkansas, eight years; Maine, New Jersey, Ohio, Indiana, Alabama, and Michigan, seven years; Mississippi, six years; Georgia, three years; Vermont, one year; Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Delaware, New York, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Kentucky, Tennessee, Louisiana, and Missouri, during good behavior. In some of these latter States, judges are removable on an address of three-fourths; in others, of two-thirds of both Houses of their Legislatures; and even in Rhode Island, where no one has looked lately for any improvement in government, the dominant party, in making their new constitution, have been so far controlled by the common sense of the country, and the example set them by some of the other States, as to place their judges altogether in the power of the people, by making them removable at every annual election, by a majority of the legislative body, although in form they hold their offices during good behavior.

I do not expect, Mr. President, that a majority of this body will now vote for this amendment of the Constitution; and I have not offered it with any hope of such result. I offer it to call public attention to the subject. Our courts of justice, particularly the United States courts, are not much known and observed by the people; for it is but a small proportion of our citizens who see these courts as suitors, witnesses, or jurors; and great abuses might prevail in them, and be long continued, unless the attention of the people was called to them by some such proposition as I have now made—a proposition which I shall continue to make while I have the honor of a seat in this body, unless its adoption shall relieve me from the performance of that duty.

SPEECH OF MR. LINN,

OF MISSOURI.

In Senate, January 26, 1843—In reply to Mr. McDUFFIE, on the Oregon bill.

Mr. LINN said the opposition to the measure which he had had the honor of introducing, had confined itself, except on the part of the Senators from South Carolina, to the grant of lands. One of those Senators made that his chief objection; but was averse, in addition, to all present action upon the matter. The other, who spoke yesterday, [Mr. McDUFFIE,] took still wider ground—blamed the bill as to all its incidental parts, as well as its objects, and declared his fixed repugnance, not only to this scheme of settlement, but to all expansion of our population whatever. Certain remarks of the latter eloquent Senator demand a particular reply; and, in answering them, if I can sufficiently, I shall have met whatever else has been further objected to the bill.

It is with a want of consideration, of meditation, and preparation of the measure, that he more directly taxes it. To this objection, the history of the bill, and of its repeated introduction here, is the best answer. The measure was first introduced some twenty-two years ago, in the House of Representatives. It has, therefore, had all the time necessary to reach the legal age of discretion. A bill of like form and objects was urged again upon Congress in 1823, with much ability and research, by a distinguished member, (the late Governor Floyd,) one of whose favorite objects it continued to be up to the close of his honorable congressional career. Though he did not induce the Legislature to embrace his views, yet the measure commanded the attention of President Monroe, and was strongly recommended in his last annual message. His successor, (Mr. Adams,) in like manner, viewed it as a proper part of our national policy, and pressed it upon the attention of Congress. This was followed up by two reports from the accomplished pen of Mr. Baylies in support of the President's recommendation. In 1828, it was once more introduced, in a regular legislative form, by Governor Floyd, and passed the House of Representatives by a large majority, but failed in the Senate by a plurality of two votes. Since then, it has repeatedly, in one form or another, been the subject of executive attention and legislative discussion.

In 1836, Mr. Slacum, a young gentleman admirably fitted for this difficult service, was commissioned by General Jackson to examine the country, and report upon its inducements to occupation, state of the fur trade, commercial advantages, &c. The information which that gentleman personally collected was placed before Congress in 1838. In the mean time, (October, 1837,) during the extra session, I made a call upon the Executive for whatever it could communicate, in its possession, upon this interesting subject. The answer, besides other matter, brought us, at the regular session, the report of Mr. Slacum of his several journeys and voyages from Mexico to California, to the Sandwich Islands, and to the Territory of Oregon. I then moved the reference of the whole subject to the Committee on Foreign Relations, which was then opposed strenuously by gentlemen who are now in favor of its reference to that committee. Finding this opposition, I moved its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs, which was also strenuously opposed by all who took any part in the debate. It seemed to be the opinion of the Senate, that it should be referred to neither of the committees, but that it appropriately belonged to a select committee; which was accordingly adopted. Being the author of the proposition in regard to the Territory of Oregon, I was selected as the chairman of that committee. On the 6th of June, 1838, the committee submitted a report, accompanied by a bill.

While these proceedings were going on in the Senate, Mr. CUSHING, a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the House of Representatives, presented the question to that body, followed up by a report made by him—a report which, it may be said with truth, exhausted the subject. Neither the Senate nor House bill was reached that session. Then came the Maine boundary excitement, and the political and party agitation of the years 1839 and 1840, in the midst of which there was so little hope of commanding the attention of Congress in a measure in no manner connected with the presidential election, that it was thought unnecessary to press it upon the consideration of the Senate. Notwithstanding this, I was not unmindful of its importance; and in January, 1840,* a resolution was, at my instance, sent to the War Department, as to the expediency of a line of military posts extending to the Rocky Mountains, upon which a favorable report was returned by Mr. Poinsett. That report I have already had the honor to cite to the Senate in my opening remarks upon this bill, when it first came up for consideration this session. When next I brought it forward, the foreign negotiations with Lord Ashburton, which ended in the late treaty, were about to be set on foot; and I was urged by all political parties not to embroil them with another difficulty, by a renewed effort to bring about the occupation of the territory. To these wishes I reluctantly yielded, consenting to wait for the results of the promised diplomacy. That diplomacy has suffered the occasion to pass almost without an allusion to the subject; and still, as before, the cry is, "Not now! wait a little longer! presently! By-and-by we are certain to bring the whole business happily through, if you will not press it now!" Such has ever been the encouragement, or the argument, with which the measure has, for above twenty years, been met; and the Senator from South Carolina will, therefore, see that the purpose has been pursued with everything that could give it forecast, and that no indiscreet measure or issue has been pressed against Great Britain, or urged upon the Senate. It has been held back not only until it became, in point of time, appropriate, but indispensable, if we are ever to accomplish the object at which we aim.

The main subject was urged on the attention of Congress in President Tyler's first annual message, where it is also strongly sustained by the auxiliary reports of the Secretaries of War and the Navy; and the same recommendation was once more presented to Congress in the reports of Secretaries Spencer and Upshur, at the beginning of this session. The country is indebted to Mr. Pendleton for an excellent report in 1842, to the House of Representatives, accompanying a bill even stronger than the one now under discussion.

This succinct history of the measure must certainly acquit the committee of any indiscreet haste, any inconsiderateness, any precipitateness of plunging Congress into premature debate, or a rash issue with Great Britain; particularly as both Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison had originally been in favor of some action.

As to the apprehended effects of debate here, the Senator, I think, exaggerates to himself the national irritation which may be so produced. Great Britain—herself accustomed to the most unrestrained parliamentary discussion—surely better understands how debate, and the heats into which it naturally runs, are to be viewed. It is by our action—not our speeches—that Great Britain will be influenced. I shall therefore continue to speak, as I have spoken, freely; well convinced that what we say of her here will be of no more serious consequence in London, than what she says of us, in her legislative wrangling, is of weighty influence upon us.

*About the same period, I introduced another resolution in the Senate, calling for further information from the State Department. In reply to which, Mr. Greenhow's admirable Memoir, Historical, Political, and Geographical, of the Northwest Coast, and drawn up at the request of Mr. Forsyth, was sent in; and 3,000 copies were printed by order of the Senate. Mr. Greenhow's Memoir contains the most careful and correct information that could be obtained up to that period, including even the best British authorities; and it clearly proves, beyond all possibility of doubt or cavil, that the title of the United States to the country is incontrovertible.

I understand the Senator's objections to the bill to be three-fold: first, that it would, in its main provisions, be an infraction of the conventions of 1818 and 1827; secondly, that, when carried into effect, it must plunge us into all the expense of a remote military occupation; thirdly, that the territory itself is valueless, and must prove a disadvantage, not only through the enormous expense it must entail upon us, but by dispersing our population, from whose concentration alone a progressive and an elevated civilization is to be expected.

The Senator will pardon me if I say that the entire scope of his remarks yesterday proves him greatly to undervalue a territory as yet little known in his quarter. There is a mass of documentary information in regard to it, in which I am compelled to suppose him not versed. Even putting these minuter facts out of view, however, and supposing its surface steril, there are in its favor high and obvious elements of commercial value, of future commercial greatness, which I thought certain to strike a mind as capable as his of embracing these important considerations. It is plainly, at no distant day, the destined avenue of a great trade from all our territories to the Pacific and the East. Nor does he less overlook its present and past importance. The inertness of our policy has already forfeited to us more than ten millions of legitimate trade. By the sheer neglect of our Government, our fur-trade on that coast—formerly affording at least half a million—has been suffered, under the operation of the existing treaty, to dwindle to some two thousand dollars a year. Examine, sir, the returns of our fur-trade, from the first settlement on the Columbia, by Astor, down to the present time; and you will find that it has sunk to the paltry amount I have mentioned, and that all the auxiliary commerce which was connected with it—the trade from that coast to China—is extinct.

These are matters easily established by documentary evidence before me, so copious that I dare not tax the patience of the Senate with its reading. I will venture only to cite a single document and letter, addressed to me by Mr. Pierce, while engaged in this trade of the Northwest:

"BOSTON, May 1, 1842.

"SIR: Thinking it may be interesting or important to you to know of some of the late operations and present plans of the British Hudson Bay Company in the North Pacific ocean, I beg leave to present to your notice some facts in relation to the same, and which have come to my knowledge from personal observation, or from sources entitled to the fullest credit.

"All that extensive line of coast comprehending the Russian possessions on the northwest coast of America, from Mount St. Elias south to the latitude of 54 deg. 40 min. north, (the last being the boundary line between the Russian and American territories,) together with the sole and exclusive right or privilege of frequenting all ports, bays, sounds, rivers, &c. within said territory, and establishing forts and trading with the Indians, has been leased or granted by the Russian-American Fur Company to the British Hudson Bay Company for the term of ten years from January, 1842, and for which the latter are to pay, annually, four thousand fur seal skins, or the value thereof in money, at the rate of thirty-two shillings each—say £6,400 sterling, or $30,720.

"In the abovenamed lease the Russians have, however, reserved to themselves the island of Sitka, or New Archangel; in which place, you probably are aware, the Russians have a large settlement—the depot and headquarters of their fur trade with the Fox islands, Aleutian islands, and the continental shore westward of Mount St. Elias. All the trading establishments of the Russians lately existing at Tumgass Stickene, and other places within said territory, leased to the Hudson Bay Company, have of consequence been broken up. Thus the Hudson Bay Company, not content with monopolizing the heretofore profitable trade of the Americans, of supplying the Russian settlements on the Northwest coast, have now completely cut them off also from all trade with the most valuable fur regions in the world.

"Whether the arrangements made between the Russians and English, above alluded to, are conformable to the treaties existing between the United States on the one part, and those nations respectively on the other, I leave to your better knowledge to determine.

"With the doings of the Hudson Bay Company at Puget's sound and the Columbia river you are doubtless fully informed; those, however, lately commenced by them in California will admit of my saying a few words.

"At San Francisco they have purchased a large house, as a trading establishment and depot for merchandise; and they intend this year to have a place of the same kind at each of the principal ports in Upper California. Two vessels are building in London, intended for the same trade—that is, for the coasting trade; and, after completing their cargoes, to carry them to England. These things, with others, give every indication that it is the purpose of the Hudson Bay Company to monopolize the whole hide and tallow trade of the coast of California—a trade which now employs more than half a million of American capital.

"At the Sandwich Islands the company have a large trading establishment, and have commenced engaging in the commerce of the country, with evident designs to monopolize it if possible, and to drive off the Americans who have heretofore been its chief creators and conductors.

"I have been informed by one of the agents of the Hudson Bay Company that the agricultural and commercial operations of the English at Puget's sound, Columbia river, California, and Sandwich Islands, are carried on, not actually by the Hudson Bay Company, but by what may be termed a branch of it—by gentlemen who are the chief members and stockholders of said company, and who have associated themselves under the firm of Pelby, Simpson, & Co. in London, and with a capital of more than $15,000,000.

"Seeing these companies, then, marching with iron footsteps to the possession of the most valuable portion of country in the Northern Pacific; and considering, too, the immense amount of their capital, the number, enterprise, and energy of their agents, and the policy pursued by them, great reason is there to fear that American commerce in that part of the world must soon lower its flag. But, sir, it is to be hoped that our Government will soon do something to break up the British settlements in the Oregon Territory, and thereby destroy the source from which now emanate the most dire evils to American interests in the Western world. In the endeavor to bring about that desirable object, you have done much; and every friend to his country, every person interested in the commerce of the Pacific, must feel grateful for the valuable services rendered them by you.

"With great respect, your obedient servant,

"HENRY A. PIERCE."

The Senator from Kentucky gave the other day a very striking sketch of the vast and widespread operations of the Hudson Bay Company. They may be yet more visibly traced in a map of their possessions before me. Here Senators may cast their eyes over a territory, stretching from the bay of the north Atlantic which has lent its name to the association, to the Pacific and the borders of Mexico. Over this wide dominion, dotted with their frequent forts, settlements, and factories, and over its many Indian tribes, they hold undisputed rule, as complete as was ever exercised in Hindostan by the great company which was the skilful instrument of England in seizing upon her present empire there. The red spots on this map designate the various forts; the others, the settlements of the company's retired servants.

What landmarks, what signs of dominion or possession, has this Government affixed to the soil? None. How have your claims been vindicated? What care have you had of even the subordinate matter of your trade, usually not slighted by actively commercial nations? Your fur trade, as I have said, is gone; that with the Russian possessions has been suffered to pass into foreign hands; that with the Sandwich Islands lies at the mercy of your watchful rival; and not a step is taken to stay her encroachments upon your soil, or her inroads upon your commerce!

It is not, sir, because I am a Western man, or because my immediate constituents take a deep concern in this matter, that I urge it. I regard it only as a national question. It is as a great and acknowledged interest of the whole Union that I would preserve it, let it directly benefit what section of the country it may. Nothing local, nothing sectional, enters into my feelings, or shall sway my judgment. I view it—and trust that every other Senator will view it—only in its broader relations to the whole country, and have aimed to treat it only in that way.

In regard to the particular interests involved in the question, I could read many documents, with which I will not weary the attention of the Senate. They will permit me, however, to cite from the excellent report of Mr. Pendleton to the other House, the following important letter of Captain Spalding, of the ship Lausanne, of New York, addressed to myself:

"At present, the company cultivate about three thousand acres of land, and raise about eighteen thousand bushels of wheat, fourteen thousand bushels of potatoes, three thousand bushels of pease, and have both flour and saw-mills; they have seven thousand head of cattle, two thousand sheep, hogs, &c., and have engaged to supply the Russians with eight thousand bushels of wheat annually, and I do not know how many thousand pounds of butter at 6d. sterling per pound; they have a large number of men in their employ, four ships, two schooners, and a steamboat; they have several forts on the south side of the Columbia, and take out of the river probably not less than five hundred thousand dollars in value per annum; while our Government remains perfectly passive and unconcerned. I must confess, when I saw all this, I felt ashamed that I was an American. I am convinced that not another nation under heaven would submit to it, or could be so negligent of the interests of its people. The company have all the cattle, sheep, &c., but will not sell to a settler a single cow or a sheep; they will, I believe, sometimes sell a pig, but nothing else alive—not even a hen; nothing that breathes. They have now contracted to supply the Russians at Sitka, and all the northern parts, with goods of all kinds that the Russians require at twenty five per cent. advance on the London invoice, to be delivered at the ports where they are wanted, without charge for freight or expense of any kind; thus driving the Americans off the coast. It is also well understood that they purpose taking possession of the Sandwich Islands, which the British Government claim under an old grant from Tamaahmaah. There is too good reason to believe (indeed the opinion is prevalent at Oregon) that the grasping ambition of the British will not with all this be satisfied, but that they intend to add even California to their possessions; meaning and intending thereby to obtain possession of the bay of San Francisco, which is decidedly the best place on the whole west coast of America for a naval depot, and where the combined navies of the whole world could anchor with perfect safety; being accessible at all times for vessels of any draught of water.

"The colony from the United States is situated on the Wallamet, a branch of the Columbia, about ninety miles from the mouth of the river, which is, undoubtedly, the finest grazing and wheat country in Oregon. At present, it consists of about seventy families, who raise considerable grain, and have about three thousand head of cattle. The mission last year raised one thousand bushels of wheat, and made butter, cheese, &c., enough for their own use. They have five hundred head of cattle and two hundred horses, and last year they sowed four hundred bushels of wheat, one hundred and twenty bushels of pease, and planted a large quantity of potatoes and vegetables of all descriptions. They have hogs, poultry, &c., in abundance. Last year they raised over fifteen hundred bushels of potatoes. The extent of the country comprising the Wallamet Valley is about three hundred miles long and two hundred broad, interspersed with ravines of wood, generally of sufficient quantities for fuel and fencing. The land in its natural state is usually ready for the plough, and is very fertile, producing from twenty-five to forty bushels of wheat to the acre; and the climate is so mild that the cattle subsist in the fields without fodder or shelter of any kind being prepared or provided for them through the winter. Salmon can be taken in the Wallamet falls (which, however, the British have taken possession of, and compelled our people to build their mills on the falls above) with little trouble, from May to September in almost any quantity. I have no hesitation in saying that ten thousand barrels might be taken per annum. Probably no place in the world offers greater inducements for emigrants. Provisions might readily be procured to support one thousand emigrants at any time. Flour was this season high, in consequence of a want of mills—a difficulty that is now obviated by the erection of two new ones, viz. one by Mr. McKay, and one by the mission; as also two saw-mills. Wheat is nominally worth one dollar per bushel, beef six cents per pound, pork ten, cows fifty dollars each, oxen sixty, horses thirty-five. Potatoes and

This table, exhibiting a gradually diminishing trade in furs, from the period that the hunting and trading of British subjects in Oregon was authorized by the convention of 1818, is the best commentary upon the principles and provisions of that convention. Individual disinterestedness or generosity may surrender to general participation the advantages and privileges of an exclusive right; but the wiser, safer, and more general rule of national action, is in every grant to demand an equivalent. The convention of 1818, was a departure from this salutary rule, and its consequences we read in the above table—the uncompensated transfer to the Hudson Bay Company of all that trade which our own citizens have lost. This simple statement affords a lesson by which we shall do well to profit in time, before our own indifference, forbearance, and neglect shall render utterly worthless the object for which we have so long contended. If the successful and beneficial assertion of our right shall ever be made, it must be made now. Further acquiescence in the exclusive possession of the Hudson Bay Company, (for north of the Columbia, it is in fact exclusive,) if not an absolute surrender of our claim, is what is almost equivalent to it—an abandonment of the game, which constitutes its principal value, to the annihilation of thriftless hunting and indiscriminate slaughter.

From six to eight hundred men annually go to the Rocky Mountains, on hunting and trading expeditions who collect a large amount of furs; the value of which, however, the committee has no means of ascertaining with any degree of accuracy. This trade would greatly and rapidly increase under the protection which the contemplated posts will afford.

about twenty-five cents per bushel. Labor is worth about thirty-five dollars per month, the laborer being found by his employer." * *

I have repeatedly alluded to the commercial and territorial cupidity of the Hudson Bay Company, its unjust encroachments, its unhesitating rapacity, the spoliations of our legitimate trade, and even the murders which have tracked its course as a company. But, in simple justice, let me say that these acts and this character belong to them only in a corporate capacity. As individuals, many of them are men highly humane and honorable. It is abundantly known, in particular, that there lives not a more generous, benevolent, and kind-hearted gentleman than Dr. McLaughlin, the individual at the head of the company's affairs on the Columbia. His acts of voluntary kindness towards our citizens; his courtesy towards whomsoever of our officers or public agents may have visited that country; the ready and liberal good offices which he has ever extended wherever they were needed, do him him great honor, and should not be mentioned without thanks. I make, then, my charges against the collective company and its policy, not the individuals of whom it is made up. Let me, on the other hand, as freely remark, without desiring to diminish anything from this individual praise, that, as a company, they can well afford to be generous to us of the fruits of our own soil. An annual half million in the fur-trade may well mitigate a good many national prejudices. Out of an abundance which should be ours, they may well dispense some hospitality to our citizens and accredited agents. For training on their savage dependants to waylay our wanderers, to burn our settlements, to exterminate the settler, to shut out our traders from all participation in their traffic, these civilities are, after all, but a cheap equivalent. True it is, however, that in the former rivalry between the two companies, before they were merged into one, they were as rapacious and as sanguinary towards each other. And why should they be more just or more merciful towards an alien race?

Of these deeds the Senator from South Carolina may have some recollection, and of the time when, in their contest for the supremacy of that region, the employees of the two companies were led on to mutual outrages as detestable as any to which they now jointly instigate the savages against our helpless citizens and traders. He may perhaps recall the tragedies of 1819; when the Northwest Company made regular war upon that of Hudson Bay, to drive them from the trade; pitched battles being fought as between two fierce Indian tribes, with a loss of twenty men in a single affair—Governor Semple and Mr. Kevenny (another leading man) perishing in the contest.

I surely have not need to urge that they whom the sordid love of gain could thus urge to imbrue their hands in the blood of brother Englishmen, would little hesitate to inflame the natural antipathies of the savage, and turn his secondary ferocity to an easy and a general instrument for effecting those dark deeds by which the citizens of a rival power were to be put out of the way when they came between them and their gains.

I do not speak idly of these matters, but hold in my hand reports of men who personally knew the influence and the arts practised against us: such men as Governors Clarke and Cass, whose judgments and knowledge in Indian affairs were beyond dispute. They show that, up to 1829, at least five hundred of our people have been destroyed in this way, and that the rate of subsequent destruction has not changed. All the evidence shows that, wherever the British fur-trade is pushed, the Indians are subsidized. The terms of that subsidy have an index in the murders committed on our people. Trace up the butcheries in the Rocky Mountains and their plains, the ravages of our exposed settlements, and you will find them uniformly committed by Indians clad in British blankets and armed with British tomahawks and scalping-knives. Is not this proof enough for whom this work of blood is done? How long, sir, shall this innocent blood of your citizens call to you in vain? How long shall it be before you interpose to arrest these crimes? Are the lawful pursuits of your people to be thus left the spoil and the prey of foreign rapacity? Does not the very treaty which is so often pleaded, declare these pursuits legitimate; or is it, then, but an idle form? If legitimate, you are bound to protect your citizens who engage in it; and the question of its greater or less profitableness than other occupations, is not one to be considered, except by those who engage in it. The Senator from South Carolina, to disparage the trade, said yesterday that few men have grown rich in it. Now I apprehend that, comparing great things with small, his remark is equally true of manufactures. In these, what a disproportion between the few capitalists who get rich, and the multitudes of poor operatives who never can? It is but the same thing in either pursuit: the operatives amass not the splendid fortunes, nor does every hunter and trapper become a John Jacob Astor. Chance or taste leads them to adopt that pursuit; and it forms one of those national interests which we are bound to protect, in common with even the humblest branch of your industry or commerce. Whenever your sails whiten the sea, in no matter what clime, against no matter whom, the national arm stretches out its protection. Everywhere but in this unhappy territory, the persons and the pursuits of your citizens are watched over. You count no cost when other interests are concerned, when other rights are assailed; but you recoil here from a trifling appropriation to an object of the highest national importance, because it enlists no sectional influence. Contrast, for instance, your supineness about the Oregon Territory with your alacrity to establish, for guarding the slave coast and Liberia, a squadron costing $600,000 annually, and which you have bound yourself by treaty to keep up for five years, with great exposure of lives and vessels. By stipulation, eighty guns (one-twelfth of your force afloat) is kept upon this service; and, as your naval expenditure amounts to about seven millions a year, this (its twelfth part) will make, in five years, three millions bestowed in watching the coast of Africa, and guarding the freedom of the negro race! For this you lavish millions; and you grudge $100,000 to the great American and national object of asserting your territorial rights and settling your soil. You grant at once what furthers the slave policy of a rival power, and deny the means of rescuing from its grasp your own property and soil!

[Here Mr. L. referred again to the letter of Mr. Spalding, which we have given at large.*]

The general objection to the bill has been confined to the grants of land. The South Carolina Senators alone have viewed the establishment of military posts as a violation of the convention. And I understood one of those Senators to assert even that, under the treaty, we could not extend over the territory our legal jurisdiction, as Britain has done.

[Mr. McDUFFIE here assured Mr. L. that he had misapprehended him: he held that we could extend our jurisdiction over the Indians and our own citizens.]

Mr. LINN. Well, sir, I stand corrected. I now hold in my hand a copy of the contract which the Hudson Bay Company passes with its employees, by which it is agreed that when the employee has served a certain number of years, and wishes to retire, he shall have a grant of fifty acres of land, a suit of the company's clothes, &c., he binding himself to a sort of feudal tenure to muster and bear arms when needed.

Now, sir, does not this contract incontestibly establish, on their part, everything which it is denied that we can do? Is it to be supposed that the company does not keep these engagements? That cannot be; and we know that their retired servants have for some time had settlements and occupied lands, in conformity with these agreements. I ask Senators, then, are we always to argue against ourselves?—always to interpret our national duties in favor of other nations, and to our own detriment? Was it not thus in 1828, when gentlemen contended that we could not establish military posts in the territory, nor extend our jurisdiction over it? This, too, when Great Britain had already taken those steps over the whole northwest, and even over a part of our territory on this side the Rocky Mountains.

But gentlemen surely mistake when they imagine that this British jurisdiction can be confined to British subjects alone. Pray, sir, were an American to commit murder on an employee of the company, does anybody believe that he would not be tried and hanged under this British law? The English ministry, I know, has said (as Mr. Gallatin tells us) that it was not intended to be applied to any but British subjects and Indians. But what then? What will the opinion of this or that minister signify, a case having actually occurred? By settled law, any denizen coming within its jurisdiction, and committing a crime, will be punished; and if there is a British judge or justice of the peace there, he will be bound to execute this law, to its letter, against Americans as all others.

My friend from Vermont [Mr. PHELPS] made it clear that, under this law, controversies likewise as to land titles between citizens of the two countries would pass under this jurisdiction. If so, why not as much criminal offences? But as to such scrupulous limiting of their legal assumptions, they are far more likely to enlarge them. I never heard of an Indian being hung under that law; but I have lately learned the occurrence of a case where a half-breed Indian, for the murder of an Englishman, was tried, convicted, and hung—a mode of death the most repugnant to all an Indian's prejudices. Why should this not have been done upon an American citizen? What have you done to insure his surrender to your own courts?—what to protect his pursuits, doubly legitimate both by your territorial title and the stipulations of the convention?

You do not, probably, know the number of men of Massachusetts, of New Hampshire, of Missouri, and of other States, who would push their fortunes in that territory, and carry civilization thither, could they but expect from you the protection and the favor which England, through the Hudson Bay Company, grants to her people. Your States of the East and the West will not send forth their swarms, because they believe their Government too timid or too niggardly to protect or to assist them. They never will believe you in earnest till, by some measure as positive as this, you prove to them that you regard your title as indefeasible, and give them a pledge of your intentions that cannot be retracted. I have seen many letters to this effect, and know that such is the general doubt which holds back numbers who desire to go. Your people require action of some kind; and I will feel that I have not lived in vain, if this bill should have the effect of bringing the subject to some definite conclusion.

These are the views of those who look only to the earthly rewards of hazardous enterprise. But the Eastern States furnish others, whom a sacred call has led to trace the pathless wilderness, careless of all human protection; who, in the true spirit of Christian philanthropy, have braved every privation and danger to carry to the valleys of the Oregon and the Wallamet the light of the Gospel, and its attendant, civilization; accomplishing there, by individual devotedness, those noble benefits which it was your part to have performed. The Christian spirit of men has outstripped the tardy

*"To show the operations of the Hudson Bay Company, to root out American fur-traders, public attention is called to the following extract of Mr. Townsend's excellent remarks upon the Territory of Oregon, recently published in the National Intelligencer.

"Within a few years, several Americans (of whom the writer of this notice is one) have crossed the Rocky Mountains to the mouth of the Columbia, with objects entirely unconnected with trade or commerce. Mine was the desire to see a new country, a love of adventure for its own sake, and an enthusiastic fondness for natural history.

"The party with which I travelled left Independence, Missouri, about the latter part of April, 1834, and arrived at the British Fort Vancouver in September, having performed the whole journey on horseback. From this time until October, 1836, (with the exception of the first winter, which I passed at the Sandwich Islands,) my residence was in the Territory of Oregon. Dr. McLaughlin, the chief factor, treated me with uniform and singular kindness, supplying all my wants, and furnishing me with every facility in the prosecution of my plans. This is, I believe, the uniform character of the superintendents of British forts in that country. Travellers, naturalists, and all who are not traders, are kindly and most hospitably treated; but the moment the visiter is known to trade a beaver skin from an Indian, that moment he is ejected from the community, and all communication between him and the officers of the company ceases. When Captain Wyeth, with his party, arrived at Walla-Walla fort, on his passage down the Columbia, he was required by the superintendent to promise that during his journey from thence to Vancouver—300 miles—he would not buy a beaver skin; the functionary assuring him that, unless he consented so to bind himself, he would send a party ahead of him which should be instructed to purchase every beaver skin from the Indians on the route, at a price which he (Wyeth) could not afford to pay. It is a fact, notorious in that country, that the honorable company has a sum of money, amounting to several thousand pounds sterling, laid aside at Vancouver, for the sole purpose of opposing all who may come to interfere with its monopoly, by purchasing at exorbitant prices all the furs in possession of the Indians, and thus forcing the settler to come to terms, or driving him from the country. If it be an individual who is thus starved into submission, he then usually clears a piece of land on the Wallamet river, takes an Indian wife, and purchases furs of the natives, which, by previous contract, he is bound to sell to the company at an advance which is fixed by the Governor."

policy and goodness of the Government; and these Gospel-bearers have at once formed a paradise, where your statesmen imagine nothing but steril sands, or a surface blackened by volcanic fires.

Of the horrors of such a sojourn the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. McDUFFIE] seems to have formed a particularly lively conception, and has conveyed it (as was to be expected) in a very powerful form. Had he (he said) an honest or deserving son, who desired to migrate thither, he would say to him, "Don't go! stay where you are!" But, had he one fit for a convict-ship or Botany Bay, he would tell him, without hesitation, "Go, by all means!"

Now, for the Senator's information, I beg to read a few well-authenticated descriptions of this blasted land of his. The reports of the missionaries, and the narratives of Captain Wilkes and of Mr. Peale, the naturalist, give a very different picture. They agree that, for picturesque beauty, for exuberant fertility, and for salubrity of climate, no region of the earth, of equal extent, surpasses the vales and the table-lands of the Oregon. There, too, they tell you, instead of the dissoluteness of such a population as the Senator thinks it only fit for, are seen gentleness, piety, intelligence, and peace, which seem to have their chosen seat in the beautiful valley of the Wallamet. They are law-abiding and law-loving; they are active, yet quiet; no strifes or broils, suicides or murders. No compulsion of the law is needed to make them pay their debts—a contrast, on this verge of civilization, (as the Senator supposes it,) at which a portion of his constituents, not to say my own, might well blush. He is not less mistaken as to the mercenary motives which, he thinks, can alone have led these wanderers so far. Was it such that brought our sturdy ancestors to the rock of Plymouth? May not their descendants speed to this farthest West with like visions of some noble futurity to be realized? There is a fascination in these half-real dreams which I have witnessed and felt; and had I wealth to pay, or could such things be bought, I know not what I would give to have felt the wild and strange rapture with which Boon must have gazed, for the first time, from the summit of the Cumberland mountains over the matchless plain of Kentucky; or yet, again, when he had passed through that Eden-like wilderness, and, from the top of one of the mounds of a departed race, looked, in bewildered delight, over the magnificent banks and streams of the Ohio.

These, sir, are sensations not to be purchased. There is in them no touch of anything mercenary; and they animate men to ventures which no gain can repay, but which surely, in finding or founding empires for us, deserve encouragement and protection, as much as any labors of that more sordid kind which seek, and make themselves in safety, rewards at home. There are men who go forth to the wilderness like our first parents, when God sent them forth from the garden of Eden to subdue the earth. Such feelings, to our own immediate ancestors, shed an ideal beauty over the barren rock of Plymouth, one day, under their all-subduing spirit, to blossom like the rose. The same impulse yet animates their race, and will bear them across deserts, as of old across the deep, give them only the protection of your laws and the countenance of the Government.

I recollect, Mr. President, at the last session of Congress to have heard a venerable and respected lady say that, when she removed, at the close of the Revolution, from Annapolis to Cumberland, in Maryland, she was looked upon as having gone out of the world, and as about to become a semi-savage. In such a light were your forefathers [Mr. BATES of Massachusetts in the chair] viewed when, in their forlorn search for freedom, they abandoned the ease of civilized life, and, for freer homes braved the dangers of the deep and the terrors of a savage shore. They but obeyed the instinct of our peculiar race—that invincible longing for liberty and space which impels those of Anglo-Saxon descent to trace the rudest tracts, the wildest seas, range the Atlantic and the Indian waste of waters, explore the vast Pacific, and break through the icy barriers of the polar oceans. With a spirit renewed from our virgin soil, and from Nature itself in this untamed continent, it looks back to the land of our forefathers, half ready to spread there the regeneration which constantly agitates itself. Other nations may enlarge themselves by physical conquests; but we (I thank God for it!) can subdue only by the dominion of mind the moral empire of institutions. If neighboring countries are, at any future time, to be added to our Union, it will be they who will have sought the blessings of our institutions; not we who will have coveted the enlargement of our territory by conquering fleets and armies.

[Here Mr. LINN proceeded to read a series of extracts from the documents to which he had referred; a letter from Alvan F. Waller, one of the missionaries on the Wallamet, dated 6th April, 1842, and published in the Christian Advocate and Journal of December last; which, after speaking in the highest terms of the agricultural, commercial, and other advantages of the country, refers to the disputes which have already occurred between the Hudson Bay Company and the recent American settlers. The company claiming, under the right of pre-emption, some of the choicest spots now occupied by American settlers; which proves, conclusively, the intentions of the company to occupy the best parts of the territory, to the exclusion of the Americans. Will not these land disputes, as well as all others, be brought under the operation of the British act of Parliament of 1821?

A series of thermometrical observations from Doctor Forry, by Mr. Ball, which may be found in the 25th and 26th volumes of Silliman's Journal; they show the average winter temperature at Fort Vancouver to be 41½ degrees of Fahrenheit; the spring 48 degrees; the summer 65 degrees; the fall 52½ degrees. This is probably a little milder than the climate of Norfolk, Virginia. Mr. L. also read a descriptive letter of Mr. Titian Peale, dated here on the 25th ultimo; another from Major Robert Moore, dated at Wallamet, (Oregon,) March 8, 1842; a statement from Mr. Waldron, in a late letter from the same place; a letter of Capt. Steen, of the United States dragoons, from Fort Leavenworth, in which he says: "I have lately had some conversation with Col. Battson of Jackson county, Missouri, who has returned a short time since from the Oregon Territory, and several other gentlemen from Missouri; they speak in the most exalted terms of the country, soil, climate, water-power, health, fine timber, and many other advantages that country has over Missouri."

A letter of the Messrs. Benson, of New York, transmitting the statement of Captain Spalding. All these are documents, not merely important, but interesting in themselves, though beyond our present command of space. He also referred to the well-known voyagers, Cook, Vancouver, Portlocke, Dixon, Krusenstiern, Langsdorf, as well as Lewis and Clarke, and some others. But, interesting as the matter becomes, in the view of the present national question, and important as are the materials thus brought together, we are compelled here to break off.]

So little before 1813 or 1814 did Great Britain ever doubt your claim to the lately-contested territory in Maine, that in 1814 she proposed to purchase that part of it which she desired. She next treated for a right of way. It was refused; and she then set up a claim to the soil. This method has sped no ill with her; for she has got what she wanted, AND MADE YOU PAY FOR IT. Her Oregon game is the same. She has set her heart upon a strip of territory north of the Oregon, and seems determined to pluck it from us, either by circumvention or force. Aware of the political as well as legal advantages of possession, she is strengthening hers in every way not too directly responsible. She is selecting and occupying the best lands, the most favorable sites. These she secures to the settlers under contracts. For any counteraction of yours, she may take, and is taking, possession of the whole territory. She has appropriated sites for mills, manufactories, and farms. If one of these has been abandoned for a better, she reverts to it, if a citizen of yours occupies it, and ejects him. She tells her people she will protect them in whatever they have laid, or may lay, their hands upon. If she can legitimately do this, why may not we? Is this a joint occupation of which she is to have the sole benefit? Had you as many citizens there as she, you would be compelled to protect them; and if you have not, why is it but because she keeps them off, and you refuse to offer them the inducements which she holds out? Give them a prospective grant of lands, and insure them the shelter of your laws, and they will soon congregate there in force enough to secure your rights and their own.

The Senator from South Carolina somewhat inconsistently urges that the country is bleak, barren, volcanic, rocky, a waste always flooded when it is not parched; and insists that, worthless as it is, Great Britain will go at once to war for it. Strange that she should in 1818 have held so tenaciously to what is so worthless! Stranger still that she should have stuck yet closer to it in 1827, when she had had still ampler time to learn the bootlessness of the possession! And strangest of all, that she should still cling to it with the grasp of death! Sir, I cannot for my life help thinking that she and the Senator have formed a very different estimate of the territory, and that she is (as she ought to be) a good deal the better informed. She knows well its soil, climate, and physical resources, and perfectly comprehends its commercial and geographical importance. And knowing all this, she was ready to sink all sense of justice, stifle all respect for our clear title, and hasten to root her interests in the soil, so as to secure the strong, even when most wrongful, title of possession.

As proof, among other things, of the worthlessness of the territory, the Senator yesterday maintained that, in the upper country, rain never falls, and in the lower, hardly ever ceases. Now, the facts derived from intelligent residents show that in those parts of the country where it seldom rains, copious dews supply the necessary moisture for vegetable life; while the streams and rills which on all sides descend from the mountains, entertain a perpetual freshness in the arable and pasture lands. It is shown, too, that, on the coast and lowlands, what is called the rainy season is one of gentle showers, not of deluges of rain. If they have more rain, they have less frost and snow than other countries, more fertility, and not less health.

But the documentary information accumulated here for some years past makes all who are conversant with it aware that the Senator mistakes the character of the plains on the east as well as the west side of the Rocky Mountains. He imagines that the vast plains which stretch from the base of that chain to the borders of our inhabited territories are desert sands, destitute alike of vegetation and water. We all know that this is not so; that these great plains are principally rich prairie lands, sustaining countless herds of antelopes, deer, and buffaloes, and capable of most profitable cultivation. They are intersected by great rivers, fed by innumerable streams, supplied by lesser tributaries, diverging in every direction. Timber certainly is scarce; but it springs up and grows with the population, and the banks of the streams afford everywhere strips of wood, quite sufficient to supply any population that can, for a good many years, fix itself there. Mistaken, as the Senator is, as to what lies comparatively near, I am not surprised that he should misconceive what is so remote—the country of the Oregon. He appears, also, not to be aware that, from the lower Ohio to the eastern skirts of the Rocky Mountains, it is one vast coal-field, in its lower altitudes, intermixed with other mineral regions, whose value seems almost without a limit.

Sir, I confess that this wealth of the surface, and the still vaster natural treasuries that lie beneath, unmined but not unknown, have awakened in me, and seem to me to justify, the expectations which the Senator considers so visionary. Over such a region, the passage from the richest valley in the world—that of the Mississippi—to a new and wide commercial empire, that must presently start upon the Pacific, I cannot think railroads and canals mere day-dreams. The wonders which have, within the last twenty years, been achieved in those things, may well excuse those who look upon the results I have mentioned as possible, even within the compass of the present generation. All predictions, even the most sanguine, have in this country been so distanced by the actual progress of its prosperity, that gentlemen who foretell the other way should beware of the error of the Millerites, and not lay the accomplishments of their prophecies too close at hand. Even in the faith of the bold enthusiasts who landed at Plymouth Rock, was there one ardent enough to imagine that their descendants would, in five centuries, perform what has been effected in two? It was said by General Cass, in his discourse before the Historical Society of this city, "that he had conversed with those who had talked with the children of the pilgrims." In this mere space of time, what amazing changes! What an empire has risen up, like an exhalation from earth! A new people has been added to the great household of nations, and is already among the first in the world! There are those amongst us who have talked with Daniel Boon, that overland Columbus who first explored the recesses of that immense wilderness in which we now count many States, teeming with population and wealth, and glad with all the gifts of civilization. What imagination has yet outstripped the gigantic pace at which improvement marches amongst us? Sir, I can well conceive the tumult of delight which must have swelled the bosom of Clarke, when, from the bluff he had gained, he first heard the roar of the great ocean, and saw the surges of the Pacific bathing the territory he had explored. In the vision of that moment, he saw through the dim vista of the future rising States of his countrymen spreading along that shore, and the white sails of their commerce wafting along the bosom of that peaceful sea the barbaric wealth of the East, in return for the more solid fruits of our own industry. One cannot read the warm and striking description of what he saw and felt, without sharing in his enthusiasm. Some of us now here have shaken hands with Boon, with Clarke, with Cass, who had often conversed with a relative, a contemporary of the first-born of the Pilgrim fathers. What a picture does this present for the contemplation of the statesman and philosopher! The chain is complete from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean—from the first-born of Massachusetts, to Clarke on the borders of the Western ocean.

But the Senator from South Carolina thinks the Rocky Mountains impracticable to road making. He is mistaken. Even in a state of nature, they have easy passes, well known for the last thirteen years to our traders and travellers. They who will venture unprotected, perform the journey readily in wagons, with their women and children, over beaten routes—by one principal one especially, established for the last fifteen years, along the smooth, even surface of the inclined plane of the river Platte. Along this many families have gone, threading the mountain defiles, descending the western slope, and arriving at the Walla-Walla, or Fort Vancouver, within three months of their departure from the Eastern prairies.* These things have escaped the Senator's attention, and he sees only arid sands or volcanic rocks, and stern impassable barriers. Without meaning anything invidious, I would invite him to contrast these regions, as to their soil, climate, and natural advantages, with some of the old thirteen States as they now are. Oregon has its belts of sand: so has South Carolina. Oregon has its mountains: so has Carolina. Oregon has its rainy season: South Carolina has its hurricanes. Oregon has its seasons when dews alone supply moisture to the soil; but it has not the death-breathing swamps of South Carolina. Oregon has a genial climate, neither parched nor frozen: South Carolina has her fierce summer heats and her fatal fevers.

But I will not pursue the parallel; for all countries offer something which patriotism in each hails as a peculiar blessing denied to other lands. A word, however, of the climate of Oregon. From actual observations, skilfully recorded, its winter temperature, near the coast, is about that of Augusta, Georgia. It has its stated seasons of wet and of dry weather. Like the entire western coast, from 60 degrees north to Chili, it has a much milder climate than the same parallel on the eastern shore of our continent. There is no part of the territory in which lands fit for cultivation do not abound;* for, in the tracts where rains do not fall, abundant dews compensate them; and great facilities for irrigation exist. Abundant and beautiful rivulets descend, on all sides, from the snow-capped mountains, always in view; and one gentleman—whose peculiar opportunities and fitness to form a correct judgment the Senate knows—declares that it is the finest pastoral country he has ever seen; and he has seen many. All intelligent observers speak with delight of the singular beauty of its scenery, unrivaled by any in the United States. As to maritime conveniences, where has South Carolina a port comparable to that of Puget's and others within the straits of De Fuen; where, well-sheltered, and in water amply inconveniently deep, close to the natural sea-wall, a thousand men-of-war may lie? Has South Carolina a river like the Oregon? If the Columbia has impediments as its mouth, so has every harbor on our Eastern and Southern coast. I desire not to disparage other States, but only to show of what Oregon is capable for national and individual purposes, were its resources called out. When its great river shall have fleets of pilot-boats, lighters, barges, steam tow-boats, light-houses, and all the commercial appliances of a busy population, the impediments of its entrance will grow no more alarming than those of New York, or of our other Eastern harbors. The loss of the Peacock at its mouth, for want of a proper knowledge of the channel, does not stamp it as a dangerous entrance or unsafe roadstead.

Though these statements have taxed both the time and the patience of the Senate, I could not avoid them. They were indispensable, to counteract the discouraging and disparaging opinions so strongly pronounced by the Senator from South Carolina. To these allegations of mere opinion and authority, it was necessary to oppose the well-substantiated facts furnished by intelligent eye-witnesses.

Allow me, to the same effect, to cite a description of the country lately communicated to me by Mr. Titian Peale, an accomplished naturalist, who is well known in science for the part which he bore in Long's expedition, as well as in the late exploring voyage under Lieutenant Wilkes. He recently favored me with the following letter:

[Mr. Peale says to the following effect: That the Hudson Bay Company has several extensive farms, with mills, &c., on the north side of the Columbia. They are in a very flourishing condition; supply usually about 2,000 bushels of wheat to the Russian colony, much lumber and produce of the dairy to the Sandwich Islands. He mentions their herds of cattle and sheep, kept on the south side of the river. Of the latter, 2,000 had been brought by land from California, just before the arrival of the exploring squadron.

The retainers (employées) of the company have numerous farms on the Wallamet, south of the Columbia. He had seen the contracts under which these lands are granted. They are to the effect which we have before recited.

He speaks very favorably of the Americans whom he found settled there. They cannot embark in commerce, for the powerful monopoly of the company would always crush them. They say, however, that, personally, it treats them very honorably.

The soil, climate, and productions are such as will, at no distant day, give the country the same commercial importance on the Pacific, as we hold on the Atlantic. For grain or lumber, it is nearly equal, if not quite, to the United States. These command ready markets on the Mexican and South American coast, and in the many islands. The salmon-fishery of the Columbia can, he thinks, in a few years, be rendered as valuable as the fisheries on our Eastern coast. In this, he is supported by a united stream of testimony.

The country (he says) only wants the protection of our laws, to render it a desirable home for our hardy countrymen of the interior.]

Mr. LINN continued. In addition to the agricultural wealth which would be rapidly created in this fine region, the noble timber which it affords, its fisheries, and its general advantages of commercial position, its value as a resort for our marine in that distant sea, where we have such great interests afloat, should not be forgotten. Of these last, under the late events in China—certain as they are to bring about the most important commercial changes—it behooves us to be careful, in common with the other great trading nations. That France is already on the alert, we see in her late seizure of the Marquesas.

As to the question of expense, the Senator from South Carolina may have already seen that only half the sum he yesterday supposed—$100,000, not $200,000—is proposed to be employed. Whether or not the country is worth that sum, may, in addition to all other testimony, be judged from the report of your recent exploring expedition; of which (costly as it was) one of the most definite objects was minutely to ascertain the condition, value, resources, and capacities of the territory. Mr. Wilkes speaks in the most enthusiastic terms of all its elements of wealth and greatness.

The Senator from South Carolina yesterday asked, "What do we want with this territory?" To me, sir, it seems answer enough to say, that your just rights grossly neglected, commercial interests of great magnitude, and the wishes of your people, demand its occupation. They have pressed upon you petitions of two or three thousand persons at a time, anxious to migrate thither if assured that you will maintain your title. Nothing but distrust of your tardiness and timidity withholds them. I myself, while urging the measure—always, however, with that moderation of which I have, for my own justification, been forced to speak—have always felt that nothing but reiterated discussion would ever prepare minds here for action, until it became, perhaps, almost too late. At that last stage of procrastination I look upon ourselves as now arrived. Our foreign relations—and especially such as can be artfully spun out—are little likely ever to be, in the lapse of many years, in a situation that will better allow us to proceed. Yet, gentlemen still answer me, as of old, "Wait! wait!" They still, after twenty-two years of postponement, find the moment inauspicious, the movement precipitate. As ever, there is "a lion in the path." When were ever such dilatory proceedings safe against a powerful, an active, a politic adversary, rapid to grasp, and slow only to relinquish? If we are ever to assert our rights, it must be most speedily, before they lapse into the hands of others, from long undisputed possession. For, mark that be your reserves of treaties what they may, England has long enjoyed, and is every day completing and guarding, her exclusive possessions.

I have no personal interest in this measure—no motive but such as I have in common with all who are jealous of the rights and careful of the interests of our country. Political capital, it affords none; and if it did, I am no political capitalist,

*There are four passes through the Rocky Mountains. The best one was discovered, twelve or fifteen years since, by hunter-traders; and is described in reports to the War Department by Messrs. Ashley, Pilcher, Sublette, Jackson, Smith, and others; but the one here given is from Missionary Parker's book:

"On the 10th of August, they were in the passage of the Rocky Mountains, at an opening recently explored, in latitude 42½ degrees north, about 3 or 4 degrees south of the place where Lewis and Clarke crossed and recrossed with great difficulty, above thirty years before, under the direction of Government. 'The passage through these mountains is in a valley, so gradual in ascent and descent, that I should not have known that we were passing them, had it not been that, as we advanced, the atmosphere gradually became colder, and at length we found the perpetual snows upon our right hand and upon our left, elevated many thousand feet above us—in some places ten thousand. The highest parts of these mountains are found, by measurement, to be eighteen thousand feet above the level of the sea. This valley was not discovered until some years since. Mr. Hunt and his party, more than twenty years ago, went near it, but did not find it, though in search of some favorable passage. It varies in width from five to twenty miles; and, following its course, the distance through the mountains is about eighty miles, or four days' journey. Though there are some elevations and depressions in this valley, yet, comparatively speaking, it is level. There would be no difficulty in the way of constructing a railroad from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean; and, probably, the time may not be far distant when trips will be made across the continent, as they have been made to Niagara falls, to see nature's wonders.'"

*I call the attention of the reader to the following extract of a statement of Mr. Townsend, the ornithologist attached to the National Institute, at Washington:

"The face of the country from Fort George (Astoria) to Vancouver—a distance of eighty miles—is very much of a uniform character, consisting of alluvial meadows along the river banks, alternating with forests of pine, oak, &c.; while behind are extensive plains, some of which receive estuaries of the river, while others are watered by lakes or ponds, many of them so large as to remain filled during the whole summer. The pine forests are very extensive, the trees being of great size, and the timber extraordinarily beautiful, straight, and free from knots. All the timber of the genus pinus, of which there are a great number of species, is gigantic, when compared with our trees in this part of the world; but occasionally one is met with, huge almost beyond comparison. I measured, with Doctor Gardiner, surgeon of the fort, a pine of the species Douglasii, which had been prostrated by the wind. Its height was above two hundred feet, and its circumference forty-five feet! Large as was this specimen, its dimensions are much exceeded by one on the Umptqua river, measured by the late Mr. David Douglass. The height of this tree was, I think, nearly three hundred feet, and its circumference fifty six feet! The cones of this pine, according to Mr. Douglass, were from twelve to fifteen inches in length, resembling in size and form sugar-loaves. Oak timber of various kinds, and of the first quality, is abundant along the river, as well as the buttonwood, (platanus occidentalis,) balsam poplar, (populus balsamifera,) ash, sweet gum, (liquidamber styraciflua,) beech, and many other useful kinds, but no hickory or walnut.

"The Governor of Fort Vancouver, who is an active agriculturist, has exerted himself for several years in raising whatever appears to be adapted to the soil, and I can therefore only make known the results of his experiments so far as I had an opportunity of observing them. Wheat, rye, barley, pease, and culinary vegetables of all kinds, are raised in ample quantity. The wheat is particularly fine; tall, with long and well filled heads. I had an opportunity subsequently of seeing the Chilian wheat, which is deservedly celebrated; but I consider it decidedly inferior to that grown on the Columbia. Fruits of various kinds, apples, peaches, plums, &c., do remarkably well. I remember being particularly struck, upon my arrival at Vancouver in the autumn, with the display of apples in the garden of the fort. The trees were crowded with fruit, so that every limb required to be sustained by a prop. The apples were literally packed along the branches, and so closely that I could compare them to nothing more aptly than to ropes of onions as they are sometimes exhibited for sale in our markets."

Whether it can carry any advantage or disadvantage to this or that section, I have not considered, and I shall not consider. Not even reputation do I expect or desire from my efforts, except the legitimate one of having faithfully discharged my duty to such a question, whether as a Senator or a citizen.

As to this easy and most culpable policy of eternal delays, however, have you not already by it quadrupled your difficulties and your eventual losses? Had you at once, on recovering possession of Astoria in 1818, built military posts and provided for settlers, you never would have heard of the British pretensions since started. The same policy of indecision gave you the difficulties of your Northeastern question and the disadvantages of its late adjustment. Sir, the country of an offensive policy (like England) always gains, and that of a defensive one (like ourselves) always loses, by these delays.

But the Senator from South Carolina says this is the first instance of a proposition, under this Government, to found a colony at the public charge. No; but we bought them ready made to our hands—and splendid acquisitions they were; and, strange to say, as powerful arguments, and as strong language, were used against the purchase of Louisiana, as are now used against the occupation of Oregon.

Now, in the first place, no such idea has been put forward as founding a colony at the public expense. No boon is asked, but a very limited one of lands, to be redeemed from the wilderness; and such a gift has, with all the nations of the globe, been a common feature in the first planting of remote settlements. Except this, and the protection of your laws, nothing is claimed. To such a method you owe it that you are the owners of this broad Union. Of Oregon, you can never otherwise take possession; and the only fault is, that you have been so tardy to put it in practice. Had you, before the time of Commodore Porter, secured your foothold there, by fortifying a port on the Columbia, you might have saved millions in property and commercial advantages, now forever lost and forfeited. Twenty millions of dollars, invested by your citizens in the whale fisheries alone of these seas, yet admonish you that you have not a moment to lose in securing there the shelter of a commodious harbor. All these things—the relations you are establishing with the Sandwich group—the long and rich coast-trade of the Pacific—the honor and the rights of the country—call upon you to pass this bill.

For such objects, you are startled at an appropriation of $100,000. Mean time, for an extorted provision of your late treaty, (Britain telling you that if you did not carry out your laws for repressing the slave-trade, she would do it for you,) you gladly pay an annual $600,000, with hymns of praise to the great negotiator whose transcendent abilities brought about such an arrangement.

So much for the enormous cost of this novel colonization; and now as to its novelty. Sir, have we never before colonized? Have you not, at an expense of millions, removed the Indians from your settled States, and colonized them beyond your border? I do not complain of that measure: nay, I rejoice at it, as one full of humanity; but I have often had occasion to point out to you the duties which it imposes upon you of guarding the exposed parts of Missouri, Arkansas, and other portions of your Western frontier from the dangers of that Indian population; to keep which in check, many of the provisions of this bill are indispensable.

Certainly there are interests, deemed paramount in some parts of this Union, which gentlemen may conceive as likely to be affected by this bill. I know not whether the growth of this new colony (if you choose to call it such) is to give a future predonderance to the free States, or not. I look to the territory only as the common home of citizens from every part of the Union. When numerous enough to form a distinct sovereignty, it will be for them to choose whether they will obey, or not, the great law of consanguinity and of similar freedom which so strongly impels towards each other even the fragments of our peculiar race. By that sort of yearning, we see Texas seeking to reunite herself to us, in spite of distance and dispersion. So much, indeed, do the facilities for intercourse and concentration outgo the causes of separation and dispersion, that if Texas were a free State instead of a slave State, I do not know if I should, on the other score, repel her wish to become a member of this Union.

The Senator from South Carolina thinks that only compression within narrow limits can give a high state of civilization. This is true, or false, according to the idea which is to be affixed to the term civilization. Is it formed by the loftiest intellectual results among a certain class? or is it the purest moral culture of all classes? Christianity, aided only by ordinary intelligence, has done more to humanize and to elevate mankind, than all the intellectual glories of Paganism could ever for a moment effect. That Christianity does not shut itself up in narrow bounds, or nurture a national selfishness. Broad, diffusive, and full of all the charities of man to man, its principle is universal brotherhood. The spirit of the age itself forbids the shutting up within narrow limits the blessings which our institutions are so fitted to diffuse—blessings which the active and expansive spirit of the Anglo-Saxon race seems fitted and destined to spread over the whole earth. I care not for that high civilization whose standard is wealth or power; or that other, which erects upon partial laws the superiority of the few. I am not a lover of the civilization which takes for one of its main instruments great corporate associations—contrivances for enabling one set of men to lord it over another. None of these is the high civilization which I desire for this country; but the moral culture, the general intelligence, the careful domestic education and discipline, the Christian brotherhood of a whole happy and virtuous nation. When we give scope and encouragement to this virtuous social activity, we best perform our legislative part as to the work of civilization.

To talk of the Rocky Mountains as an impassable barrier, is, sir, but to speak as folks did of the Alleghany fifty years ago. Distance is almost annihilated by the existing state of things; and, vastly as our limits have been extended, they have, in point of time and difficulty, contracted almost as much, since the formation of our Government; so that the attendance here of delegates from beyond the Rocky Mountains really involves nothing absurd, or even improbable.

[Mr. L. here laid before the Senate a copy of the contract usually passed between the Hudson Bay Company and its employees, or servants. He referred to it as conclusive proof of permanent settlement, if not of permanent land grants, and of the firm reliance which the company has in the pledges of the British Government.]

He went on to argue that the proposition of the British ministers to Mr. Gallatin in 1826-'27, was a palpable admission of our rights, and rendered decisive by the attendant circumstances. They then proposed to insert, in the renewed convention then under negotiation, provisions that neither power should assume or exercise any right of sovereignty or dominion over any part of the country for fifteen years; and that no settlement then existing, or which might thereafter be formed, should ever be adduced by either party in support of any claim of sovereignty or dominion. This proposition was referred, by our negotiator, to the President, (Mr. Adams,) and rejected, on the ground that it would preclude our exercising our rights of dominion and sovereignty. The proposition, on their part, is more than a tacit admission, and its rejection by us, upon such grounds, an assertion of our right to exercise the sovereignty, while their silence as to that reason forms a fresh assent to it.

In no part of the negotiations is there a word to prove that, on either part, a doubt was entertained of our right to plant military posts. Great Britain, indeed, clearly, though indirectly, admits it. For Mr. Gallatin says, in his letter to Mr. Clay, dated at London, 7th August, 1827, that "there was no intention on the part of Great Britain to colonize the country, or to impede the progress of our settlements. But Great Britain owed protection to her subjects in that quarter, and could not admit that they should, so long as the permanent boundary was not settled, be liable to a foreign jurisdiction. Nor would her interest, or a due regard to national character, permit her to acquiesce in an exclusive military occupation of the country, on the part of the United States."

The utmost objection, then, which can be inferred to the bill, is the possibility that Great Britain, by a future adjustment, may prove entitled to territory within which may lie lands assigned to our citizens under these prospective grants. But it has been already abundantly proved that Great Britain does this through her Hudson Bay Company. They, in their contracts, grant the soil—a sovereign act to which they themselves are not competent, and which, therefore, supposes the delegation and consent of their Government—a Government certainly not unaware of what they are doing in this behoof, and notoriously promising them its support in whatever interests or settlements may grow up there.

In everything, Britain interprets the convention for herself. She has told you what she would not and what she would permit you to do. She says you must not set up a distinct State or Territorial Government there; but that you may do as she has done—extend to that territory the laws of one of your other Territories or States. Well, that is all that this bill proposes. Never before was the treaty interpreted as tying up our hands from the exercise of our sovereignty; that construction is now thrust upon us for the first time, by the fear of making an issue with Great Britain. An issue with Britain! Methinks, sir, there is small need of furnishing issues to a power so capable of erecting pretensions out of anything; and little policy in starting claims for her, to whose claims you always succumb. Seizing upon your Northwest coast, during the last war, she has ever since kept you out of it, from year to year, until she is now able, by the control which she has established over the Indians, to take possession of your rivers and harbors, and virtually exclude you from the trade of your own shores.

Senators have enlarged upon the pacific, and even the fraternal feelings which Great Britain manifested towards us in the late treaty. I am sorry to say that I can discover, in that adjustment, nothing to indicate any desire of peace, except upon condition of our yielding her everything that was in contest. You gave her all she wanted; and now you are in raptures of amazement at her moderation and humanity in not going to war! For her violations of your territory and vessels, you took an apology which she did not design to offer as such. Of the anomalous McLeod case, she complained loudly, calling lustily upon you to take it out of the hands of the State authorities. You complied as far as you could, and apologized for all that you could not; taking care, meantime, not to irritate her by too much mention of your own greater wrong—that of the Caroline and the death of Durfee. She has openly told you to carry out your own laws for the suppression of the slave-trade, or she would do it for you; she has plainly told you that if you did not enforce your laws for the preservation of neutrality on the Canadian borders, she would do it for you; and you have meekly submitted, promising at once to keep up, on the African coast, a force of eighty guns. She complains, and you make amends; she claims, and you yield; she requires, and you comply. And lo! you are delighted and amazed at her wonderfully pacific temper! War, sir! Why, what excuse could she have for talking of it, when, to stop her mouth, you have given her all she demanded; and when, to gratify her, you incur an expenditure of three millions in five years; while we are told that, for this important bill, the treasury cannot burden itself with a single outlay of $100,000.

I should deplore a war, however necessary; but, deploring it, I should none the more shrink from it, if the rights, the interests, or the honor of my country demanded it. When any of these were decisively at stake, not even before the formidable power of Great Britain would I hesitate for a moment.

But, Mr. President, I do not anticipate any such result from the passage of the bill. Its probable effects will be to bring the two Governments to see the necessity of promptly and definitively settling this long-discussed and long-agitated subject, before British and American interests in the Territory of Oregon become so commingled, yet so variant, as to close the door to any other method of adjustment, but a resort to arms.

A bill to authorize the adoption of measures for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon, for extending certain portions of the laws of the United States over the same, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and required to cause to be erected, at suitable places and distances, a line of blockade and blockhouse forts, not exceeding five in number, from some point on the Missouri and Arkansas rivers, into the best pass for entering the valley of the Oregon; and, also, at or near the mouth of the Columbia river.

That provision hereafter shall be made by law to secure and grant six hundred and forty acres, or one section of land, to every white male inhabitant of the Territory of Oregon, of the age of eighteen years and upward, who shall cultivate and use the same for five consecutive years; or to his heir or heirs-at-law, if such there be, in case of his decease. And to every such inhabitant or cultivator (being a married man) there shall be granted, in addition, one hundred and sixty acres to the wife of said husband, and the like quantity of one hundred and sixty-acres to the father for each child under the age of eighteen years he may have, or which may be born within the five years aforesaid.

That no sale, alienation, or contract of any kind, shall be valid, of such lands, before the patent is issued therefor; nor shall the same be liable to be taken in execution, or bound by any judgment, mortgage, or lien, of any kind, before the patent is so issued; and all pretended alienations or contracts for alienating such lands, made before the issuing of the patents, shall be null and void against the settler himself, his wife, or widow, or against his heirs-at-law, or against purchasers, after the issuing of the patent.

That the President is hereby authorized and required to appoint two additional Indian agents, with a salary of two thousand dollars each, whose duty it shall be (under his direction and control) to superintend the interests of the United States with any or every Indian tribe west of any agency now established by law.

That the sum of one hundred thousand dollars be appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the civil and criminal jurisdiction of the supreme court and district courts of the Territory of Iowa be, and the same is hereby, extended over that part of the Indian territories lying west of the present limits of the said Territory of Iowa, and south of the forty-ninth degree of north latitude, and west of the Rocky Mountains, and north of the boundary line between the United States and the Republic of Texas, not included within the limits of any State; and, also, over the Indian territories comprising the Rocky Mountains and the country between them and the Pacific ocean, south of fifty-four degrees and forty minutes of north latitude, and north of the forty-second degree of north latitude; and justices of the peace may be appointed for the said territory, in the same manner, and with the same powers, as now provided by law in relation to the Territory of Iowa: Provided, That any subject of the Government of Great Britain, who shall have been arrested under the provisions of this act for any crime alleged to have been committed within the territory westward of the Stony or Rocky Mountains, while the same remains free and open to the vessels, citizens, and subjects of the United States and of Great Britain, pursuant to stipulations between the two powers, shall be delivered up, on proof of his being such British subject, to the nearest or most convenient authorities having cognizance of such offence by the laws of Great Britain, for the purpose of being prosecuted and tried according to such laws.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That one associate judge of the supreme court of the Territory of Iowa, in addition to the number now authorized by law, may, in the discretion of the President, be appointed, to hold his office by the same tenure and for the same time, receive the same compensation, and possess all the powers and authority conferred by law upon the associate judges of the said Territory; and one judicial district shall be organized by the said supreme court, in addition to the existing number, in reference to the jurisdiction conferred by this act; and a district court shall be held in the said district by the judge of the supreme court, at such times and places as the said court shall direct; and the said district court shall possess all the powers and authority vested in the present district courts of the said Territory, and may, in like manner appoint its own clerk.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That any justice of the peace, appointed in and for the territories described in the second section of this act, shall have power to cause all offenders against the laws of the United States to be arrested by such persons as they shall appoint for that purpose, and to commit such offenders to safe custody for trial, in the same cases and in the manner provided by law in relation to the Territory of Iowa; and to cause the offenders so committed to be conveyed to the place appointed for the holding of a district court for the said Territory of Iowa, nearest and most convenient to the place of such commitment, there to be detained for trial, by such persons as shall be authorized for that purpose by any judge of the supreme court, or any justice of the peace of the said Territory; or where such offenders are British subjects, to cause them to be delivered to the nearest or most convenient British authorities, as hereinbefore provided; and the expenses of such commitment, removal, and detention shall be paid in the same manner as provided by law in respect to the fees of the marshal of the said Territory.

REMARKS OF MR. WELLER,

OF OHIO.

In the House of Representatives, February 17, 1843—On the army bill.

The amendment of the Senate, appropriating $150,000 to the continuation of the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio, Mississippi, Missouri, and Arkansas rivers, being under consideration—

Mr. WELLER said he desired to submit a few remarks upon the pending amendment. He would not, at this late period of the session, when so many important bills remain to be disposed of, obtrude any remarks upon the House, if it were not for the fact that the State which he had the honor, in part, to represent, was deeply interested in this measure. As a Representative, sent here to watch over her interests, he could not consent to have a vote taken on this proposition, without presenting some facts which he deemed of importance.

The amendment appropriates $150,000 to continue the improvements heretofore commenced (and for some time past suspended) in the navigation of the Western rivers. It is presented here as an isolated, independent proposition, having no connexion whatever with any other public work, and relying for support exclusively upon its own merits. For one, he preferred that it should come before us in this form; for he utterly abhorred the "log-rolling system," which had too frequently been introduced into our legislation here—a system calculated to corrupt legislation and plunder the treasury, by involving the Government in appropriations not demanded by the public weal. He would have each measure to stand or fall upon its own merits; and, unless he could satisfy gentlemen that the public interest required that this expenditure should be made, he would be content to see it defeated.

Mr. W. said, in order to ascertain the importance of the uninterrupted navigation of these rivers, it was only necessary to look at the immense region of territory interested therein, the vast amount of commerce floating upon these waters, and the large number of persons whose lives were placed in jeopardy by the obstructions which this appropriation is designed to remove. The work was one of importance to the Union generally, but especially so to that portion of our population residing in the vicinity of these rivers. Eleven States—containing more than one-third of the whole population of the Union—were directly interested in the navigation of these rivers. A vast amount of the produce which we send to our Atlantic brethren, and which is either consumed by them, or shipped to foreign ports, as well as the goods which we receive in return, passes over these rivers; and hence the work is one of a general character, in which the whole Union is more or less interested. If, as is contended by some gentlemen who are "wise above what is written," Congress has not the constitutional power to open these great national channels of commerce, by removing the obstructions which impede or endanger their navigation, then the Federal Government is an impracticable machine. Although a strict constructionist himself, he was not willing to give such an interpretation to the Constitution as would make that instrument a dead letter. Whilst he admitted that the Federal Government had not the power to go into the States and construct improvements of a local character, yet he contended that, when the work was of a general and national character, affecting the interests of the whole Republic—such as the improvement of these rivers, or the making of harbors for our commerce, or building of light-houses—we had the power. Such had been the construction given to the Constitution by its framers, and by the wisest statesmen from all sections of the Union, ever since the organization of the Government. It would not be right, even if it were practicable, to compel the States lying near these rivers to make these improvements.

Some gentlemen from New York, who have spoken against this amendment, seem to think that all the commerce of this country floats upon the Hudson river! No doubt they were sincere in this opinion; but, if they could find leisure to travel a little—especially if they would venture so far as to cross the Alleghanies, and look into the vast and fertile valley which stretches along these rivers,—they might, perhaps, be convinced that there was some little commerce besides that which floats on the Hudson! A man sometimes gains a good deal of information by getting far enough from home to lose sight of the smoke of his own dwelling. He might point these gentlemen to his own proud State—one of the junior members of this Confederacy—a State which, a little more than forty years ago, lay nearly in a state of nature, an unbroken wilderness, inhabited by wild beasts and savage men; but which, under the industry and enterprise of her hardy and independent sons, had been made to "bloom and blossom as the rose"—a State which now numbered more than a million and a half of inhabitants, and whose boundless natural resources justified the fondest anticipations of her future greatness. Yes, (said Mr. W.,) let these Hudson-river gentlemen go into Ohio—already the third State in the Union—and they will learn, possibly, to their astonishment, that there are civilized people beyond the mountains, who are entitled to some of the benefits of your legislation. They would find a soil as productive as any upon the face of the earth, and a people as enlightened and patriotic as the citizens of any of the States of this Union. It might enlarge the patriotism of some of these Southern gentlemen, too, who are constantly prating about Southern rights, if they permitted their vision to extend a little beyond the limits of their own impoverished, worm-eaten districts. But he had not risen to disparage other States, or bestow a eulogy on his own. Ohio needed no commendation from him. The Indian wars of the West, the victorious battles in which the country has been engaged, can attest the gallantry, the daring chivalry, and exalted patriotism of her sons. Her internal improvements, her roads and canals, her magnificent public institutions, her inexhaustible resources, the rapid progress she has made in everything calculated to dignify human nature, must attest her greatness.

These gentlemen, (said Mr. W.,) when asked to make a small appropriation to be expended in the West, reply that they cannot go with us unless we will vote large sums to the improvement of their rivers—something must be done for the Hudson river. If the facts presented in relation to that river make out a case half as strong as ours, then he pledged himself to go for it. But some of these gentlemen, who oppose this amendment, could very coolly vote $120,000 out of the treasury to purchase columns to adorn the Boston custom-house. They could expend two millions and a half of dollars in building two custom-houses in the North; but when we ask them for $150,000 to remove the obstructions which are daily destroying the property and lives of our people in the West, we are favored with homilies on economy! He, too, was in favor of economy; and more especially now, in the present condition of the national treasury. He would not vote for any appropriation to works of this character, unless clearly satisfied that the public interest imperiously demanded it. He held that this was an expenditure absolutely necessary, and to refuse it would be anything else but economy.

Mr. W. said he had always voted liberally towards the increase and support of the navy, although no portion of the vast sums appropriated were to be expended in his section of the country. He had gone as far as the public interest would justify with Atlantic gentlemen, in the construction of harbors and light-houses to protect their commerce; and, as he before remarked, he was ready to go for an appropriation to the Hudson river, if the facts were sufficient to warrant it. This river (about which we hear so much) was, he believed, navigable only about 160 or 170 miles; and he would be glad to have some gentleman from

New York give him an estimate of the commerce which floated on its waters.

Mr. BARNARD said he was ready to inform the gentleman; but he should be glad first to know what were the gentleman's own notions as to the probable amount about which he inquired. From the tone of the gentleman's remarks, he should suppose he thought there was no commerce on the Hudson at all.

Mr. WELLER replied that he had said nothing to authorize such a supposition. All he had said was, that there was some commerce in this country other than that which passed over the Hudson—a fact which, from the tenor of their remarks, they seemed to doubt. He had travelled upon the Hudson, and knew that the business on that river was extensive; but at the same time he was unwilling that it should be set down as equal to the commerce of the Ohio and Mississippi.

Mr. BARNARD stated that the value of the commerce yearly floating on the Hudson was about $60,000,000.

Mr. WELLER. And did the gentleman actually suppose that the entire commerce of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers only amounted to $60,000,000? Why, sir, at least that amount descends the Mississippi and enters the single port of New Orleans every year. Take the amount which enters that port; to this add the value of the cargoes ascending, and the coast trade, and you will have more than one hundred and twenty millions as the value of the commerce floating on the Mississippi every year. If you estimate the trade between the towns on the other rivers, and the value of the goods shipped at Pittsburg and Wheeling, for the West and Southwest, you will have, as the gross amount of the commerce on the Mississippi and its tributaries, at least two hundred and thirty millions.

Mr. BARNARD asked what proportion of this was on the Ohio?

Mr. WELLER said he was not now prepared to answer that question, but could give him the information after he closed his remarks.

Mr. TRIPLETT said that it was about seventy-one millions.

Mr. WELLER resumed. The Ohio is navigable from Pittsburg to the mouth—a distance of 1,000 miles; the Mississippi, from the falls of St. Anthony to the ocean—a distance of 2,000 miles. The whole number of steamboats which plied upon the Western rivers in 1842 is set down at 450—worth $7,200,000. These boats, in consequence of the difficulties in the navigation, and other causes, must be replaced every five years, as few of them will endure service for a longer period. In addition to this, 4,000 flat-boats, worth $420,000, descend the Mississippi every year; and, as they do not, of course, return, this is an annual expenditure. An intelligent committee at Cincinnati—from whose report I have (said Mr. W.) gathered many of my facts—estimate the number of persons employed in the navigation of these rivers at 40,000. Here, then, you have this vast amount of property, and the lives of these 40,000 men, besides the thousands of passengers, with their property, who are daily ascending and descending these rivers, placed in such imminent peril by your refusal to remove these obstructions. Some small appropriation had been made in former years, and the most beneficial results had been produced. Between the years 1822 and 1827, (5 years,) the value of the boats, including cargoes, lost by snags alone, which could have been easily removed, is estimated at $1,362,500.

From 1827 to 1832, (five years,) owing to the appropriations made by Congress to remove these obstacles, we find that the losses are reduced to $381,000; and this, notwithstanding the number of boats had, in the meanwhile, largely increased. Had those efforts been followed up vigorously, the navigation of these rivers would now be comparatively safe; but they have been neglected, and a frightful loss of life and property had been the consequence. During the seventeen months preceding last December, seventy two steamboats, worth, apart from their cargoes, $1,200,000, had been destroyed: at least sixty-five of this number had been lost upon the snags and bars which a small expenditure could have removed. A statement was laid on our tables this morning, showing the value of the property lost on each one of these rivers, in 1840, 1841, and 1842, from which it will be seen that the gross amount of property lost in those three years was $2,532,078. He regretted that it was not in his power to show the vast number of lives lost within that period.

Besides the obstructions already alluded to, there are some of a legislative character deeply affecting our interests. We are compelled to pay enormous tolls to the Louisville Canal Company, in which the General Government has invested $290,200. That company has for some years past been dividing 18 per cent. (the maximum allowed by law) amongst its stockholders, and the General Government has already received a considerable sum over and above the amount paid for its stock. A steamboat worth $25,000, of 300 tons burden, must pay $180 every time it passes up or down the Ohio; and this is, of course, a tax upon our commerce, in part for the benefit of the Federal Government. The Government should, in his opinion, purchase the whole amount of the stock, and make the navigation of the river entirely free; or else take the necessary steps to reduce the tolls to a reasonable amount. We are also compelled, in consequence of the dangers in the navigation of these rivers, to pay a further tax of from 12 to 16 per cent. to effect an insurance upon our boats.

With these facts before the House, he called upon gentlemen to say whether the public interest did not demand that this appropriation should pass? Will gentlemen, whose duty it is to look to the interests of the whole country, and so legislate as to advance it, refuse to give us $150,000 to a work, the magnitude of which has been so fully established? Will they suffer our property to be lost, our commerce ruined, and the lives of our people destroyed, for the want of a few dollars from the national treasury to remove the snags and bars in these waters? He appealed to the generosity—to the magnanimity—to the justice of gentlemen, in behalf of this appropriation. If they turn a deaf ear upon all our entreaties now, let me tell them (said Mr. W.) the day is not far distant when the West will have its proper weight and influence in the national councils. In the next Congress, its relative strength will be much increased; and we, who have always been amongst the first to arm in defence of the country—we, who have patiently borne more than our share of the taxes of the Government, will do to ourselves that justice which you have denied us. He had no idea he would be in the next Congress himself; but he trusted he would be succeeded by some one as devotedly attached to Ohio as he was, and who would be able to do more than he had done to advance her interests. The great West, in her rapid career, must ere long control the destinies of the republic, and her interests could not much longer be overlooked.

SPEECH OF MR. G. DAVIS,

OF KENTUCKY.

In the House of Representatives, January 19, 1843—Against the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill to repeal the bankrupt act passed the House of Representatives.

Mr. SPEAKER: I voted for the repeal of the bankrupt law, and I shall vote against the reconsideration of the act of repeal that has passed this House. In this course, my justification is, that I represent the deliberate will of my constituents. I conceive that it is not the duty of the Representative to hearken to mere popular ebullition—and, indeed, where he has important information, not possessed by those whom he represents, he may often be under the highest obligations to act contrary to their opinions; but upon measures which they have had time and opportunity to examine, and have come to a considerate judgment upon, it would be infidelity on his part not to submit himself to their will. The bankrupt law has been scanned by my constituents, with all the lights afforded by repeated and elaborate discussions in Congress and in the newspapers; they, by a large majority, condemn it unequivocally; and my relation of Representative to them requires my conformity.

This debate, though, has wandered from the particular subject under consideration, and has assumed a general political character, which I neither condemn nor regret, as I believe it will be beneficial to the country. There is always time enough for proper legislation; indeed, one of the besetting vices of our system is too much legislation. In my opinion, if one-half of every session was employed in revising ill-digested legislation, exposing and correcting the perversion and non-execution of the laws, scrutinizing administrative abuses and delinquency, and holding in check the inherent and ever active tendency of the Executive to absorb all the powers of the Government, it would be well appropriated. This cannot be done without the existence of conflicting parties; and I rejoice that such do, as they ever will, exist in our country, whilst it preserves the form and the spirit of freedom. But I utterly reject the definition of party, as given by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] from this view. He tells us that party is "an association of men seeking to get into power." This is pithy and comprehensive, and accurately defines the clique to which he now belongs. It is faction, profligate faction. Parties are formed upon a difference of opinion in relation to legislative or administrative measures; they now divide, and they have always divided, the American people; and where they are characterized by moderation, love of country and of truth, they constitute the good genius of popular liberty. I admit that they are too often degraded, by commingling the objects and spirit of faction in their operations; and yet it is a source of abiding gratification to me, that if the Whig party now held the power of this Government, it would be continually subject to the scrutiny and assaults of a strong and talented opposition. Irresponsible power is the greatest of corrupting influences upon men; and I hope never to see its existence in our system. Animated by this spirit, I propose to enter into this discussion, and to make some strictures upon the existing Administration, and upon those who support it.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] commenced his speech this morning by assuming a most extraordinary and unwarrantable position. He deliberately said to this House, that, at the extra session of Congress, an only alternative was presented to gentlemen—"either the support of the constitutional Administration of the Government, under the lead of the President, or of a factious anarchy, under the lead of an ex-Senator from Kentucky," [Mr. Clay.] I would ask the gentleman if the principles of the Senator had not been distinctly and repeatedly unfolded in measures which he, with characteristic frankness, had urged both upon Congress and upon the country, almost times without number, during the last twenty years? and whether the gentleman himself had not given a long, oft-renewed, and unqualified adhesion to those measures? Did that distinguished individual put forth any new principles, or originate any new measures? He only proposed and advocated those measures which formed the distinctive policy of the Whig party, and which involved the great principles that constitute the peculiar canons of its political faith. But the gentleman tells us measures are not principles. If his meaning be, that the seven principles are his, and that measures are not his principles, I agree with him; but it is not so with true Whigs. All the measures which we support involve important principles; and we measure the value of public men by the ability and fidelity with which they maintain them.

But let us look something further into this charge of factious anarchy, which the gentleman charges Mr. Clay and the Whigs to have produced in the Government at the extra session. He has reiterated this allegation frequently, and in various forms. In a former speech on this subject, he says: "We have seen the Whig party hurl itself, in the madness of desperation, against the fixed and immovable Government and Constitution; and that party had been dashed to pieces at its feet." Again: "If you will not co-operate with the President in carrying on the Government, which is your highest duty, he must seek the aid of your adversaries." The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KENNEDY] follows in a speech, and takes to himself and his associates (the Democrats) great credit for supporting the administration of John Tyler, whom he pronounces to be an honest old soul. This patriotic pretension has often been made by that party and its prints; but how arrogantly and falsely, will be seen.

During the last Congress, the Democrats had the majority in both Houses; and yet they not only refused to make appropriations to pay debts to a large amount, which they themselves had contracted and left unpaid, but they wilfully neglected to appropriate money necessary for the current public service, and even to provide the ways and means to raise the sums which they did vote. The presidential election was impending, and their purpose was to produce a seeming, but illusive, retrenchment. The consequence would have been, but for the extra session, and the additional revenues them raised by Whig measures, that there would have been a deficit in the treasury, at the end of the current year, of about five millions of dollars, or the disbursements for all objects (amounting to nearly a full quarter) must have ceased. Such was the condition of affairs produced by the legislation of the Democratic party, when John Tyler took possession of the executive chair. In view of it, and of the disordered state of the currency and general monetary concerns of the country, President Harrison had called an extraordinary session of Congress. There were passed, during that session, acts for the following objects: Appropriating between twenty-three and twenty-four thousand dollars to Mrs. Harrison; repealing the sub-treasury; distributing the proceeds of the public lands; establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy; to pay arrears and make further appropriations for carrying on the Florida war; to continue operations on certain fortifications; to pay the debts of the General Post Office; to restore the naval pension fund; to borrow twelve millions of dollars; to lay impost duties on free articles of importation; and two bills to establish a bank, or fiscal agent. Of these twelve distinct measures, the President recommended and sustained the first ten; they were administrative measures, as was also the second bank bill—for Mr. Tyler made Messrs. Webster and Ewing (his Secretaries of State and the Treasury) special ambassadors to the Whigs of Congress, to tender to them that project. He reviewed the state of the treasury in his first message in June, and assumed that, as early as the 1st September ensuing, there would be a deficit of upwards of four millions of dollars. These measures were necessary, then, to replenish an exhausted treasury, to redeem the Government from the opprobrium of defalcation in the payment of its honest debts, and to enable the President to conduct the ordinary public service, involving the military defences of the country. Mr. Clay and the Whigs supported them, and carried them triumphantly through Congress; and yet the gentleman from Massachusetts, the peculiar and the ablest friend of the President on this floor, has the assurance to proclaim, in debate, that the only alternative which was offered to gentlemen at the extra session, was "either the support of the constitutional administration of the Government, under the President, or of a factious anarchy, under the lead of an ex-Senator from Kentucky." The gentleman from Indiana and his associates (the Democrats) perseveringly opposed in debate and voted against, each and all those measures; and they, with a modesty equal to that of their coadjutor of Massachusetts, are continually rebuking the Whigs for their factious opposition to John Tyler, and vociferating that they are the honest and fair supporters of his administration.

The case may yet be presented stronger for the Whigs. At the last session of Congress, there were passed for the support of the Government, and especially to enable the President to administer his department, the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill; the military appropriation bill; the Indian appropriation bill; the naval appropriation bill; the fortification bill; the loan bill; the bill to raise additional revenue by increased impost duties; the remedial justice bill; and the treasury-note bill. The most of these bills were to supply the very fuel and oil which was necessary to keep the machine of Government in motion; and three of them were absolutely required to replenish a heavy deficit in the treasury, which still existed. Mr. Clay sustained each of these measures as had been introduced before he resigned his seat in the Senate. The Whigs advocated all of them in argument, and passed them by their votes. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KENNEDY] voted against all, as did his political friends, except a small number who went for the treasury-note bill, because it was of the category of their system of policy. The gentleman from Massachusetts was the supporter of the whole of these measures; influenced, no doubt, as much by his loyalty to the administration of John Tyler, as his love of country. The only difference between him and the Whigs, was, that he changed his former position upon the question of the disposition of the proceeds of the public lands, and warmly espoused the President's cherished notion of restoring them to the treasury. It is true, the gentleman endeavored to fortify the new ground which he had assumed with some nonsensical jargon—that the lands were indispensable as security for the loan which Congress had authorized; and the public credit could not and would not be reinstated, so as to induce capitalists to purchase this stock, until the law distributing the proceeds of the lands should be repealed or suspended. This was done; but still the public credit continued as inanimate as before. Moneyed men ceased not to distrust our means and our faith, to contemn the loan, and to despise the feebleness and hesitancy of the Government. The tariff bill—so coldly approved by the President—will eventually revive public credit. The treasury project of a charter of a United States Bank, which received the sanction of the President and his cabinet, was opposed in one of its features by the Whigs, but totally by the Democrats. The main distinctive measure of the Administration (the exchequer) is opposed by both parties. Does not this review demonstrate that the atrocious charge made by the gentleman from Massachusetts against the Whig party and its great leader is wholly calumnious, and without foundation? Does it not expose the bold impudence of the Democrats, in their assumption that the Whigs deny to John Tyler the means of administering the Government, and they are the honest and patriotic supporters of his administration? It is by this game of bold, ambidextrous, and reckless assumption, that the Democrats have seized and held on to the power which has ruled this nation for the last fourteen years. Their new ally [Mr. CUSHING] has gloated upon its success; and, in combination with them, has attempted again to play it off, and with a good deal of success, upon an abused people; but the illusion is fast passing away.

There were two other positions in the speech of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KENNEDY,] which strongly arrested my attention. He warned his friends that if they passed their sub-treasury in the next Congress, John Tyler would veto it. He advised them against such a course, and avowed that he would never vote for any measure which was threatened with a veto. He justified the removals from office by the Administration for difference of opinion, and declared that it would be right and proper for John Tyler to remove all men from office who were not his supporters, and fill their places with his friends. The gentleman tells us that he is a Hoosier; but it cannot be that, in giving utterance to these opinions, he correctly represents the wild and free spirits which roam the ocean prairies and primeval forests of Indiana. The young and sturdy Freedom of the great West, unfettered as the wave of the Father of Waters, recognizes no such slavish sentiments. It would rather proclaim, in tones of thunder, that no President is the great feudatory of this nation, with 50,000 places as his fiefs, to be granted to his slaves and vassals, and to be reclaimed by his own lordly will; that the Presidency itself, and all other offices, are only tolerated because they are necessary to the social system; and that the greatest good to the people is the only consideration which should guide in appointments and removals. It would thus expostulate with this Representative: You are to support measures as they are wise, and good, and necessary; and you are not to desert them, or to falter in your duty, because any President brandishes the veto at them. You are a portion of the legislative power of this Union. You are sworn to support the Constitution, which separates the law-making from the executive power; and the principle of action which you avow, leads to the assumption of all legislative power by the President, and the certain subversion of our whole system. The natural and ever-acting tendency of a single executive in free governments is to absorb all political power; and, instead of making such an extensive surrender, it is your duty to dispute every act of aggression upon your department. I have the kindest feelings for the gentleman from Indiana. He has an excellent natural mind, and strong common sense; but he is giving melancholy evidence of the progress and of the fatal fruits of the spoils principle, and the abuse of the veto power in the administration of the Government. The adjustment of the veto power is proved, by experience, to be one of the greatest defects in our system. A proposition to the convention which formed the Constitution to make this power absolute, would probably not have received a single vote; and yet, in its present form, it is practically absolute. So controlling is the influence which this power itself—the power of appointment and removal to fifty thousand offices, and other great powers—confers upon the President, that it has never been, and all concur that it never will be, overruled by the constitutional majority of two-thirds of both Houses. When practice proves it to be unqualified in its operation, and it is conceded that those who made the Constitution did not intend, and could not have been induced, to give it that form, the case for its modification is made out—unless it is an important conservative principle in our Government. Such has been argued to be its character, among other reasons, because it is vested in the President; and that this office is the most democratic feature of the Government, inasmuch as he is elected by all the people of the United States. This view is specious, but altogether unsound. Judges are elected in some of the States by the people of their districts; yet they do not represent democracy, nor act democratically—nor would they, if they were elected by the whole people of the State. Some of the worst tyrants that have ever lived have been elected by the people of the country which they afterwards oppressed. Whether an office partakes more of a despotic or a democratic cast, whether the incumbent is more apt to act from his own will or the popular will, depends rather upon the extent of the powers, and the manner in which they are exercised by him, than the nature of the authority which places him in office. The President is elected for four years. He is located for his term in this city, for the daily discharge of his duties. Without the grossest abuse and corruption in office, he can be held to no legal or constitutional responsibility. He is totally exempt from that moral responsibility which results from daily association with those who trusted him with power. He has no personal knowledge of their condition, their interests, their wants, or their wills, because he is necessarily separated from them; and, if this was not the case, they are immensely too numerous for him to acquire this knowledge. In most of his official acts, he has no law but his own discretion—his own absolute and irreversible will. Those whom he generally sees are officers dependent upon his pleasure and caprice for their continuance in place, or to fill offices for which they are making to him humble suit; and it is their interest and practice to flatter him, and to tell him his will, whatever it may be, is the popular will. Power and parasites are certain to corrupt him, in a greater or less degree; and he becomes suspicious of, and inimical to, all and everything which may thwart his purposes. Selfish, sinister, and adroit men pour falsehood and flattery into his ear; kindle ambition, revenge, and evil passions in his heart; and pervert to wicked and mischievous purposes his authority: and he cannot be relied upon as representing and reflecting correctly the great public opinion of the nation. The design was, when this power acted, that it should soar above the reign of faction; but it has proved to be a dangerous auxiliary of it. The President is generally the head of a party; and, when he is in unison with his friends, it adds vastly to their strength and efficiency: when they revolt against his dictation, or, from motives of patriotism, pass wholesome measures to which he is opposed, (and this has sometimes happened,) he can strangle them with the veto. When the people rise up against the President and the party dominant in Congress, and send a majority for a different course of policy, he thwarts and defeats their will by the one-man power. It is alien and unfriendly to our institutions: it ought to be modified; for it is aiding greatly in their gradual but certain subversion.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] denominates (as he often does) the President to be the Government, and represents the majority of the present Congress as "dashing itself to atoms at its feet." My understanding is, that our Government is the organized political power which rules these United States. Louis XIV. said he was the state; and I have seen John Tyler compared in the court journal to the Grand Monarque: but, when Washington, and Hamilton, and Madison, and Jay, were forming the most complicated system of Government that has ever existed, and were separating its powers into three co-ordinate branches, and constituting the President the mere head of a subordinate one, I imagine that they had no design that any President—and especially such a one as John Tyler—should be the living, active, operating impersonation of the Government of the United States. No, no; that is rather strong even for court sycophancy! But, throughout his speech, whenever the gentleman refers to the President, he speaks of him as "the Government." I will read a paragraph or two from the gentleman's speech:

"In this state of things," Mr. C. said, "he knew not how far parties might split, whether from difference in opinion or from personal relations. He could see, in the race for the Presidency, no individual who, so far as he could judge, presented an overwhelming, irresistible power. Looking to overt acts as the criterion, he would say there was no such competitor. He understood there was to be a Whig convention, and there was to be also a Democratic convention; and he did not know that they might not agree. [A laugh.] But there were certain buddings—some early blossoms of discord—which might lead to a doubt as to what would be the precise course of the convention. However this might be, this he did know, that, during a year and a half to come, there must be great popular commotions and discussions. Whether a candidate might be nominated by each convention or not, this he knew——and why should he not say it? He thought, on the whole, he had better say it: [several voices—'Oh, yes, do say it, do:'] it would not be for the political interest of any one of the parties to carry on a very furious war against the Administration and its friends.

[Here Mr. C. was brought to a pause by peals of laughter, and cries, "Ah, that's a tender point."]

"Mr. C. said that he considered it as material that there should be a frank understanding on these matters. There were men in the Administration, or connected with the Administration, who, at a proper time, might have a word to say. He did not know whether their voice would be potential; but this he did know, that of all the elements now in tumultuous and conflicting motion in the national cauldron—in the grand political seething-pot—the most potential of all was the Federal Government, (President.) [Cries of 'Oh, yes—it has the offices!'] No; not by the distribution of office—not by the power of patronage. No; he went deeper—it was by the constitutional power of the Federal Government, (President.) Let gentlemen go back to the extra session. An important measure had been proposed by the Administration; a committee had reported upon it; it was pushed along through the Houses, when lo, there came a veto! There were consequences; yes, and the relation held by Administration measures to the action of Congress, showed that there was a power which the Constitution gave to the Government (President) to act upon events and effect results, that was a hundred fold greater than all its powers of mere patronage."

In another part of his speech, the gentleman said: "I would say to gentlemen of all parties in this House, and more especially to gentlemen constituting the majority in Congress, If you will not co-operate with the President in carrying on the Government, which is your highest duty, he must seek the aid of your adversaries. If you Whigs will lock the wheels of Government, I trust aid will be found in the Democrats; and thus, and thus only, I present the question to the House." Is it not strange that this gentleman, having used this language, should boldly challenge any man to make good the position, that he offered to barter to party the power and influence of John Tyler and his administration? He is their trusted and confidential organ in this House. His object is not to get from Congress all proper aid to enable the President to administer his department; for that has been, in a spirit of patriotism, liberally afforded by the Whigs, and by the Whigs only. His purpose is the same which the Executive has been steadily and systematically pursuing for upwards of twelve years. It is, to draw to the President the absolute control of the initiation, the form, and fate of all measures of legislation. The particular measure at this time is the exchequer. He proclaims on this floor, that parties may split from differences of opinion and personal relations; that both the Democratic and Whig parties were to hold national conventions; that there were a legion of aspirants to the office of the Presidency, whose pretensions were to be discussed, and to excite greatly the public mind for a year and a half to come; that it was altogether doubtful who would get the Whig and Democratic nominations; and of all the causes by which parties, sections of parties, and men, were to be put up and put down, the most potential was the President and his administration; that the Whigs had refused their support to the exchequer, and the other attempts of John Tyler to control the legislation of Congress; that if the Democrats, and any section of the Whigs, would lend themselves to that end, the President and the Administration would not only use all the patronage to their aggrandizement, but would also bring to bear in their favor the veto power, which, "to act upon events and effect results, was a hundred fold greater than all the mere power of patronage," and could control "the national policy." I appeal to candid men who heard the gentleman, if I have not fairly presented his points and his positions. And was the moral sense of this nation ever before outraged with anything so shameless and profligate? Shades of Washington and Madison!—was it ever dreamed that the executive power which you fashioned and established, to be exercised in a spirit of lofty, pure, and enlightened patriotism, should be wielded by an Administration which would cast away all standard of political morality, and come into Congress by their accredited agent, and offer to prostitute their whole patronage, and even the sprig of kingly prerogative—the veto, which the gentleman says, truly, is so potent—that it might acquire the power to usurp the legislation of the Government, and that by the degradation and corruption of Congress? No President has a right to any other political influence, except that moral power which wise and just measures, and a faithful and vigilant administration of his department, will certainly give him; and he ought not to be tolerated to resort to any other means to obtain it.

But this proposition is as deceitful as it is infamous. John Tyler has never kept faith with any party; his object is to get a seeming present support from one of the parties in Congress, and to trust to events to make it permanent. When the time comes, he would add another to his long list of treacheries. Shortly after the Presidency fell upon him, he, by his Secretary of State—in analogy to the English premiership—addressed a pompous but hollow proclamation to the Secretary of the Treasury, in which it is declared: "He (the President) therefore directs the information to be given to all the officers of agents in your department of the public service, that partisan interference in popular elections, whether of State officers or of this Government, and for whomsoever or against whomsoever it may be exercised, will be regarded by him as cause of removal." In his first annual message he says, on the subject of removal, that his own conduct had "been governed by a conscientious purpose to exercise the removing power only in cases of unfaithfulness or inability, or in those in which its exercise appeared necessary, in order to discountenance and suppress the spirit of active partisanship on the part of the holders of office, which not only withdraws them from the steady and impartial discharge of their official duties, but exerts an undue and injurious influence over elections, and degrades the character of the Government itself, inasmuch as it exhibits the chief magistrate as being a party, through his agents, in the secret plots or open workings of political parties." These sentiments are eminently just and proper; and does it not exhibit a hardihood, an obtusity to dishonor almost incredible, that the very men who have so recently proclaimed them to the nation, should offer to desecrate, in the mode which they thus prescribe, the whole executive power of the Government? If the offences which they denounce are dangerous and scandalous, that which they have committed is abhorrent, and tends to revolution by means of corruption.

The gentleman [Mr. CUSHING] treats the President as the great ruling power of the Government, and Congress as a subordinate incidental department, whose business is merely to co-operate in giving effect to his views. I take issue with the gentleman, and maintain that, in all free Governments, and especially in ours, the legislative branch is predominant. Popular liberty has nowhere existed, nor will it long exist, under any other adjustment of power. Congress is invested with the high powers of declaring war, providing all the means by which it is waged, and for the public defence; borrowing and appropriating money; creating and paying public debts; imposing taxes; coining money; regulating commerce with foreign nations and among the States; defining and punishing treason and felonies, &c.; and is expressly made the repository of all the undefined powers that may be necessary and proper to execute those which the Constitution has conferred upon it, upon the other departments, and upon every officer of the Government—even this puissant President himself. His principal power—which is greater and more operative than the whole aggregate besides—is to execute the laws the imbodied will of Congress, which he binds himself in his oath of office to do. Congress may impeach him, and expel him from his place. Congress is, and was intended by the framers of the Constitution to be, the chief power; the President is but the incident. There is no higher or more arduous duty devolving upon this House than to do its part, moderately but resolutely, to preserve this constitutional relation of the two departments.

It seems to be the purpose of the gentleman and the Administration to introduce the English system by which the ministry has the iniation and the control of all the principal measures of legislation; but the effort is to withhold from Congress the overruling control which Parliament, and especially the House of Commons, exerts in these matters. We deny that England is a free country; and yet her House of Commons has more influence and efficiency in her Government than has the House of Representatives in ours. The public opinion of the nation speaks potentially through the House of Commons; and no minister can hold his place, no war can be continued, no measure or course of policy can be perseveringly urged or opposed by the King or ministry against the will of the nation as spoken by the Commons. It was this House that forced George the Third to terminate the war of our revolution, by an acknowledgment of our independence; that carried the emancipation of the Catholics against all the opposition of the King, and the more stubborn and imperious Duke of Wellington; and that effected that great pacific revolution, the reform of its own representation. No minister can stand against the judgment and the vote of the House of Commons; and when he is there defeated upon any measure or important proposition, it is his imperative signal to throw up his seals of office; and there is named as his successor one who immediately conforms the Executive Government to the will of the people as thus spoken. So, when the ministry seems to be fashioning legislation according to its own will, it is, in truth, submitting to the mandates of the House of Commons. The gentleman and our republican Administration want to be subordinate to no such influence; their attempt is to raise the President above all control, and to degrade Congress to a mere registry of his edicts.

The gentleman has often inveighed against the despotism of Congress. Sir, a numerous popular representation and a despotism never did, and never can exist, together. Such a body may commit occasional acts of injustice and oppression, but it is impossible for it to maintain a systematic, persevering, and enduring tyranny; it has too many diverse wills, interests, and ends. It fluctuates so rapidly in all these elements of action, and in its personnel, that its neutralizes, checks, and reverses fitfully its own decisions; it it were otherwise, it has neither the means nor the aptitude for their efficient execution. It is the undivided, secret, rapid, energetic will of a single Executive, dispensing office and honors, wielding the purse and the sword, and transmitted from individual to individual by succession or election, which all history proves to be the great enemy of popular liberty. This is the power in our system which her votaries ought to watch with sleepless vigilance; for its advance here has been quite as rapid and threatening as in most countries whose freedom it has cloven down. Sir, instead of being able to maintain the firm, rigorous, and iron rule of despotism, the natural tendency of a large representative body, frequently elected, is not only to liberty, but also to licentiousness; and it is in part to correct this inherent vice, that other branches of our Government than this House have been constituted. But all experience establishes this truth—that such assemblies are the natural and most potent enemies of despotism. What is the history of modern English liberty? Formerly, the mass of that people were not recognised in her political system; the third estate and its House of Commons had its origin under Edward 3d; but there was no popular freedom in the island for two centuries afterwards. Henry 8th wrested the spiritual authority over his dominions from the See of Rome, and united it with the absolute civil and political power which he possessed. His purpose was not to ameliorate the condition of the Protestants, but to sway an undivided temporal and spiritual power in his own realm. He was one of the most absolute and bloody tyrants that ever reigned. He could not only suspend the law, but his proclamations had the force and the sanction of laws; and, during his reign, more than seventy-two thousand persons perished by execution. Elizabeth was not less proud and imperious in disposition; she, too, exercised the suspending power, and vetoed, some sessions, more than half the acts which Parliament passed. Under her rule, industry spread, the arts and commerce flourished, the wealth and consideration of the commons rapidly increased, and the spirit of liberty grew with their affluence, intelligence, and strength. Their murmurs began to alarm, their voice to be heeded, and their wrongs to be redressed by the haughty Tudor. They remonstrated by their House of Parliament with the imperial virago herself against abuses by monopolies; she had the sagacity to discern that there was a spirit up, not to be trifled with; she curbed the hot blood of her father, and with great judgment and tact graciously corrected the evil. James 1st had as much attachment to power and prerogative, but not the courage or talent to maintain them; he was constantly making issues with Parliament, but was too feeble for the conflict; the consequence was, the spirit of liberty and of the commons grew apace. When Charles 1st came to the throne, it had acquired strength and resolution enough to defy and to conquer the perils which awaited it. It numbered among its champions a Milton and a Hampton, a Cromwell and a Bunyan. It was mixed up with the hysterical tears, the austere form, and the gloomy enthusiasm of the religion of the Puritans; but it was nevertheless upheld by prudence and sound sense, by genius and attainment, by activity and fortitude, and by a devotion which no danger could awe, no treasure could corrupt, no honors could seduce, nothing could shake. It was fully equal to one of the greatest of human events—the dethronement and the execution of Charles. All that is valuable in English or American liberty, civil or religious, is due to the Puritans, and the House of Commons of the Long Parliament; they stormed the main citadel of despotic power; their successors have been marshalled by their example, from conquest to conquest in the overthrow of the weaker ones. The freedom of England has been won, by ages of heroic struggle on the part of her House of Commons, from her tyrant kings. It is a magnificent fabric, which nobly vindicates numerous representative assemblies of the people from the foul aspersion of a tendency to despotism.

The gentleman occupies a strange position, and puts forth extraordinary notions, considering the measures and principles which he always, until the commencement of this Administration, advocated with so much zeal and ability. I had read many of his speeches before I knew him. I admired his talents and attainments; I approved of the soundness of his views, and was instructed and fortified in my own. But he is wonderfully metamorphosed; and I think if he will examine the matter deliberately, he will find it to be quite as true, that he has broken his neck politically in jumping his somersets, as that "the Whig party has knocked out its brains against the fixed fact." He tells us that party is nothing but an association of men struggling for power; and that he contemns measures—that measures are not principles. The gentleman must have been reading the celebrated treatise, "The Prince," for such dicta are of the school of Machiavelli; and his sudden and total abandonment of all the principles as well as measures, to which he was as strongly pledged as any Whig, good and true, proves that he had studied his lesson to some purpose. At the extra session of 1837, he opposed the sub-treasury in a very elaborate speech, in which we find these passages: "We are to have a Government paper-currency, recognisable by the Government of the United States, and employed in its dealings; but it is to be irredeemable Government paper." "If the scheme were not too laughingly absurd to spend time in arguing about it seriously; if the mischiefs of a Government paper currency had not had an out-and-out trial both in Europe and America, I might discuss it as a question of political economy. But I will not occupy the committee in this way. I am astounded at the fatuity of any set of men who can think of any such project." "I welcome the general idea that Government should not be ever prone to interfere in the private pursuits of the citizen. One of the mischiefs of the times has been the meddlesome interference of General Jackson in the business of the country—his prurient tampering with the currency under the pretext of reforming it. This is the very thing I would prevent. It is one reason why I am against a marriage of Bank and State. I wish to have banks the business agents, not the party hacks, of the Administration. I oppose the sub-treasury for the same reason. If adopted, it would enable the Government to put up exchange or to put down exchange, and to produce fluctuations in the money-market at will. It would place the whole commerce and business of the United States at the arbitrary mercy of the President of the United States." He gave, then, a definition of a bank, and avowed the sub-treasury to be a Government bank; and upon those and other objections which are unanswerable, he pertinaciously opposed that measure for three years; and, it having been forced upon him and the country, at the earliest opportunity he voted for its repeal. Now, he is the unscrupulous advocate of the exchequer, a measure embodying both the sub-treasury and a great organized Government bank, and taught with more frightful dangers than his own excited imagination had pictured in the whole three years.

He was one of the staunchest supporters of a United States Bank. He characterized "the refusal of the late President (Jackson) to sign the bill rechartering the bank, like the removal of the deposites, to be in defiance and violation of the popular will." He argued that a mixed circulation of coin and paper was irreversably fixed upon the country, and asks: "But how shall the paper circulation be supplied? and how regulated? The plain, obvious, straightforward course would be to hearken to the voice of experience, and to follow out the analogies of our political institutions. Twice, for long periods of time, have we tried a national bank, and in each period it has fulfilled its appointed purpose of supplying a safe and equal currency, and of regulating and controlling the issues of the State banks. Twice have we tried for a few years to drag on without a national bank, and each of these experiments has been a season of disaster and confusion." And yet, sir, he has denied that he was ever the supporter of a bank of the United States, and is now one of the most rabid revilers of such an institution.

He was for Mr. Clay's land bill; and he has abandoned, and now contemns it. No man has been more frequent and unsparing in his denunciations of General Jackson; and now he is the sycophantic eulogist of the old hero. He was the unflinching defender of the constitutional rights and powers of Congress. This Administration has not only resorted to the most flagitious abuse of the veto power, but has renewed every other assault, open or insidious, of Presidents Jackson and Van Buren upon Congress, which he, at the time, so indignantly rebuked; and he now justifies them all. He has gone far ahead of the extremest parasites of executive power. John Tyler vetoed four acts of Congress which the gentleman had voted for, and strange, by his subtle sophistry, he defended each of the vetoes; and most strange, when the House, in conformity to the provisions of the Constitution, voted again upon the measures, his vote was recorded in their favor, and to overrule the very vetoes of which he had just been the venal advocate. He has proclaimed that the President is a co-ordinate branch of the legislative power; that "the President has as much right to discuss Congress, as Congress has to discuss him;" that this House has no more right to require of the Executive any paper in the departments, than the President has to demand of it the papers in the custody of its clerk. He has sweepingly, again and again, condemned the present Congress—its measures, its spirit, and its action; and, in the manner of prophetic railing, he has warned us that we are rushing on to our destiny.

This same gentleman, in 1837, made a speech in this House, which contains an analysis of the Constitution, among the soundest, most instructive, and condensed, I have ever seen. I will read a passage or two from it. "The powers vested in the President, by the Constitution, are partly expressly enumerated, and the rest are such as Congress may see fit to intrust to the President, either under the several specific powers granted to Congress, or under the general power, which closes the enumeration, and is suppletory to all the rest." "To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or any officer or department thereof." Here is the life-giving clause; the grant to Congress to infuse vitality into the undefined powers of the executive.

Again: "Yet we have, in late times, seen the principal officers of the executive departments treated as the mere servants of the President—the humble instruments of his supreme will; instead of what the Constitution supposes—the agents of the law of the land, and the instruments of Congress as well as the President."

He then enters into some very cogent reasoning, and concludes, "that the vitality of the functions of the executive, under the Constitution, is to be infused into them by the legislation of Congress."

He then proceeds to a general enumeration of the abuses of President Jackson, and continues: "I denounce these acts of the Administration, and the pretences of power by which they are sought to be defended, as the crowning evidences of the means of corruption, and the scope for usurpation, which these functions afford."

"First. I conclude, as the general inference, that the powers of the Executive are, as compared with those of Congress, or any other department of the Government, particularly susceptible of abuse; that they have been abused; and that they have a persevering tendency continually to increase."

"In the second place, I conclude, as the other general inference, that the remedy for the abuses to which I have referred, is, to diminish the power and influence of the Executive. The salvation of the Government depends upon it."

"A wise and a brave people, it has been well said, will neither be cheated nor bullied out of liberty. But such a people may cease to be vigilantly wise—to be unshakingly brave—by resigning themselves to the treacherous and corrupt influences of power. Would to God some divine afflatus might descend upon the Constitution, to resuscitate and animate its enfeebled energies; that the voice of the Almighty, from the empyreal height where he sits enthroned, penetrating the clouds which surround us, would say, even to these dry bones of the Constitution: 'Live! be thou once more a creature of health and strength, to go forth, in the majesty of thy beauty, a ministering angel, on a mission of blessings to the world.'"

He concluded by offering this preamble:

"Whereas the influence of the executive department of the Government has, for some time past, in derogation of the letter and spirit of the Constitution, continued to increase, and ought to be diminished."

It was followed by two resolutions; the first of which proposed to refer so much of the President's message as relates to the collection, safekeeping, and transfer of the public moneys, to a select committee, with instructions to report such method of effecting these objects "as would most promote the public welfare, and secure the liberties of the people."

"Secondly, such other reforms in the practice of the Government as, in their opinion, shall tend to bring back the administration thereof to the standard of the original purity of the Constitution."

There was no abuse in the executive administration of General Jackson which does not now exist in an aggravated form, and which the gentleman does not now justify—except Congress is not degraded to be the employing tool of John Tyler. And this is its sin! This is the cause that John Tyler and his constitutional advisers are daily pouring out their ribald abuse. It is for this reason that the most miserable faction that ever existed is constantly hurling rancorous, but pointless, denunciation against the majority of this House; that those who compose it are so often reading us lectures against ultraism, and in favor of patriotism, whilst they are in the very plenitude of venality, and of factious animosity. The gentleman tells us, in the speech read from, that the President can exercise no power not expressly conferred upon him by the Constitution, without the interposition of congressional legislation; and yet he has here declared, with pointed emphasis, that the power of removal—an implied power—is vested by the Constitution in the President alone; that he cannot be interfered with in its exercise. Is Mr. Caleb Cushing of Massachusetts, Mr. Caleb Cushing of Massachusetts? or is he some other person? He says we are for recurring to obsolete ideas; he is for the principles of progress, and keeping up with the improvements of the age. We deny that his innovation is improvement. We cautiously adopt principles which stand the test of experiment; but we totally reject his heinous political Mormonism.

But the gentleman, in his tergiversations and apostacy, is but following, and at humble distance, the lead of a greater man—Daniel Webster. I have no unfounded prejudices against the Secretary of State: I once admired him as much as his most devoted friends do. I still regard him as a man of stupendous mind—an intellectual Titan—and, in some departments of mental operations, equal, probably, to the greatest of ancients or moderns. But the closet, and not the great, living, active, executive theatre of the world, is his appropriate field. He has nothing of what is commonly called genius, and is defective in invention; his superiority results from great and general intellectual power. His mind is a vast crucible, into which the world's intellectual wealth may be heaved; and he can analyze it all, and reproduce it in forms of new and magnificent utility. In his senatorial career, he has won for himself a civic crown more imperishable than all the bloody laurels of the mightiest conquerors. His speeches upon banks, the currency, and the public revenues, form a solid and regularly built structure, as enduring as the pyramids. In all the powers of logic, argumentation, and composition, he has no superior; and his speeches—parliamentary and forensic—are among the noblest monuments of the intellect of the present day; and will be regarded as models when centuries upon centuries have rolled away. He ought to have belonged to his country, to the age, and to mankind, and to have shown one of the mightiest and brightest spirits; but he wants one-half of such a man—moral sense. "How are the mighty fallen!" He is, indeed, a political Lucifer; and he, too, is great even in his ruin! I once preferred him to all men but one for the Presidency; and if, by the continuance of his services, and fidelity to our cause—to those immortal truths and principles to which he so long devoted himself—he should have won the first place in the confidence of his countrymen, I, and the friends of him whom he will quarrel with as his rival, would have cheerfully acquiesced.

A sub-treasury, a Government paper currency, or a Government bank, cannot be presented in any possible form, that either, or all, are not met and overthrown by Mr. Webster's luminous and unanswerable arguments. Since his connexion with John Tyler—since the lion has been serving the jackall—he has concocted the exchequer, which is a union of two to produce the third; and it has no provision, no faculty, no principle, which cannot be annihilated by a hundred passages from his speeches. He has said more for a bank of the United States—for its utility and indispensable necessity, to both Government and the people—than all living men besides. He never, until he filled his present place, uttered one word to the contrary; but, so late as the fall of 1840, in his speech at Saratoga, reiterated it all. He now rejects and scorns a bank as useless and obsolete, and arrogantly proclaims that it will never get another vote in New England. It is more probable he will never be able to control another vote in New England. He has lauded Mr. Clay's land bill as the wisest measure of a great statesman, and advocated it himself as the foundation stone of the tariff policy; he has also abandoned it. He proclaimed, "under an October sun" of 1840, in the capital of the Old Dominion, that "the power and influence of the executive of our Government had increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished;" and was "dangerous to liberty." He adheres to an Administration that is making every effort to stride on in this course of usurpation, and throws his whole influence against every attempt to reduce it within constitutional limits. He has conclusively demonstrated that the President cannot, constitutionally, remove from place such officers as the Senate have confirmed; and he constantly advises John Tyler to such infractions of the Constitution. In his Virginia speech, he said: "Of all things in a popular Government, a Government press is most to be dreaded. One of the first things to be done, when a new administration shall come into power, will be to separate the Government press from the politics of the country." And as soon as John Tyler resolved to betray his party, then Mr. Webster commenced the most active operations to purchase up for him all the presses in any way connected with the State Department, and to turn their thunders upon the Whig party in Congress. He published the proclamation (before read from) to the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he says: "He (the President) therefore directs the information to be given to all the officers and agents in your department of the public service, that partisan interference in popular elections, whether of State officers or of this Government, and for whomsoever or against whomsoever it may be exercised, will be regarded by him as cause of removal." "But persons employed under the Government, and paid for their services out of the public treasury, are not expected to take an active or officious part in attempts to influence the mind or the votes of others; such conduct being deemed inconsistent with the spirit of the Constitution, and the duties of public agents acting under it." He not only remains a component part of an administration which daily violates a principle it so formally promulged, but he shamelessly tramples upon it himself, by stipulating that his own appointees shall continue the practice which he has proscribed before the whole country. He says, distinctly, to office-seekers, You must not only be against Mr. Clay, but you must be for Mr. Tyler, and you must sustain him. In the same paper, he tells incumbents: "It is not intended that any officer shall be restrained in the free and proper expression and maintenance of his opinion respecting public men or public measures, or in the exercise of the fullest degree of the constitutional right of suffrage." And he now breaks faith with those dependent upon the will of the Administration, by sustaining the expulsion from place, of clerks, tide-waiters, and night-watches; not because they express a preference for another, but because they do not express a preference for John Tyler. The President made him an organ of communication between himself and the Whigs of Congress, and, through him, pledged his faith to approve the second bank charter passed at the extra session; and notwithstanding John Tyler insulted him, by a refusal to redeem the pledge, he degraded himself, by publishing to the country that he knew of no cause for the dissolution of the cabinet, and covered himself with infamy by remaining in it "solitary and alone." He has been guilty, personally, in various ways, of violating the law which he promulged against officers interfering in elections, and to influence the minds of others. He has come to the Capitol, mingled among the members of both Houses, and used persuasions and threats to procure the postponement of measures of great importance to the country, because they were objectionable to the President, although acceptable to himself. He has attempted to seduce members of Congress from their Whig principles, and to come, not to the support of other principles, but of Tylerism. When the other members of the late cabinet were consulting with him, and with each other, upon the propriety of throwing up their places, he exclaimed, "Who is John Tyler? He is nothing! We would crush him as easily as we can the moth in this carpet!" stamping his foot with contemptuous indignation. Now he is a supple courtier, and a fawning sycophant at John Tyler's footstool of power. But the premier knew his master—he is an intellectual moth. When we think of his perfidy, and his political sins, we feel the most indignant resentment; but then we contemplate the imbecility of his mind, and the paltriness of his personal qualities, and it subsides into cold contempt. The most cruel punishment of antiquity was to bind a person to a dead carcase; and this is the only mode in which John Tyler could now be made noxious to either of the existing political parties.

The reason why the active interference of office-holders in elections has been objected to, is to prevent the influence of the Executive from reaching, indirectly, Congress. How dare the Secretary of State approach its members, and throw himself against the passage of measures of legislation? How dare he, and his coadjutor of the War Department, two office-holders, leave their offices and go forth, on the eve of important elections, making political speeches, and writing elaborate addresses, to influence their result? Are these "such services as ought to be paid for out of the public treasury," and as are "consistent with the spirit of the Constitution, and the duties of public agents acting under it," when performed by this pair of notable dignitaries? and yet of so decidedly an opposite character, when done by humble subordinates, as to be cause of removal? Their own law is proper and salutary, and they ought to be punished in conformity to it, by being ejected from their places. If it is not the lust of office which has induced Mr. Webster to cling with so much tenacity, and at such a cost, to his present situation, what is it? The British treaty is negotiated, and still he is as firmly moored in it as ever. "Ill-weaved ambition! how art thou shrunk?" Towards the premier, I admit, I am actuated by a sense of both wrong and injury—for he has done no injury; but the Secretary of War has done nothing but wrong. The immorality of his politics is so notorious as to render him harmless. He had been Clintonian and anti-Clintonian, Jacksonian and anti-Jacksonian, against Tyler, and for him. He has always been willing to be the tool of any party or man who would buy him, and at length he found a purchaser in John Tyler; and the transaction, in open and bold profligacy, challenges in vain a parallel in the annals of this country. John C. Spencer wrote a circular address, convoking the Syracuse convention, in which he denounced John Tyler's administration, and his vetoes, as the exercise of kingly power: in the course of a few days he came on to this city, and solicited, and accepted, the place which he fills. The dishonor of the connexion will stick to him like the poisoned shirt of Nessus. Spencer, and the "guard," and the few others who have abandoned the cause for which they were among the most clamorous, are mere mercenaries, who attached themselves to the Whigs for the spoils, and for the spoils only. Such men might be dangerous as enemies, but they would be much more dangerous as friends and allies; for on any day they would sell country and principles for money and place. We say to them—Off—begone; your presence pollutes our camp, and would tarnish our victory.

The principles and measures of the Whigs were as fully and fairly before the country, in the last presidential canvass, as the principles or measures of any party ever were, or can be. They were boldly submitted, in opposition to those of the Democrats, to the American people; and judgment was, with remarkable distinctness, pronounced in their favor. But for the basest treachery, they would, at the extra session, all have been imbodied in the laws of Congress, and their regenerating influence would long since have been felt by seventeen millions of people; and what a mass of distress and ruin they would have averted from this deeply afflicted country! How many despairing hearts will owe poverty and want, not to the ambition merely, but to the fatuity of one heartless man. If the deep, silent curses of millions of wronged beings could have blasted one wretch from the face of the earth, the mitigation of our ills would now be in successful operation. But it is in the providence of the moral world, that sometimes the weakest and worst of men have the power to achieve an inconceivable amount of mischief; and how grievously is this truth enforced by the present condition of our countrymen.

But the Whigs are neither subdued nor dismayed. They have been temporarily disheartened by the desertion of him whom an unlooked-for event, and not their choice, placed at their head. They folded their arms with mingled feelings of surprise, revulsion, and disgust; but their spirit is not dead—it only slumbers; and when the day of trial comes, it will be terrible to its enemies in its renovated energies. They poise themselves upon the rectitude and utility of their measures; upon the purity and firmness of their purpose; and with calm confidence await the issue. Their Whigery is the same as that which inspired the souls and nerved the arms of our fathers through seven years of toil and blood; and they invoke their countrymen to throng in serried ranks to its support. They have a leader worthy of their trust, and their cause, whose soul quailed not in their darkest adversity; whose rallying voice was heard above the loud shouts of a triumphant enemy; whose devotion wavered not when all but honor seemed to be lost; and whose unconquerable spirit, bearing aloft the standard of another, marshalled us at length to a glorious victory. Who does not know that he is Henry Clay! Though his place is a private station, Henry Clay is in the presence of his country and the world. At the age of nineteen, an unknown and uneducated boy, he burst upon a distant theatre, amidst the exciting scenes of 1798. Even then he grappled with Nicholas, and Breckenridge, and Murray, in the conflict of mind with mind: he rapidly won the ascendant, and he has impressed his noble image upon the gallant State which adopted the stranger boy with such generous enthusiasm. Dauntless in courage and unmatched in genius, the expansive operations of his great soul alone have given him position in the front rank of mankind. His civil achievements adorn every page of his country's history throughout the last generation. As a parliamentary leader, in practical statemanship, in oratory which convinces the reason and rules the passions—in all the high powers of executive capability, he has no equal. Intuitive and accurate apprehension, soundness of judgment, directness and comprehensiveness of mind, and high and honest purpose, are among his distinguishing characteristics. His system of policy is as broad as this confederacy, enlarged as its great and varied interests, and based upon eternal principles and truth. He is ambitious; but he has ever held that turbulent and towering passion strictly subject to the behests of honor, to patriotism, to devotion to constitutional liberty, and to the rights of the people. Neither his services nor his renown have been limited to his own race, or to his own country; but both pervade the civilized world. Exposed for years to the resentments of a great party, his firm, unwavering, consistent, and lofty course has conquered their suspicions and their enmity; and now there is none whose good opinion is of any value, who do not pay homage to his greatness and integrity, and exult in the consciousness that he is their countryman, because of the lustre which he has shed upon the name. He may or may not attain to the Presidency; but he occupies, and will ever occupy, one of the loftiest positions in the moral world—a summit bathed all over in living and glorious light, revealing the whole man as he is, without fear and without reproach. He is our trusted, our well-tried champion—faithful among the faithless—the impersonation of our glorious cause, under whose banner we go forth (politically) to conquer or to perish; and if, in this conflict, we are to fall, you will find

"Our backs to the field and our feet to the foe."

REMARKS OF MR. DAYTON,

OF NEW JERSEY.

In the Senate, February 15, 1843—On Mr. McDUFFIE'S resolutions and the amendments.

Mr. DAYTON said:

The resolutions of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. McDUFFIE,] as well as his remarks in support of those resolutions, assert only general abstract principles, extending to no measure of a practical character for the relief of the country. I was the more disappointed in this, as he alleges that all parties are responsible for the present condition of things.

His abstract principles may be condensed fairly as follows:

In reference to the currency: Do nothing; the country will work out its own salvation. (He might have added, "with fear and trembling.") This principle is not a new one: it was one of the principles of the last Administration, that the currency should take care of itself.

In reference to finance and commerce, his doctrine is, that we should be governed by the legislation of Great Britain; that, if she looks only towards free trade, we are to reciprocate; that our tariff laws are a curse to our revenue, and the legislation of Congress is more destructive to commerce than all the pirates that ever swept the ocean! (By the way, that is the only community of modern times who have ever carried into effect the gentleman's doctrines of free trade.)

These are his principles; and they appear to me to carry with them their own refutation. If they needed an answer, they have had one in full from the gentleman who preceded me. I am thankful, sir, that such principles have not as yet given birth to any measure: what they may do in future, remains to be seen. There is a bird of the desert which deposites its egg in the sands, and leaves it there, to quicken, or addle, as the action of the elements may determine; and it is so of these principles. They are dropped in the public mind; and, should it ever warm them into life, they will break their shell, and we will then see the strange, foreign, anti-American prodigy which shall stalk forth. At present, I content myself with having stated the principles in their baldness, without following the argument.

The resolutions of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. EVANS,] amendatory of those above alluded to, are likewise the assertion of general principles only. In those principles, generally, I heartily concur. But the third, I apprehend, is exceptionable. This resolution, in substance, is: That, while Congress does not intend to adopt any measure for the payment of the debts of the States, yet, "in view of the disastrous consequences to the national character and credit," &c., it "declares that the debts of the several States, created by legislative authority thereof respectively, are obligatory and binding," &c.; and that it is "the duty of the people of said States" to resort to the most efficient means to pay them, &c.

As an individual, I have no doubt of the truth of the above propositions; but, as a member of this body, I prefer substituting my amendment. I am not one of those who see a constitutional scruple behind every bush; but still I would prefer keeping within the line of acknowledged right: more particularly where, as in this case, there is no possible inducement to go out of it.

I did not understand the gentleman's resolutions as holding out the idea, either directly or indirectly, of the assumption of State debts, as has been intimated from the other side of this chamber. The first sentence of the resolution is an express negation of it.

My amendment was with a view—

1. To get rid of that part of the resolution by which we assume to declare what contracts are, or are not, binding upon the States. And—

2. To incorporate into these resolutions something vindicatory of the faith and credit of the Federal Government.

By what authority is it that we have the right to declare, in our legislative character, what obligations between States and strangers are binding? Who and what has constituted us the judge? Is it one of the powers expressly granted, or an incident to any such power? We may talk about ourselves, and say what we will, and what we will not do. But we ought never to say—or, in the language of the resolution, to declare—what others are bound to do, unless we have the clear right to make such declaration.

The position assumed was, that we had the right, because the delinquencies of the States were affecting our national character; and, therefore, the expression of opinion was justified. But surely the Federal Government has no powers originating in any such uncertain, doubtful source. Who is to settle what does and what does not affect our national character, as preliminary to the exercise of this right? Or how much must that character be affected? How hard must be the blow which knocks this latent right, like hidden fire, from the flint? Will the failure of a merchant or a bank do it? These affect our credit, it is said, "pro tanto." But is it the right or duty of this Government to declare the law of the contract between the merchant or bank and its creditor? It is obvious that no power can originate in such a source. But the right was claimed on another ground. It was said that we are the creditor of some of the States, and therefore have a creditor's right to talk; that the Secretary of the Treasury has, no doubt, told these delinquent States the same thing.

I submit to the candor of gentlemen, whether this resolution is based, or purports to be based, upon any such ground. It "declares that the debts of the several States" are binding. What debts, and what States? Not that one whose bonds we happen to hold, but all. But why is it, on the face of this resolution, that we assume to express this opinion? Not because we are creditors; but, in the language of the resolution, "in view of the disastrous consequences to the national character and credit." The expression of an opinion by the Secretary of the Treasury is a very different thing from a declaration of the law of the contract by the American Senate, When it speaks, it ought to be "as one having authority;" and, if without authority, I submit that it had better be silent.

Aside from our doubtful right to declare the law, it strikes me as impolitic. I do desire to keep the credit and faith of the Federal Government distinct from the States; and so I presume do other gentlemen. Yet this mixing up of our national character and the State debts, and our declaratory opinions about legal rights and moral duties, all in one resolution, is kneading too much in the same trough. Its effect is to leaven, to a greater extent, our national credit with unmerited distrust.

I have heard a great deal said here and elsewhere of the loss of our national credit—in these resolutions; in the reports upon our tables; even in Executive messages—everywhere, indeed. Yet it appears not to have entered the head of anybody to vindicate the faith of the nation. Even while denying our legal obligation to answer for the debts of the States, our whole tone has been such as to convey the idea that we felt ourselves morally involved in their delinquency. This I deny; and, in support of that part of my amendment, desire to say a few words—not in that spirit of national whining, which has become so common, nor yet in the spirit of railing, but as an appeal to the justice and liberality of the world.

Let us open the records of national faith, and see by what right it is that we are vilified by others—by what right it is that Great Britain assumes to act as "custos morum" for the nations of the earth.

One of the earliest evidences of British ability in finance was in the reign of Charles II. The supplies were exhausted, and his Majesty needed money. Clifford was dignified with a peerage and the treasurer's staff, for the following notable suggestion (got from Shaftesbury.) He advised that they seize upon the funds which had been paid into the exchequer by bankers upon the faith of Government. It was done at once—the exchequer was shut up—none had warning; the ruin of many followed; bankers stopped payment; merchants could answer no bills; distrust took place everywhere. This is the language of her own historian, who denounces the act as "an open violation of the most solemn engagements, foreign and domestic."

The first item in the public debt of Great Britain is the consummation of this outrage.

The amount due from Government, and which it had had in gold and silver, was £1,328,526.

The payment of this sum was stopped for twenty-five years. In the mean time hundreds had died in penury and want; and then Government, instead of paying them seventeen millions of dollars which were due for principal and interest, forced the creditors, by act of Parliament, to accept of one-half of the principal only—less than three millions of dollars—or nothing; and for this, the issued bills bearing an interest of three per cent. only, instead of eight, the usual rate when they got the money.

This sum now constitutes the very first item in the public debt of Great Britain. It is the basis upon which the whole of that immense pile rests, stained as it is with national perfidy and oppression.

Again, in 1811, we have another and more modern instance of Britain's boasted financial faith. The notes of the Bank of England having become depreciated by their immense issues and loans to Government, the obligation was cancelled in this way. Having first relieved the bank from paying specie, they next resolve that these bills are worth their face in specie, (and this at a time when they were notoriously at a discount of at least ten per cent.,) and then made them a legal tender. But lest even this would not satisfy the public that ninety pounds were equal to one hundred, they went further, and made it a highly penal offence—a misdemeanor—for any one to either receive or pay them away at less than their face. Notwithstanding this, they continued to depreciate until they reached a discount of twenty, thirty, and forty per cent.; and Government then paid off its public creditors, "nolens volens," in this depreciated paper, and nothing else. The effect of this glorious operation in finance may be seen and appreciated by reference to Mushet's tables.

But, whatever may be the peculiar notions of Great Britain upon the subject of financial faith, as indicated by the above, at least she claims never to have denied her obligations. If she defrauded her creditors, it was always "pursuant to the act in that case made and provided;" and her creditors have the consolation of knowing that she has never denied their debts! Oh, no.

Of repudiation she has a holy horror. With what an air of pious complacency are we branded as a nation of swindlers and cheats; while they, with upturned eyes, thank God they are not as other men! Yet, unless the past be a fable, and history a lie; repudiation, even in its worst form, has had its place there.

By an ordinance of the Long Parliament, all the crown and church lands were seized upon for the public use. They were disposed of at a season of great pecuniary want, to raise money to carry on the civil government and pay her armies. They passed into the hands of honest purchasers, who, relying upon public faith, paid therefor a full price, and Government received their moneys.

Yet, notwithstanding all this, a few years after, Parliament, by public enactment, again seized upon these lands, and handed them back to the church and the crown. Thousands were beggared by the act. Government was at least bound, by every principle of law and justice, to make good the damages. It was a debt of the most sacred character. Yet, after a little legislative coquetry, she denied the debt; and to those who clamored too loudly for justice, she gave a place in Newgate and the Tower.

Sir, I know not to what extent a careful eye might not trace this moral delinquency. But of one thing I am sure, it little becomes Englishmen to lecture us upon moral duty or public faith.

There was one pecuniary transaction between the two Governments, and it illustrates strongly my position. In the treaty of 1793, the United States assumed to "make full and complete compensation" for certain debts due from American citizens to British subjects, inasmuch as difficulty was found in collecting them; and to do it in specie. The amount was settled by convention, between Rufus King and Lord Hawkesbury, in 1802, at £600,000. This sum was paid to the last dollar, and in specie; and this, too, at a time when England herself paid her public creditors in nothing but depreciated paper.

But our bonds will not sell in Europe; and therefore our credit, they say, is gone. And has there never been a time when British paper could not be sold at par? Sir, the history of the past teaches this. While the certificates and treasury notes of this Government have commanded, almost in the worst of times, dollar for dollar, the exchequer bills of England, (even when bearing an interest of 7½ per cent.,) which represent her floating debt, have been at a discount as low as 40 per cent.; while her 3 per cents., which I take as a specimen of her funded debt, have oscillated between the extremes of 47½ and 100; and this not through the agency or in time of war only, but of public distress and commercial disasters. While she has been arbitrary and faithless to her creditor, this Government has never defrauded one of a dollar. While she is staggering under a debt of £788,398,570, (more than thirty-five hundred millions of dollars,) we, as compared with her, have none at all. Our whole public debt would scarcely pay the discount on a thirty-day note drawn for hers. Yet her citizens and the European world hold British credit good, while ours is to be doubted.

Sir, there is no Government of the world whose credit ought to stand higher than that of these United States. There has none—no, not one—acted with a faith more pure; not a man of the Old World, or of the New, has lost a dollar by its promises. Its means are boundless; its debts as nothing; its honor pure.

And how is it with the other sovereignties of the Old World? Not one can be named which is not staggering under its load. Within the last few years, the debts of the principal powers of Europe (which it is believed have not been materially altered since) were as follows: Great Britain I have already alluded to. France (did time permit, I would show how she had paid her creditors) had a debt of about £191,893,053, with a revenue insufficient to meet the expenditures of her Government; Austria had a debt of about £80,000,000; Holland, in 1833, had a debt of about £10,000,000, which is vastly increased since; Naples, of £20,000,000; Denmark, between £10,000,000 and £11,000,000; Portugal, an acknowledged debt, in 1838, of £19,086,122; Prussia, of £29,000,000; Russia, of £50,000,000; Spain, according to her official statements, of £89,600,000, and it is believed that her actual debt is three times that amount. With these budgets of iniquity upon their backs, (the fruits of rapine and war,) they stagger along like the old sinner of Bunyan's alegory, reading homilies to us, doubting whether we can follow! We, in lusty youth, carrying the weight of a thistledown, and with an inheritance stretching from sea to sea! There is a cool assurance in this thing, to which the history of the world has no parallel.

Sir, I am not one of those who make a merit of abusing Great Britain. She has my highest respect; but, in the lifetime of an empire, matters such as I have alluded to will occur; and they should teach us charity. With the kindest of feelings—when they scout at us as faithless; when they affect a sanctimonious regard for plighted faith which we have not; when they claim a credit in the markets of the world denied to us—human nature cannot refrain from asking how they are entitled to it.

Mr. President, I have no disposition to speak of persons, except as connected with things; but I have before said that, from the highest official of Government to the lowest, the same humiliating spectacle is seen. We appear to have forgotten that the respect and confidence of others depend much upon that tone of respect and confidence we assume for ourselves.

It was with surprise and mortification that I read in the recent message of the President of the United States the result of a late petty mission to the money markets of Europe. Could not the discreditable fact have been left to rumor—to the chance of remaining unknown to the many, and being forgotten by the few? Was it necessary for any useful purpose that our shame be published in this enduring form to the ends of the earth? The loan has been taken by our own citizens, who knew us best. Was its negotiation aided by an announcement of the fact that our credit was dishonored abroad? Why further depreciate, in this most effective of all possible ways, the credit of the country? The fact is stated in connexion with, and in aid of, the argument in favor of the exchequer plan. But surely the Chief Magistrate of this country, with American blood in his veins, and, I hope, an American heart in his bosom, should have hesitated in this kind of formal and official announcement of the dishonor of American credit. It is a course of business "sui generis." The country draws upon the money markets of Europe for five millions of dollars. The bill is dishonored: when, forthwith, the drawer—this country, through its highest officer—makes solemn protest of the draft against itself, and gives public notice! Did his Excellency suppose that anybody was likely to pay for the honor of the drawer? If not, why send the discreditable fact to the ends of the earth?

Again: in the same message, and in the same connexion, is another matter, equally indicating the want of that proper tone of sentiment which the organs of every Government should assume on all questions affecting its national credit: I allude to that part of the message in which the President refers us to his recommendation that the land-fund be "mortgaged for the redemption of the principal and interest of any loan" which the Government might contract, and thereby "vindicate the Government from all suspicion of bad faith or inability," &c.

Sir, I am a citizen of the Federal Government of these United States; I am a citizen of the State Government of New Jersey: neither have ever dishonored their faith by a broken promise. Aside from other objections to this plan, my feelings revolt at it as an indignity—as an unmerited imputation.

An American President recommends to an American Congress that, in addition to our national faith, we give collateral security by mortgage; that we submit to terms in the markets of the world not asked of other nations—terms implying a distrust of our integrity and our honor!

Far back in the history of the world, when loans were made upon the personal responsibility of kings and princes, it was not an unusual thing to put the crown jewels in pledge. But our loan was to be made upon the credit of neither king nor prince, but upon the plighted faith of Government. The proposition from the Executive to hypothecate our crown jewels as collateral to our faith, had it been made by a foreign power, would have been resented as an insult.

Sir, we are frail creatures—we scarcely know ourselves; but I think it is in no improper spirit that I arraign this high functionary before the country as forgetful of its honor. The money could be procured, and has been procured, without any such extraordinary means. But, if it could not have been, taxation was open to us; better that, than negotiating on terms implying a distrust of our integrity.

But this charge of forgetfulness of what is due to ourselves, does not attach to the Chief Magistrate alone. It does appear to me, as if one party in this country have systematically decried its credit—have made an effort to swell in public estimation the amount of its indebtedness, and depreciate its resources. Have we met these charges as we ought? Unquestionably, a system of retrenchment has been in progress since the revolution of 1840, which has saved, and is saving, millions to the country. The danger, indeed, is, from present appearances, that Congress will rush blindly from one extreme to another—will show a "zeal outrunning wisdom." In this respect, at least, Whig promises have been kept to the letter. There is nothing, so far as I know, which should involve the credit of the Federal Government in the slightest suspicion; yet, even in this hall, and everywhere, there is a species of tame submission to moral castigation. When we are told that our credit is suspected, when every wind that blows brings with it charges of dishonesty and fraud, no voice has been heard to vindicate the unstained faith of the nation. This ought not to be. Whatever may be the sins of some of the States, (and God knows I am no apologist for them,) the faith of the Republic is without spot or blemish.

Did I not feel that, from the peculiar organization of our Government, there could be no claim upon us for State debts, I would have hesitated to throw back upon the world the perfidy of the world. It would have been brazen effrontery. I cannot but believe that European capitalists understand the system better than is pretended. If a partnership in Liverpool were of that kind called limited—or, in other words, for specific objects—each person having contributed a specified amount of capital, and liable for no more; and one, two, or three of the twenty-six partners should become embarrassed in their private affairs, the firm would very readily understand that it was neither morally nor legally bound for private debts. Ay, and they would understand, too, how the firm might be safe, though individuals were not so. Yet the articles of partnership (if I may be allowed the expression) under which the Federal Government does business have been published throughout the world. They are the American Constitution, of which all had notice. So far as the States have any interest in this firm beyond what is necessary for the transaction of its business, (as the proceeds of the public lands,) I would have no objection to return the same to them, to do with as they judge proper; but whatever may be the power of the Federal Government in regard to the assumption of State debts, (about which I give no opinion,) I utterly protest against its moral or legal liability for the delinquency of any State or States of the Union.

Sir, the secret of this spirit of railing against us abroad is not in the anticipated loss of money only. That they have been used to at home. Still less does it arise from any peculiar excess of financial virtue; but it comes from, and is in aid of, their old spleen against our institutions.

I am aware that this debate is not of the most useful character; but it will be remembered that it did not originate on this side of the chamber. If these resolutions be pressed to a vote, I trust my amendment may be first adopted. It is necessary to divest them of the assumption of that doubtful power to declare an opinion on the law, as well as to indicate our sense of what is due to the credit and character of the Federal Government.

SPEECH OF MR. GORDON, OF NEW YORK.

In the House of Representatives, February 21, 1843.—On the bill making an appropriation for commercial intercourse with China.

Mr. GORDON rose, and addressed the Chair.

He said he did not rise, on the present occasion, to become the apologist and defender of the present Administration; for he had no agency in bringing it into power in the memorable contest of 1840. Far from it: he had exerted himself, to the best of his ability, to keep it out. He had risen for the purpose of replying impromptu, and, as well as the occasion would permit, to the speech just made by his colleague, [Mr. J. C. CLARK,]—a speech sui generis in point of taste, and partaking strongly of the fumes of the midnight lamp. His colleague had taken more than ordinary pains to cull from the pages of Shakspeare, Junius, Byron, and the classics of ancient and modern times, the choicest epithets of vituperation, of sarcasm, and of obloquy, to crowd them into a memorized philippic of an hour's length against the Executive and the prime minister, whom he had so zealously labored to elevate to power. He did not recollect to have heard a speech this session in which more wrath and gall was poured out upon the doomed heads of "Captain" Tyler and Daniel Webster. Indeed, the lex talionis, or law of retaliation, as practised in the olden time, between the flood and the advent of Christendom, would well apply to him. Let not his colleague, then, complain if he received as good, and as much, as he had hurled at Messrs. Tyler and Webster! Let him not murmur if the poisoned chalice was returned to his own lips!

His colleague now said that he was sorry that the present Administration was invested with power. Such a declaration did not at all surprise him, (Mr. G.,) strange as it might seem to others,

As far back as 1840, he did not doubt but that his colleague would repent of the exertions he then was making—and why? Because he foresaw that the Whig party would fall to pieces by its own want of any cohesive principle, and by that lustful longing after office and the spoils which the patronage of a kingdom could not have satiated. In attempting to describe the party which the President would create for himself, by the influence of executive patronage, his colleague had well delineated the party to which he himself belonged, and which never could have been so truly represented had not his colleague been familiar with the materials of which it was composed. What were they? The cheese-parings, the candle-ends, the rag-tag and bob-tail of all the factions, cliques, and parties, that ever existed. Such was the assemblage which met at Harrisburg in the month of December, 1839. So sensible were the members of that assemblage of the fact that radical differences existed among themselves, that they did not even dare to talk to each other about any common principle upon which they could enter the Presidential contest. They, therefore, suspended the consideration of all such subjects; besought the "generous confidence" of the public; put their own favorite instrument, the gag, into the mouth of their candidate; and surrounded him with a committee to speak for him! All this was done from the knowledge that they held no one principle in common with each other, and from the fear that the adoption of a broad and general class of principles might disturb some of the "candle-ends." Fit representatives of the party to which his colleague belonged, and under whose victorious banners he fought the battle of 1840! Once, indeed, his colleague did belong to the Democratic party. It was long prior to the year 1837. But that evil spirit, called "ambition," whispered in his ear; and he, charmed by its witchery, immediately performed what is called a somerset. It was so far back as 1826, when his colleague went over to the opposition, and was elevated to Congress by the Federalists, aided by a portion of the Republican party which he had led astray. What followed? How did his colleague serve his new friends and allies who elected him? By coming to Congress in 1827; and, after taking the oath of office, advocating, with signal zeal, all the Democratic measures of the session—thus coldly turning his back upon the men, and scornfully trampling under foot the measures of the party who elected him.

The CHAIRMAN here called to order.

Mr. GORDON said he was not impugning the motives of his colleague, by any means. Far from it. He was only stating facts. [Laughter.] And he believed that, according to the decision of the chairman, [Mr. WINTHROP,] money bills, when under consideration in Committee of the Whole, opened the door to all sorts of debate. [Laughter.] But, to return to the facts he had been stating. His colleague left the Democratic party. There was no doubt of that. It was, therefore, for his colleague to explain the motives which actuated him in so doing, when he became the candidate of an irregular party, after having been from his youth a stickler for regular nominations.

[Here Mr. J. C. CLARK rose, and desired to ask a question.]

Mr. GORDON said he must decline yielding the floor. Under the rule which his colleague's friends had adopted, his time was short; and he therefore wished it to be understood that, when he was addressing the Chair, he desired to occupy the floor exclusively. His colleague was elected to Congress by the Democratic party in 1836, (ten years after his irregular election;) and twice since had been elected by the Federalists of the Chenango district.

Mr. CLARK (from his seat) asked if he did not, after his election in 1836 by the Democratic party, go into a minority of one thousand, and work up?

Mr. GORDON remarked that he had not supposed the minority was so small; but if it was, then so much the worse for his colleague; for it showed that he had broken down the party whose cause he espoused, and into whose confidence and good graces he had managed to initiate himself. The party had much trouble on his account, all owing to the great degree of confidence which was reposed in him, and enabled him, by a bad use of it, to deceive so many faithful followers. These honest Democrats (to their credit be it said) followed him but a short time. They soon obeyed their natural instincts, quit their deceiver, and returned to their first love—where every other Democrat would return, if God should only spare his life to take a "sober second thought." His colleague, it seemed, got back to the Democratic party after his apostacy in 1826; and how? By entering it under the Jackson banner, which he was among the first to unfurl. Yes; his colleague basked in the light, and triumped in the victory, of that hero and statesman—his constituents pardoning him of former transgressions in consideration of his years, and of the natural proneness of youth to indiscretion. Foreseeing, with eagle-eyed sagacity, the rising popularity of the man who had filled the measure of his country's glory, his colleague lost no time in becoming the champion of General Jackson, and soon, by his zeal and services, excelled the strongest Democrat in all the country. This, though it gave him grace and favor with his old friends, did not restore him to full confidence and communion with them. Long did he sit upon the stool of repentance in sackcloth and ashes, mourning over his transgressions, and appearing meek as possible before the people. To crown the long catalogue of his professions of faith in the Democratic creed, preparatory to his full restoration to public confidence, he was the author of a set of resolutions which were adopted at the Norwich convention, held in February 1835, and composed of delegates from the several towns in Chenango county, and which resolutions justified the removal of the deposites by Gen. Jackson, denounced a Bank of the United States as unconstitutional and inexpedient, asserted that gold and silver were the only safe and proper currency, and charged that a United States bank would be dangerous in corrupting members of Congress. These resolutions were reported by his colleague, as chairman of the committee, and unanimously adopted by the convention. His agency in getting them up, and having them passed, secured his appointment to the State convention held the following year to select electors for President and Vice President, and also his nomination and consequent election to Congress by the Democratic party in the fall of 1836.

What respect could be paid to the views of men who denounced a bank of the United States as unconstitutional, inexpedient, politically dangerous, and corrupting to members of Congress; and then, after all this, turned around, and borrowed of it about $4,000 in 1837, and $6,000 more in 1840, making in all the round sum of $10,000—"a fair business transaction"—never to be paid but by the sponging process of the bankrupt law; and then, with utter shamelessness, voted for the creation of the very institution they before denounced? What weight should be given to the opinions of men who voted for the bankrupt law, and then became voluntary applicants for its benefits? What effect could the denunciation of an apostate have against apostacy? It was like the pot calling the kettle black. With what face, then, could a man who had been refused an office (say, that of consul to Liverpool) pretend to stand up on this floor, and accuse a man who defeated his appointment of corrupt selfishness for clinging to office?

At the extra session of 1841, his colleague voted for the bankrupt law, and is now a voluntary applicant for the benefit of the act—his inventory showing, (as Mr. G. was informed,) among other things, an indebtedness to the Bank of the United States of some ten thousand dollars, for money loaned in 1837. During the 27th Congress, he voted for the two bills incorporating a bank of the United States, which were vetoed by President Tyler; and for which vetoes he now was in the habit of denouncing the Executive in the most bitter and scathing terms. Of the Norwich convention, in 1836, he was the most active and leading member, and was the prime mover and author of the resolutions embodying the cardinal doctrines of the party, then and now. What his motives were, in taking the part he did in that convention, he (Mr. G.) would leave to his colleague to explain. It was not for him to say; and, besides, it was unparliamentary on that floor to speak of the motives of honorable members. This much, however, he would say: that the part taken by his colleague at that convention secured his nomination and election to Congress, and reunited him to the Democratic party. His colleague then stood upon the same intimate footing with the Democratic party which he had occupied prior to his apostacy in 1826; and had he not again forfeited and abused the confidence of the people, it would have abided with him to his latest breath. Confidence is a plant of slow growth. Once crushed, it withers and dies. It was not long before his colleague forfeited the respect and confidence he had so studiously sought and won. He served with the Democratic party until he came on to Washington at the extra session of 1837, when he joined the Conservative clique. Thenceforward, he battled against the Democratic party. Like most other apostates, he did not join the Federalists immediately; but stopped at the Conservative half-way house, and there refreshed himself, until that slimly-patronized resting-place was razed to the ground, when he went smack over to the embraces of the Federal party. There he now is! There, he (Mr. G.) trusted, he would ever remain! There he MUST remain, if he depended upon the Democracy of old Chenango to rescue him! He (Mr. G.) did not undertake to impeach the motives of his colleague; he merely stated facts, which his colleague might answer if he saw fit. He could not refrain from saying what he had, when he saw his colleague, in the speech of to-day, sneering at the Democratic party, casting reproaches upon them, calling one of their Governors the "hero of clambakes," and denouncing the party generally as locofocos and disorganizers. It had been well remarked that the Devil could quote Scripture, and preach a good sermon, when it suited his purpose. Now, he thought his colleague was not a very fit person to read a lecture to the present Administration on the subject of apostacy, and to deal out denunciations, right and left, upon it, and upon the Democratic party. Such lectures came with ill grace indeed from such an author! His colleague should first pluck out the big, glaring beam in his own eye, before he undertook to scan and criticise the motes in other people's eyes.

Now, he would ask, what was the principal ground of his colleague's complaint?—what the source of all his grief, and wailing, and lamentation over the untimely fate of his fallen party? Was it that he mourned the sacrifice of any principle—any exalted motive of action, that bound his party together? Not at all. His colleague did not once allude to the principles of his party. His grief was of a different complexion. It was the loss of the spoils—the loss of power and influence—the impossibility of obtaining patronage and place—that his colleague lamented. Yes, it was the loss of all for which his colleague's party had been contending—the sad wreck of all their hopes! His colleague had spoken of the love of office, and the treachery of men in high places; but said nothing of the principles of his party, nor uttered one regret at the failure of their measures. When Francis the First, at the battle of Pavia, was defeated, and his army cut to pieces, he wrote his mother word that he "had lost all, save honor." So it was with the Democratic party after the contest of 1840. They lost all but their principles. They rallied under the flag of their undying principles; and, without the aid of patronage and place, and the spoils, achieved the most glorious victories throughout the Union. How different was the case with the party of which his colleague was now a member! When the patronage and power of the Executive was wrenched from them, and by the man they had themselves elevated, their all was gone! They could not say, like Francis the First, "we have lost all, save honor." They could not say, like the Democratic party, "we have lost all, save principle." Their only note was a cross, crabbed, muttering cry, like that uttered here to-day by his colleague over the loss of the spoils. Deprived of these, they were as outcasts at sea, without anchor and without compass. The Democratic party, on the contrary, shorn of the trappings of office, became more powerful than before; and, like the giant Antæus, gathered new strength from their fall.

Although about to retire from public life, he cherished as ardent a desire for the success of the Democratic party as ever. He could never consent that his ardor should be dampened, and his zeal quenched, by the fact that he was soon to go out of Congress; but, in or out of Congress, in public or in private life, his hopes and his exertions must ever be the same.

As to the issues between his colleague and the present Administration, he considered all that a mere family quarrel. The Whig party, and the body of the supporters of the Administration, might be disunited now; but the time, he predicted, would come when they would be allied again, and pursuing the same objects. They would be united again, from the fact that both wanted to establish a paper currency for this great nation. Some of them were for an exchequer, and others for a Bank of the United States. Some of them, too, wanted to bolster up the paper of the State banks with the credit of the General Government. All, in fact, wanted to renovate the same system of paper-money, under the evils of which the country now suffered so grievously. He would, then, glance at some of the expedients of this party, and, among them, the $200,000,000 scheme of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. W. C. JOHNSON.] What was that scheme? Why, that the Government shall issue two hundred millions of bonds, at an interest of 3 per cent., based on the pretended sale of the public lands; in other words, to put $200,000,000 of Government paper afloat, without any adequate security for its redemption. Such was, in a few words, the scheme of the gentleman from Maryland. Now, what was the proposition of another gentleman from the same side of the House? [Mr. CUSHING.] That the Government should carry on the business of private banking on private account, and, at the same time, give currency to depreciated bank paper. Such was the exchequer. But he would return to the two hundred million scheme; for he feared that all this longing after paper-money would end in it at last.

The Chairman called to order for irrelevancy.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia interposed, and begged that the gentleman might be permitted to proceed, as the other gentleman from New York [Mr. J. C. CLARK] had been allowed to go on without any restriction or limitation.

After one or two remarks from the Chair—

Mr. GORDON resumed, and said he should proceed in order. The ground he took in this matter was, that this party could not be safely intrusted with money, because of the extravagant and impolitic projects they were ever ready to force upon the adoption of the House. He wished to know, before he intrusted this Administration and this party with money—(for he took it that this bill emanated from the majority)—before he opened the purse-strings of the nation, and intrusted them with the treasure of the people, he wished to inquire into their system and policy of government. He presumed this would be as much in order (and he hoped the Chairman would so rule it) as to debate the Faneuil Hall speech of Mr. Webster. Was it not as much in order to allude to the state of the finances of the Government, as to treat of what his colleague was pleased to term the treachery of his political friends? He desired to discuss the position taken by a majority of that party, through their own Committee of Ways and Means—that it was competent and constitutional for the General Government to issue $200,000,000 of bonds, to be given to the States, and also what "relief" such a scheme would afford to the people. He would, however, first treat of the exchequer.

Here the Chairman again interrupted Mr. G., and said that the topics he was discussing were irrelevant to the subject under consideration, and therefore out of order.

Mr. R. D. DAVIS rose, and remarked that he understood his colleague to allude to these subjects incidentally, and as illustrative of his general argument.

Mr. WELLER said that the gentleman from New York [Mr. J. C. CLARK] had been allowed to speak of all the subjects which the gentleman [Mr. GORDON] now wished to discuss, and was not called to order. He should think the gentleman now on the floor [Mr. GORDON] had a right to discuss the same subjects in reply.

The Chairman insisting upon his decision—

Mr. WELLER took an appeal.

Mr. GORDON resumed, and requested his friend from Ohio to withdraw the appeal, inasmuch as to decide it would largely take off from the hour allotted to him. [Mr. WELLER did so.] He should be able to come out, in order.

His colleague had given a most glowing description of the temple of the great Whig party, with columns, and colonnades, and a lofty dome; and had complained that the man behind the throne, at the other end of the avenue, was exercising his great strength in tearing down that mighty edifice. Now, he thought it would not require a Samson to tear down a log-cabin! Even the very boys of the city made it their pastime to tear and pull to pieces the few models of Whig architecture which were found here. What were the columns and colonnades of this glorious temple, so glowingly described by his colleague? Why, he believed that the sign out of doors, whether the latch-string was pulled in or not, was a cider barrel and a coon skin; whilst the edifice itself was built of rough logs, with the chinks between them stopped up with mud. It was a temple of night revelry and debauch, where its votaries drank hard cider, and, too often for their own good, became fuddled! If, then, this mighty man—this premier at the end of the avenue—aided by the boys, did tear down the consecrated temple of Whigery, he did more good than harm. He (Mr. G.) applauded him for the act. True, it was a small business for such a man to be engaged in; but all must admit that it was no less dignified an employment than that of assisting his friends to raise these remarkable edifices.

He thought it would be an instructive fact to the people of this country, could they know whether the two hundred million project, darkly hinted at in the Faneuil Hall speech, originated in this country or in England; and also whether it was first conceived before or after the visit of that mighty man to England in 1839; whether it was before or after he got the thousand pounds for his opinion on the subject of State credit. These facts might be highly important to the people, in enabling them to judge of the merits of the scheme. He considered it as no more nor less than a project for the benefit of the British fund-mongers, and the success of which would crush this Republic. Once adopted, the Government could not subsist a day. There would be a consolidation of all the power of the States in the Federal Government. Congress would have taken upon itself to discharge all the debts created by the extravagance of the States, and the profligacy of their agents, without the power to restrain their propensities to further debt and scheming extravagance. This would be consolidation in its fullest sense, and would break up our present form of government; for the States would undoubtedly come to their senses in time, and shake off the odious burden imposed on them, by repudiation or nullification. For himself, sooner than see his own State (New York) saddled with the debts of other States, he would resort at once to nullification or repudiation. Yes; he would rather repudiate than entail upon the people of his State debts created by the spendthrift propensities of others. Let gentlemen in Congress abstain from tinkering the credit of the States. Let them preserve intact, inviolate, and untarnished, the faith and credit of the General Government; and, he was willing to answer for it, that would be the test mode that could be adopted to preserve the credit of the States. He could not think of any consideration which should for one moment influence Congress to assume the State debts; nor could he see how, by possibility, the people could, in any shape, be benefited by it. At this very time, the annual revenue of the General Government from customs, lands, and all sources combined, does not amount to $15,000,000. The annual ordinary expenditures of the Government are $23,000,000. The national debt is now $26,000,000, at an annual interest of $1,560,000. What, then, must be our reliable sources of reveuue, unless by resorting to direct internal taxation? Here, then, with a debt of $26,000,000 pressing down the credit of the General Government, is an annual deficit, after exhausting all our income, and without discharging a dollar of the principal of the debt, of $9,500,000 to be provided by increased taxes, in order to save this Government from repudiation, disgrace, and financial ruin. Yet it proposed to superadd to this load of debt two hundred millions, by an issue of bonds bearing 3 per cent. interest, on the baseless security of the public lands; when their proceeds, all told, added to the duties on imports, fall more than nine millions and a half short of the annual expenditures! The interest upon these two hundred millions is, of course, to be paid by means of a direct tax upon the pockets of the people; for, to think of paying it with the customs and land sales, is out of the question. Where would these bonds of the General Government go? Would they go to the people, to be distributed per capita among them, according to agrarian principles? Not a dollar. How, then, would they be disposed of? The share of each indebted State would be handed over to its creditors, and the share of the non-indebted States to their authorities, to stimulate them and their agents to the same ruinous and reckless career of extravagance and wild scheming which would inevitably lead to bankruptcy and defalcations. How, then, be repeated, were the people to be benefited by the $200,000,000 scheme, (even if this Government were able to meet the new and heavy responsibility, whilst it, at the same time, discharged all its other duties and obligations?—an undertaking which no man in his senses believed could ever be performed. Could the people, by any possibility, be relieved by grinding taxes? If taxation would produce relief and blessings, then, indeed, the people would be doubly blessed! If it is true (as was contended formerly) that a national debt is a national blessing, then, indeed, will this project confer the blessing in a most eminent degree! In his (Mr. G.'s) view, however, this scheme, emanating as it had from the brains of visionary dreamers, would produce blessings and "relief" with a vengeance—such blessings as national discredit and insolvency and such "relief" as practical repudiation by the General Government. Relief, indeed! Relieving the people with their own money and credit! It was a mockery to talk of such relief.

But let him turn to another aspect of the question. Whether a war with England would be a blessing or not, he could not now undertake to say. He did not know but that it would do some good, by arousing a spirit of patriotism in the country, and by enkindling a good feeling in the hearts of the money-making people, who would not hesitate to ask even a desecration of the Constitution itself, if thereby they could make money. But let it be conceded that a war with England was a blessing of the most desirable kind. He did not believe that the people of this country would do any improper act to promote it. Let England espouse the cause of the Rothschilds, and other foreign bankers, if she dared; let her take up arms in defence of the Nicholas Biddles on the other side of the Atlantic; let her make common cause with them, and wage war upon our country and our Constitution—he wished to see the trial come at once. He wished to see the strength and virtue of our Constitution tested. He wished to see the heart and energies of our people pass through the ordeal to which they would be subjected. He felt confident that all the patriotic ardor that inflamed the bosoms of our ancestors would be at one enkindled, and that our people would come out from the contest unscathed. The people of this country, he thought, owed a debt of gratitude to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] for putting the matter upon the footing he had placed it. That gentleman, by threatening war in case of a non-payment of the State debts, could not have more effectually served the ends of those who were opposed to assumption. Indeed, he had put it out of the power of this Government, without dishonor, to assume the State debts under such a menace. The gentleman's speech, designed to intimidate, would be hereafter held up as an appeal to the pride and the martial spirit of the people.

But what was the further tendency of the gentleman's argument? Why, that this Government must necessarily assume the State debts; for it was shown that a State might go on, ad libitum, contracting what debts she pleased, giving her bonds to foreigners for the amount, and then this Government must be dragged into the payment of her obligations; for a single State had in this way the power to involve this Union in a war with a foreign power, notwithstanding the power to declare war was, by the Constitution, placed, not with the Governors of a State, but with the Federal Government. He would not discuss the validity of Mississippi bonds, for that subject had been sufficiently discussed on this floor. He cared not whether they were valid or not, so far as the argument there was concerned, but the idea that a State might contract what debts she pleased, and that this Government must pay them, or assume her indebtedness, was putting this country in the power and at the mercy of a single State. Why, he would prefer consolidation to such a state of things—he would prefer that the State lines should be blotted out—that the whole people of this Union, if they were to be compelled to assume the responsibility of repayment, should at least have a voice in the contracting of these debts. He asked the House what control the State of New York, which he in part represented, had either here or at home, in her State Legislature, or by her press, or her public meetings—or indeed, in any form—over the contracting of the debts of the State of Indiana, of Mississippi, or of Pennsylvania? Those States contracted their debts without consultation with New York; and was not permitted to say a word on the subject; and yet the modern doctrine which they heard here was, that the pockets of the people of that State were to be reached for the repayment and liquidation of those debts. Now, he would appeal to the chairman of this committee [Mr. WINTHROP] as a patriot, as a statesman, and as a high-minded man from Massachusetts, who had studied the fathers of the Constitution, whether this wild scheme was ever dreamed of by those revered framers of the charter of our liberties; and whether, in the whole range of their deliberations, there was the least perceptible leaning to such an enormous power which now found advocates in the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] and the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. W. C. JOHNSON,] and some others.

But perhaps he had said as much on the Faneuil Hall speech and its tendencies, as the occasion would justify; and he would turn for a moment to the exchequer, which was but another emanation of the same brain—the brain of one who had said that, if he understood anything, it was the subject of finance; and that the bill of the gentleman from Massachusetts was not worth the parchment on which it was written, compared with the mighty scheme of consolidation which he had prepared. And what did the scheme of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] propose? Why, in the first place, that private individuals might deposite $10,000,000 in the treasury of such exchequer of the United States; thereby withdrawing $10,000,000 of specie, gold and silver, from the currency of the country, and receiving, in return, ten millions of certificates, which would become its circulation. But further, it provided that the Government creditors—the holders of its bonds and obligations or treasury notes—might receive certificates for the amount of the debts due to them by the United States, to a like amount of $10,000,000; thus making the issue of certificates equal to $20,000,000 if this latter provision be observed, being but a modification of the former one; a receiving of the debt due to the public creditor, and a returning of it to the treasury, and receiving, as in the case of a private depositor, certificates for the sum deposited. Thus, then, they had $20,000,000 of specie drawn from the circulation of the country, and paper certificates substituted. And yet even this was not all; for the mints had an unlimited power to receive foreign coin, and to issue certificates for the coin so received. But further still; the exchequer board was to be authorized to sell bills of exchange, also to an unlimited amount, at a premium of not exceeding 2 per cent. And for what purpose, he would ask, was all this to be done? It was certainly not to add to the circulation of the country; for every dollar of the great amounts he had enumerated was taken from the circulating medium, for which the paper certificates were to be substituted. They were thus to take the gold and silver from circulation, and supply the place of it with paper, that this Government might become the depository of the funds of individuals to the amount of millions, for which this Government would become responsible.

When the sub-treasury was under consideration, a standing objection raised by the opposition to it was, that it would hoard the specie of the country in the vaults of the treasury, so far as the revenues of the Government went—which, as all knew, were in a constant course of receipt and payment. Now, by the exchequer, this objection is doubled. It applies with double force to that scheme; for it is not only proposed to hoard the specie derived from customs and the public lands, but also the coin owned by private individuals. The specie in the United States is estimated at from eighty to one hundred millions, including that in the vaults of the banks. This amount, too, goes on increasing in proportion, and the banks go out of existence. Nothing is clearer, better ascertained, or more generally understood, than that coin disappears in proportion as paper circulates, and returns to form the circulating medium as soon as paper is withdrawn from it. The process is simple. The banks issue their paper, for which they receive coin. They then export this coin from the country, to be sold as bullion—an article of merchandise. When the banks are called on to redeem their notes, they suspend, and blow up—a consequence not to be wondered at by those who have viewed their operations. A return from paper to specie circulation is attended with pressure, and in many cases bankruptcy. It is the crisis in monetary affairs, like the crisis in the sick man's disease, from which dates the commencement of returning health.

Such is substantially our present condition. Such is the modus operandi by which the circulation of the country has been despoiled of its coin. Take, for example, the State of Ohio. Its banks have expelled the gold and silver which would have naturally flowed into it, and remained in the channels of circulation. That great State is now left vastly short of its share of the circulating medium of the commercial world. It has been reduced vastly below its value by the operation of a false banking system. Currency is to be measured by its value, and not by its quantity. A paper currency is worth the amount of specie it rests on as a basis, and no more. You cannot enhance the value of the currency by floods of paper, no matter how much be issued, beyond what would be a due share of the gold and silver of the trading nations; on the contrary, such a course would greatly depreciate and reduce it. Like water, currency will find its own level; and, but for banks and paper contrivances, would equalize itself all over the civilized world, in the ratio of the population and trade of each commercial nation. Banks, like dams in the river, obstruct the influx of specie, prevent the flow of its current, divert it from its natural channels, and drive it from the circulation of countries where they are permitted to exist, to other countries where they are not. There cannot be a doubt but that the paper system of the United States has depreciated the standard of value belonging to gold and silver coin in all parts of the world, as well as here at home; at the same time that it has not, to the same extent, increased the circulating medium, by superadding to the general amount in as great a degree as it forced the gold and silver coin of this into other countries. The effect has been the same as if an equal amount of gold and silver had been suddenly dug up from the bowels of the earth, coined, and placed in the channels of circulation; thereby swelling the streams above their banks, and overflowing the land. To his mind, nothing could be more palpable than the truth of these positions.

Great indeed are the advantages which the merchants and traders of a specie country have, in their commercial intercourse, over those of a country whose currency is paper! Let those advantages be rightly understood, and the baseless paper policy must go down forever to the tomb of the Capulets. The specie country sells to the paper country by the paper measure, which is marked too high. The latter, deceived as to the capacity of its own measure, buys less than it pays for, and supposed it was contracting to receive. The people of the specie country sell at paper prices, and receive their pay in specie. This specie—although, by the operation of the paper system, depreciated in the country where that system is carried out—when transferred to a country where specie dealings are universal, rises to its true level, as fixed and estimated by the opinion of the world. It is thus that the people of specie countries find it to be their interest to exchange their products for our gold and silver, and keep up an artificial drain upon us. Of course, the whole operation is to our prejudice, and for the benefit of foreigners—leaving a continual balance of trade against us.

As to the exchequer, he would not say it would operate in the same manner as the banks, should it ever remain unchanged, unmodified, and unamended, and perform its functions as claimed by its friends. But would it always remain in its present form? And even if it could be permitted so to remain, what guaranty had the people that it would perform all its functions in the same admirable manner claimed for it by its friends? He despaired of seeing these objects attained. He could but regard it as the entering wedge to the final admission of the power and universal prevalence of bank paper in the business of the country, throughout all its ramifications. He could not consent so to shape the action of the Government as to dictate a paper policy to all the business transactions of the people, and thereby direct their fate and destiny. This view of the question was itself an objection to one and all of the exchequer schemes which had been proposed; for it seemed the friends of an exchequer could not all agree about the exchequer which ought to be adopted by Congress.

How, he asked, was the proposed exchequer intended to operate? Not to collect and export specie,—as the banks always have, and ever will find it to their interest to do, although the country be brought to insolvency by the operation. It professed to collect, and hoard in its own vaults, all the specie of the United States; and to circulate, in place of this specie, an equal amount of paper certificates. How would the country gain by the operation? Nothing would be added to the currency; nothing contributed to public or private enterprise; no stimulus given to business; nothing gained by anybody, or by any branch of industry, except the mere avoidance of the expense of transmitting specie from place to place—an advantage more than counterpoised by the loss of confidence which the precious metals must, and ever will, command over every description of paper, no matter how well secured. As to the superior cheapness of the exchequer in transmitting funds, such a thing could not be well established. The exchequer must charge as much as the cost of transportation and insurance of specie. There could be no difference in the price charged by the exchequer, and that by private individuals and dealers in money and exchanges. If the exchequer should charge more, it would, of course, be underbid by brokers, and patronized by no one. If it should charge less, it would, of course, have more business than it could accomplish, and would become a heavy charge upon the Government.

The effect of hoarding the specie of the country in the vaults of the exchequer, would be to incite and encourage embezzlement. It would, he thought, be putting too much money under the control of Government officers, and subjecting them to too strong temptations. It would be rendering them liable to the same temptations to which bank officers in this country had offered so little resistance. In spite of bonds, and penalties, and oaths, embezzlement would be committed, and the United States Government saddled with the responsibility of making good vast amounts of private funds received by it in its capacity of dealer in exchanges. Who were to have the keeping of these public and private deposites, mixed together to the amount of all the specie in the United States, and coequal with the currency of a great commercial people? This pregnant question was answered by the provisions of the plan itself. Let gentlemen turn to the three first sections, and they would find there a new and unnecessary class of public officers to manage private funds—all to be appointed by the Executive, and increasing the already too much extended influence of the Executive. Yes; a large class of men are to be paid exorbitant salaries out of the public treasury, for managing the transmission of private funds! The plan is to go into operation with one commissioner, one principal clerk, ten assistants, eleven registers, and their twenty clerks at the board in Washington, and their agencies in the States where the money is to be kept. All this force is to be added to the regular force of the Treasury Department. And this is only the beginning of the scheme! Where it would end, if adopted, the Lord only knows.

The amount of specie brought into the exchequer would be equal to the amount of the currency of the country, should the system work as its friends claim that it will; its object being to furnish a paper currency of equal value through the country. Its design is to supply the place of a United States bank, since that institution has become an "obsolete idea." It is intended to fill with its certificates and drafts, that space which was once filled by the notes, drafts, and credits of the United States Bank. Such is the amount proposed to be intrusted to the hands of officers of the United States on private account, and the Government itself responsible! And for what object and end? In order that the specie of the country may be drawn from circulation paper promises to pay and certificates are to be issued to fill the vacuum; and the people familiarized to the use of paper, until they regard it as cash of intrinsic value—thereby paving the way for the triumph of paper-money schemes and the ascendency of the moneyed aristocracy. The history of this class, in our own as well as in other countries, proves that they will never rest satisfied until they shall have gained a control over all the wealth, labor, and hard earnings of the producing classes. They will not be contented until they have revived the credit system, which but recently exploded, and left the people in the lowest depths of indebtedness and distress. Let the country, he besought, be delivered from the curse of these schemes, and from the fatuity and recklessness of the party which came into power in 1840 by the most unparalleled and disgraceful means ever resorted to in the long annals of political corruption! Every patriot might well look with apprehension and alarm upon the blot which he feared was beginning to appear upon the hitherto fair escutcheon of our country. He had still some hope that the eyes of the blind dupes would be opened to the wiles of the schemers who were making them instrumental in subjugating the masses to the idle and listless millionaires, who contrive to grow richer and richer day by day, from the toil and sweat of other men's brows. Let the people drink deeply at the well-springs of knowledge. Let them qualify themselves to govern with wisdom and moderation. Let them learn (and they must learn it sooner or later) to "let well enough alone," and cease tinkering the immutable laws of commerce and currency—laws which are founded upon the nature of man, and are as little capable of being altered by human legislation as the laws of matter. Let them profit by the bitter experience they have learned, and henceforth know that it would be as impossible for Government to discover the philosopher's stone, or invent a machine of perpetual motion, as to convert paper into gold and silver, or make "promises to pay" equivalent in all respects to solid coin. Never has man, with all his ingenuity, with all his talent at invention, with all his wonderful discoveries in science and in art, been able to counterfeit the precious metals, and elude speedy detection. The precious metals have an intrinsic value, apart from their value as a circulating medium. Paper is, at best, but a representative of value, and which may prove to be as baseless and visionary as the man in the moon. A statesman should as soon think of catching the will-o'-the-wisp of the marsh, or the evanescent colors of the gorgeous rainbow, as of attempting to make anything else answer the exact purposes of gold and silver.

The earth teems with wealth, and Heaven has decreed that it shall only be realized by labor. Let Government confine itself within its proper sphere of protecting and securing the fruits of honest labor to each and every man in the community, drawing the line between meum and tuum, and punishing all invasions on private right. Let it do this, and it will have discharged all its domestic duties to the people. Further interference in their private affairs would be more like usurpation and oppression, than any pretended protection.

The present has been emphatically a Congress of scheming experiments. There have been proposed, as sine qua nons, the two bank bills which were vetoed by the President, differing from each other and every other; the exchequer of the Treasury Department, and the exchequer of the select committee, [Mr. CUSHING's;] the bill of Governor Pope, which is the scheme of a great bank based on the public lands; the bill of Mr. Everett of Vermont; the bill of Mr. Barnard; and last, though not least, the two hundred million scheme of Government stock, which is the joint offspring of the Barings in England, the Secretary of State, and an honorable member of Congress from Maryland. All these bubbles have appeared and disappeared in rapid succession, and, like the baseless fabric of a vision, have left nothing behind. They and their fate reminded him of the ill-starred extra session of 1841—every measure of which had been repealed by the same Congress, and nothing of which now remained on the statute books, except the mere appropriation bills. Discordant in principle, crudely conceived, impracticable of adoption, and wanting the confidence and respect of even a majority of the party whence they emanated, they are the fruits of all the labors of the majorities here and in the Senate during the three sessions of the 27th Congress; and most truly do they reflect the composition of the 'candle-ends, cheese-parings, rag-tag-and-bobtail" party, which came into power by the eruption of 1840, and which was so graphically described by the distinguished gentleman of that party, [Mr. J. C. CLARK,] who but a short time since addressed the committee. As it was the first, so, it was to be hoped, it would be the last Whig Congress ever convened here! The present generation must pass away before the same fantastic tricks can be again played off with success. The people, who were told that a "change" would be no worse for them, and who heeded the insidious advice, will not soon again turn a listening ear to their deceivers. They have learned with sorrow their great mistake, and will not permit themselves to be duped a second time. In tracing the history of this party, (the like of which never existed,) the faithful chronicler will date its origin from the modern credit system, which immediately preceded it, and which poisoned and corrupted the public morals by its gambling, reckless, unregulated spirit.

SPEECH OF MR. McDUFFIE,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In Senate, February 20, 1843.—The following resolutions submitted by Mr. McDUFFIE coming up in order, viz:

Resolved, That the Government of the United States has no constitutional power to assume the debts contracted by the States for their own proper purposes, by the issue of stock, whatever fund may be pledged for the payment of the interest or principal.

Resolved, That it is inexpedient for this Government thus to assume the aforesaid debts.

Mr. McDUFFIE said it was not his design, when he presented these resolutions, to have offered a single remark, with the purpose of enforcing the doctrines they declare. But, as he perceived that the Senate was not yet full, he would avail himself of the occasion to submit one or two views to its consideration. And, in the first place, he asked, had Congress the constitutional power to carry into execution the scheme to which these resolutions relate? This was the first and most important question; and, in regard to that question, he confessed the very great surprise with which he heard the Senator from Kentucky over the way, [Mr CRITTENDEN,] when particularly interrogated as to his opinion of the question of constitutional power, declare, that though he disclaimed all obligation on the part of Congress to pay the debts of the States, and could not now conceive of an emergency which would justify their assumption, yet he must say that Congress was not prohibited from such an exercise of power. Mr. McDUFFIE said he was the more surprised at such a remark as coming from the honorable Senator from Kentucky, who, he was sure, was politically educated under those sound constitutional doctrines from the pen of Mr. Jefferson, which were promulgated by Kentucky in 1800. Mr. McD. asked the Senator if those great doctrines were to be reversed; and if, instead of looking to the express grants of the Constitution for the powers of Congress, we were to assume all those which were not expressly prohibited.

[Mr. CRITTENDEN asked leave to explain the remarks alluded to. What he meant to say was, (as the whole tenor of his remarks would show,) that he was unwilling to to express an opinion at that time as to the power of Congress. He did not intend to say that Congress could exercise any powers, except such as were expressly granted, or which were implied as necessary to carry express grants of power into effect.]

Mr. McDUFFIE said he was glad to hear the explanation of the Senator from Kentucky. He entirely concurred in the principles of construction he now laid down, and was sure they must condemn the assumption of power now under consideration. But he would proceed to show (as he flattered himself he could do, most conclusively) that not only was there no grant in the Constitution giving the least color of right to exercise this power; but that the only grant in the Constitution, having relation to the subject, contained an express prohibition against such an exercise of power, as plain and positive as human language could make it. Now, what, he asked, was proposed to be done? and what were the powers practically involved in the scheme of assuming the State debts? He begged Senators to realize the true effect and character of the measure, and not to be deluded by a mere empty form. The stock proposed to be issued, it was true, was to be sustained, in part, by a pledge of the income derived from the public lands; but it would be a gross delusion to suppose that the whole credit and resources of the Government were not also as fully pledged for the redemption of the proposed stock, as if no particular fund were pledged. The very act of assumption extinguished the State debts, and created a Federal debt to the same extent. Now, what were the powers involved in doing all this? He answered, the whole money power of the Government—borrowing money, levying taxes, and appropriating the revenue derived from these sources. Yes, sir, the whole of this greatest of all the powers of Congress was to be called in requisition to execute the proposed scheme and, he would add, no other power whatever. And he would now ask, if there was not, in reference to the exercise of this power, a limitation as clear and distinct as language could make it, amounting to an express prohibition of the proposed assumption? The clause of the Constitution which clothes Congress with the power of raising revenue, expressly limits this power to the objects of "providing for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." Now it is remarkable that these words of limitation which have been made the prolific source of all doubtful and constructive powers, should thus place a decided negative upon this most monstrous of all the assumptions of Federal power ever attempted. For, if the payment of debs contracted by the separate States, for their own proper purposes, can be drawn by construction within the scope of the terms "common defence and general welfare of the United States," language must have totally changed its meaning, and we had as well throw aside the Constitution at once, as worse than useless. As it thus appeared to him strikingly clear that the powers involved in the execution of the proposed scheme were positively prohibited by an express limitation, he would not further occupy the time of the Senate in attempting to make that plainer, which is as plain as language can make it. We are thus (said Mr. McD.) arrested at the very threshold; and all those who concur with me in the opinion that the measure in question is plainly and expressly unconstitutional, must also agree that any law of Congress, in execution of it, and every act done under such law, would be now and forever destitute of all binding obligation, and, to all intents and purposes, null and void. It would be utterly impossible to pledge the faith of this Government to any contract thus made, without any shadow of authority, and in open defiance of the express words of the Constitution.

But suppose (said he) that, by some strained construction, we could get rid of this express limitation, and also of the no less conclusive objection that there is no grant of such a power in the Constitution: yet, when we come to look into the practical working of the proposed assumption, it will be seen so totally to invert all the principles of the Government, and destroy the responsibility which sustains and controls our whole political system, State and Federal, as to render its unconstitutionality palpable, independently of the want of an express grant, and the existence of an express limitation. The result of the proposed scheme was to make this Government tax-gatherer for the States; and to give the funds, thus collected, to the Governments of the respective States, to be expended by them at pleasure, either in payment of their debts, or in executing new and extravagant schemes of internal improvement. I beg the attention of the Senate (said Mr. McD.) to this view of the subject, as it clearly shows that the State Governments will have the expenditure of this immense fund, without any responsibility to those who will have to pay the taxes—the people of the United States. Thus, sir, the State Governments are to be wholly exempted from the essential check of responsibility in a matter which most of all demands it—the discretionary expenditure of public money on works of internal improvement. Greater temptations and greater facilities could not be offered for a corrupt system of favoritism and extravagance!

And, (said Mr. McD.,) if we will but look into the circumstances under which the money obtained for the State stocks we are called upon to assume has been expended, and the extraordinary popular delusion under which it was applied to the construction of wild schemes of internal improvement, we shall be impressively admonished of the madness and folly of the proposed assumption. In the course of a few years, two hundred millions of foreign capital were brought into the country. While this enormous amount of money was in the progress of accumulation, it was like a shower of gold poured out upon the States, totally deranging the monetary affairs of the country; and the natural effect of which was to enhance the price of everything to the extreme point of inflation. And it may not be inappropriate to remark here, that the importation of this immense amount of foreign capital contributed, not less than the expansion of our bank circulation, to produce the revulsion and distresses under which we are now suffering. Indeed, it largely aided in producing that expansion. During the period to which I have referred, (said he,) a perfect delirium prevailed. Men acted as if they were under the influence of a stimulating draught. All responsibility in the expenditure of this borrowed money was destroyed; and it would be seen that the tate Governments, and all their agents employed in arrying on their works of internal improvement, ced precisely as if the money they were expending ere rained down from the heavens, and the shower ould last forever. The consequence of this uniersal excitement and delirium was a system of nexampled extravagance and waste, causing the orks executed to cost three, four, or five times as uch as it would now cost to construct them. nd (said Mr. McD.) I will venture the opinion, at, at this moment, there is no prudent man—even one could be found having the requisite capital—ho would accept, as a gift, nine-tenths of the orks made with this borrowed capital, if he were ound, by the terms of the gift, to keep em up. They would not pay expenses; nd the money expended must be regarded as nk and lost forever. And here I cannot but xpress an opinion I have long entertained, and hich the occasion forcibly suggests—that, for all overnments, the faculty of borrowing money, and ading the debt, is one of the most unfortunate iscoveries ever made in political economy; and hat, for the States of this Union, all should now nite in deploring its existence. And now, (said e,) when the States have just waked up from this inful delirium, to survey, in soberness, the embarassment and ruin that surround them, is it proper hat we, by the monstrous scheme proposed, should dminister to them again the same bewildering ose, producing the same disasters? It is perfectly lear that the practical operation of the scheme will e to place another two hundred millions of dollars t the disposal of the State Governments, to be used y them, without any responsibility to the people of he United States, who must pay the taxes by which his money is to be raised. Now, is it not obvious, that, if the State Governments were held to a eparate responsibility, by requiring each to raise, by taxes imposed on its own constituents, the money necessary to pay its own debts, and execute its own improvements,—the only effective check upon the extravagance of Government, which human wisdom has devised, would be brought into active operation? When every citizen of the State knows and feels that he pays his full proportion of every dollar expended, then, and not till then, will he hold his representative and his executive agents to a rigorous accountability.

And now, (said Mr. McD.,) a few words on the naked question of expediency. And here I must ask the projectors of this grand scheme of delusion, what is the great favor we should confer upon the States by its adoption? The honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] had been pleased to speak of the paternal character of this Government in its relation to the States, and the obligations incident to that character. The duties of a paternal government! Mr. President, this is not the first time, by many hundreds, that I have heard this language used on the floor of Congress. Whenever Congress was called upon to do any wrong—whenever an outrage was about to be perpetrated upon the rights of the people—it was always attempted to cover and consecrate it by assuming this paternal character. It was a remark of Junius, (which I do not repeat as approving his particular application of it,) "that whenever a Scotchman smiled in his face, he involuntarily put his hand on his pocket." Now I must remark, that whenever I hear the paternal character of this Government invoked, I involuntarily put my hand upon my pocket, suspecting some secret design of legislative injustice and plunder. And what, I ask, is the practical character and effect of measures professing to give money to the States? Do gentlemen aim to inculcate upon the people of the States the idolatrous idea, that this Government (as if some godlike power) is endowed with inherent wealth, or some supernatural alchemic process of creating money, not derived from the people themselves? And were they, like children, to be deluded into the belief that Congress, by these inherent self-created measures, were about to relieve their pecuniary embarrassments? All this tended to induce the people to bow down and worship this Government, as the Persians worshipped the sun. God forbid that this tendency, to which all communities are but too prone, should be countenanced or encouraged by any measures of ours.

Let us meet the question fairly, and expose the operation of the proposed measure plainly to the people. Every power we exercise, and every dollar we possess, must be derived from the people of those very States to whom we affect to manifest such paternal munificence, in giving them back what we have taken from them already, or imposed on ourselves the obligation to do so hereafter; deducting, however, what has stuck to the fingers of a host of officers, or fallen by the wayside, in the double process of collecting and giving back the money.

Since, then, we have nothing to give the people, and are, in fact, dependent upon them, and the revenue drawn from their labor, for the very bread we eat—as their representatives here, let us realize the fact, (as the people certainly will,) that for every dollar we may seem to give the States, in one form, we shall be under the necessity of drawing from them one dollar and twenty-five cents (including the expenses of collecting and distributing) in some form of taxation. I confidently ask, then, if there is a single Senator on this floor who will give countenance to this insane scheme of deception, by which the evils of to-day are to be postponed till to-morrow, only to fall with redoubled force upon those who vainly hope to be relieved from their embarrassments?

I am aware (said Mr. McD.) that this scheme is recommended to many, by the expectation that the revenue by which the interest of the proposed stock will be paid, and the stock ultimately redeemed, will be raised by indirect taxation. But this hope is utterly destitute of foundation. Can any one suppose that, with an exhausted treasury, a Government living from day to day upon the miserable shifts of borrowing, and a commerce which is almost cut off by an unjustand suicidal policy, (so that the duties will not, by some eight millions of dollars, defray the ordinary expenses of the several departments,) we can nevertheless pay an annual interest of six millions upon the stock proposed to be issued, without resorting to direct taxes? No, sir; in less than a single year we should be driven to the alternative of direct taxation, or of refusing to pay the interest on the stock, to the utter ruin of our public credit.

And this brings me to another view of the subject, which deserves to be gravely considered. This scheme is designed to relieve the indebted States, by indirectly assuming their debts; but, in order to accomplish this, it is necessary to do something more. It is, therefore, proposed to issue $200,000,000 of 3 per cent. stock, and distribute it among the States—not in proportion to their debts, but to their federal numbers. Now, while the distributive share of Pennsylvania would not pay one-half part of her debts, that of other States would far exceed them; and that of some would be a clear fund, subject to no debt at all. South Carolina, for example, with a very small debt, would be entitled to above six millions; the economical and exemplary State of North Carolina (which, I believe, has scarcely any debt) will be entitled to above nine millions; and Missouri would be entitled to about three millions, with no debt at all. Now, mark the unequal operation of this scheme on the indebted and on the unindebted States! The former, if (as it is said) they could exchange their United States 3 per cents. for State 6 per cents., would realize the par value for their distributive share. Now, what would be the condition of the unindebted States, and those owing less than their share of the stock? What could they realize for that stock; and to what use could they apply the proceeds? It is proposed to throw two hundred millions of our 3 per cent. stock on the markets of the world, with a considerable and increasing debt already hanging over us, and without the means of paying that debt, or even the ordinary current expenses of the Government. Pray, what would that stock be worth to North Carolina, Missouri, and the other unindebted States, and States but little indebted? We have ascertained, by actual experiment, that our 6 per cent. stock could not be sold in Europe at par—or, indeed, at any price—though small in amount. What, then, will be the value of the proposed 3 per cents., when the amount of our debts shall be swelled to two hundred and forty millions, with an annual interest of eight millions and a half, and an annual revenue notoriously insufficient to pay one-half our annual expenses, including this interest?

Sir, (said Mr. McD.,) it would be extravagant to suppose it could be sold at fifty dollars for the hundred. I do not believe it could be sold for that price. So that, in effect, you would compel these States to receive this stock, for which they have no use, at par; when they could not obtain for it one-half its par value. I say they would be compelled to receive it at par; because they would have to pay their full proportion of the taxes necessary to pay the interest annually, and finally, in some twenty years, to redeem the whole amount of the principal, after having paid $170,000,000 as interest. Such, sir, would be the operation of this most monstrous and abominable project. In twenty years after paying this $170,000,000 in current interest, our immediate posterity would have to redeem the whole amount of the debt itself—a sum nearly twice as large as the debt of the late war with Great Britain; a war, by which our character as a nation was established, and the glory of our arms, by sea and land, extended throughout the world. Such would be the inheritance which, as reckless and improvident fathers, we should leave to our children. Nothing could be more unwise as it regards all the States; and nothing could be more monstrously unequal and unjust to the unindebted States. But I have no idea, after the opinions I hope to hear expressed in this Senate, that foreigners would take this stock on any terms.

But, (said Mr. McD.,) as I perceive the Senate is now full, I have no disposition to press the argument further. I feel it, however, to be my duty, before I sit down—a duty which I owe to myself, to the States, and to the foreign and domestic capitalists to whom this stock may be offered—to make, in my place here, a solemn declaration, by which I will stand or fall, to the end that those capitalists (particularly the holders of State stocks in Europe) may not be deceived. I confidently believe, then, that all the States will ultimately fulfil their obligations and redeem their faith, which has been constitutionally pledged. I as confidently believe that this Government has no shadow of constitutional power to issue stock, pledging the public faith for any such purpose as that indicated in the resolutions, and that the whole $200,000,000 would not be constitutionally worth the paper on which these resolutions are written. The promises upon the face of it would be utterly null and void, and I would feel no more obligation to redeem them than to pay a forged note. And if, by any accident, a party should ever get temporary possession of the power of this Government, by whom such stock shall be issued, I here solemnly declare and pledge myself that I will wage war—exterminating war—against it, so long as my life lasts, whether I shall be in Congress or out of it. And whether it may be called nullification, repudiation, or by whatever other name of odium it may be designated, I will persevere in resisting, by all the influence I can exert as a citizen, and all the power I may possess as a legislator, the payment of all claims upon the United States founded upon this unconstitutional attempt to assume the debts of the States; holding at the same time that we are under the most sacred obligation to preserve the faith of the Government constitutionally pledged, free from violation, or even suspicion. If, notwithstanding all this, foreign capitalists should still take the proposed stock in exchange for State stocks, they will act upon their own responsibility, and not upon mine—their eyes will be fully open to the consequences; and let them make the experiment.

SPEECH OF MR. WHITE,

OF INDIANA,

In the House of Representatives, February 8, 1843.—In reply to Mr. HOLMES, of South Carolina, on the principles which divide the two parties.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the naval appropriation bill—

Mr. WHITE addressed the Committee as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: From the commencement of this Congress to the present time, a fashion has prevailed here, among that portion of the House who style themselves the Democracy, in every speech—no matter what the subject under consideration—to indulge in vehement abuse of the Whig party, its principles, and the motives which have governed its members in their legislative action. By one gentleman we are informed that the great political struggle of 1840 was characterized by nothing but base and shameless appeals to the worst passions of the populace; that no principles were contended for, and none involved; and that the great victory achieved by that contest proved nothing but a popular desire for a change of rulers. Another gentleman proclaims, in a strain of indignant rebuke, that we had one set of principles for the West, another set for the North, and yet another for the South; and that, accommodating our theories to the great variety of popular prejudices, we sought success, regardless of the means employed; and, therefore, nothing was decided by the people. Another gentleman, [Mr. PICKENS,] and one whose ability and position demand for his remarks more than an ordinary share of consideration, declares that "never did a party succeed to power with principles more corrupt and profligate;" thus conceding to us some principles, and according to them the credit of uniformity and universality, although stigmatized with the characteristics of profligacy and corruption.

If gentlemen could agree among themselves, and hold a uniformity of sentiment upon this point, a reply might be more easily made to them. As it is, however, being uninformed upon which allegation in the complaint the "Democracy" intend to rely, I shall not at this time traverse either. It is sufficient that each contradicts the other; and but one can be true.

If, in 1840, Whig principles were not well defined and well understood, now is the time to forestall any future reproach for a similar condition of things, by a clear, open, manly, and bold declaration of the principles by each party, upon which the great battle of 1844 shall be fought. No period can better than the present be adapted to the settlement of preliminaries and the "defining of positions."

While gentlemen have been so liberal in the bestowal of their animadversions upon Whig policy and Whig principles, it seems to have escaped their notice that there were two sides to the question; and that, while making their crusade into the enemy's country, their own citadel might be exposed to successful attack. Let us, in return for the civilities of these gentlemen "Democrats," examine their position. Are they united or divided upon questions of national policy? What are their principles?

The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. HOLMES,] who has just resumed his seat, had disclosed to us the Democratic panacea for all the ills to which the country has fallen heir—FREE TRADE. Is this the cardinal principle of the Democratic party? Or is there a diversity of sentiment upon it in that party? We have the testimony of the gentleman to whom I have alluded that this is not only the principle, but the great principle, of Democracy. Direct taxation, the necessary result of this policy, the gentleman scouts—not, as his speech would indicate, on account of its impropriety as a political or national measure; but because of the present inability of the people to meet the exactions of such a system of finance. That this is contemplated by him as an ultimate resort, none who heard his speech can doubt; although the evil day is to be postponed until the public distress shall be relieved. There are other gentlemen of his party, however, who, in their enthusiasm for the establishment of this new heresy of free trade, do not scruple to declare their readiness now to resort to its necessary result—direct taxation; and I here pause to pay the tribute of my admiration to them for the independence of their theory, and the boldness with which they defend it. However full, in my judgment, it may be of error, the manliness with which it has been avowed, and the majestic intellects which have been enlisted to expound and enforce it, challenge a large degree of respe It would have been more in keeping with the independence of a South Carolina Representative, had the gentleman marched boldly up to the support of his friends in their advocacy of this doctrine, instead of exhibiting, piecemeal, his concurrence with their views, while he feared an open avowal. The position in which he left himself is anything but enviable. Free trade was urged upon us as the only remedy for existing evils; while direct taxation, the only mode of raising revenue under his system of financial policy, was rejected. How, when all restrictions are removed from our commerce, and we are deprived of imposts, we are to raise revenue for the uses of the Government—direct taxation being out of the question—was left to our conjecture. Sir, this scheme of political economy is only equalled in magnificence and sublimity of conception by that of the Illinois Legislature; which sapient body recently passed a joint resolution, in substance, declaring that all tariffs were oppressive and unjust, and that, in the present distressed state of the people, direct taxation was not to be thought of. All of which being interpreted is, that the Government must be administered without revenue, and all its officers serve without pay! But, sir, I repeat the question: Is free trade the cardinal principle of "Democracy?" I ask an answer from the party on this floor, for none better than they can answer. Let there be no dodging—let gentlemen avow and disavow. It is due to the country and themselves that their "position should be defined." Since they accuse us of contrariety in sentiment, and of holding a set of promiscuous tenets, it is proper that they should reveal to the country the concord of their counsels, if there be any, and disclose their principles free from all obscurity. But why interrogate? There is no prominent member of the party who will risk his veracity upon a denial. During the last session, one gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] entertained us with an hour-long speech upon the equality and justice of free trade, and deprecated all tariffs as so many gross infringements of the Constitution and the rights of the States; which latter, in the estimation of a certain clique of politicians, seem to be of higher and holier authority than the first. A gentleman from Alabama [Mr. LEWIS] expressed the same, or similar views, in that lucid and forcible manner which has ever characterized his oratory; and I well remember the profound attention which was paid to him, and the deep impression which he made upon the House. Another member from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] has, within a few days, proclaimed that "there is no harmony for the Democratic party, except upon the broad principle of free trade." A gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] during the present Congress, has, with a frankness which always distinguishes him, ably advocated the same doctrine. But this principle of free trade is not local in its party application. To whatever quarter of this Union it may be indebted for its paternity, it is ubiquitous with the "Democracy." It has its advocates at the North as well as at the South; and from "Northern men with Southern principles" I summon witnesses to testify to its legitimacy as the offspring of "Democracy."

One of the Representatives from the city of New York [Mr. ROOSEVELT] has sought frequent occasions to express his party preference for this system of policy, and has advocated it with an untiring zeal and industry. A colleague of his, too, from the same city, whom, as it is unparliamentary to "call names," I will designate as the young gentleman from New York, [Mr. MCKEON,] has, in repeated instances, come to the aid of the elder gentleman in his advocacy of this free-trade policy; and I may add, that no man upon this floor has stricken more good blows for that policy, nor has any been more vociferous in its commendation to the country as the true universal Democratic faith, than the young member from New York. One of the members of the Pennsylvania delegation from the city of Philadelphia—the great man of the delegation, as well as of the States, and a man of gigantic mind he is too, [Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL,] and one who, if his course as a Representative, and all his party speeches here and elsewhere be summoned as witnesses, prove him to be a genuine disciple of Democracy, the most rank, radical, and unquestioned—has also joined in the warfare against imposts and protection, and thrown the weight of his great influence and intellect into the scale of free trade. This, indeed, in his remarks a few days ago, was offered as the specific, and the only one, for the relief of individual and public embarrassments. The catalogue does not stop here. Another gentleman of the New York delegation, [Mr. DAVIS,] at the past session, made us a speech, from which it appeared that, while he sustained without flinching all the avowed principles of his party, there were some of the more radical ones unavowed, from which he was determined to strip the guise of secrecy; and, with a master hand, he did it. His revelation of democratic faith furnished us much amusement; and a faith it proved to be more radical, comprehensive, and latitudinous, more "omnium gatherum" in its character, more levelling and agrarian in its operation and results, than any ever before offered by party leaders to the credulity of a confiding people. And what was it? FREE TRADE, hard-money, no banks or bank paper, no credit, DIRECT TAXATION, the universal rights of man, and no laws for the collection of debts. If the array of authorities is not yet sufficient to identify the principle of free trade with Democracy, I bring another witness to the stand; to doubt the testimony of whom would bring down upon the offender all the rigors of the party inquisition. That witness is the now prominent, distinguished, and recognised leader of the Democratic party, JOHN C. CALHOUN—a man for whom, and for whose integrity, public and private, I entertain the highest respect; and, although my opinion upon this point may be adverse to that of the party of which I am one, there is nothing in this subject or occasion that requires me to withhold its expression. Whatever may have been his political vacillations, (and they are many,) in all I believe he has been actuated by what he conceived to be the common interests of his countrymen—proudly disregarding all those consequences to the popularity of a statesman which ever flow from a change of position, no matter whether, by such change, error be corrected or avoided. But let him speak upon this policy of free trade and its generality. During the past session, when the revenue bill was under consideration in the Senate, Mr. CALHOUN, in the course of a speech which he made upon the bill, said: "He had not spoken with a view to change a vote here: he knew that an angel from heaven could not affect the actions or opinions of those here. But he confided in the strength and ultimate triumph of truth. We had formerly struggled against greater odds. But now we see the whole Democratic party rallied under the banner of free trade." Can language be plainer, or a principle be more clearly defined? And let it be remembered that we have it from the highest possible authority, that to the advocacy and support of this principle the "whole Democratic party" have rallied. Sir, is anything more needed to prove that free trade is the cardinal principle of Democracy? The witnesses I have introduced are those who rank not only high, but highest with their party for talent and integrity: their will is the law, and their principles the principles of the party. If their testimony is not to be relied upon, then is there no longer virtue among statesmen, and truth has fled these halls to give place to dissembling and deceit.

Now, sir, although I believe with Mr. CALHOUN, that "the whole Democratic party" are secretly in favor of free trade, I know that Democratic members from the North hold a different language when at home among their constituents. One of the New York democratic State papers, the leading organ of the party, during the gubernatorial contest in November last, called upon all tariff men of both parties to glorify SILAS WRIGHT, because, by his vote in the Senate of the United States, he had saved the tariff bill—the same bill that the Legislature of South Carolina has recently, by joint resolution, asked us to repeal; and threatening us, if we do not, with that fearful remedy—a "resort to her original rights." The lead of this paper was followed by many of the "distinguished Democracy" in their addresses to the people as well as in their private communications with their constituents. Yet these gentlemen here are as gentle as cooing doves, and whisper softly in the believing ears of their Southren brethren, "we are for free trade."

Sir, it is time that the delusion were destroyed, and the mask of hypocrisy stripped from such Janus-faced politicians. They cannot have one set of principles for the constituent bodies, and another set for the ears of partisans leaders. I call upon Northern Democrats now to rise in their places and declare whether they are for free trade. It is due to yourselves—it is due to your stations—it is due to the country—it is due to honor and fair dealing, that you should precisely "define your positions." If you are united in political sentiment, let it be so understood. If you are divided past all hope of compromise or reconciliation, let us—let the country know it, and decide upon the merits of your controversy. Why conceal your condition? What cause for concealment? Do men or measures divide you? Or are you not divided, and are your counsels hermonious? Let it come out—publish all. Sir, I call again—distinctly, emphatically call upon Northern Democrats to rise now in their places and declare, if they can, that the testimony of their party leaders from South Carolina—one from Alabama—one from Virginia—one from Pennsylvania—and three from New York, is untrue. Dare you do it now—here in your places? Your leader [Mr. CALHOUN] has said that the "whole Democratic party have rallied to the standard of free trade." Dare you say it is false! If so, rise and pronounce the word. Gentlemen are silent! and that silence eloquently admits the truth of their great leader's declaration, while they have not the courage to avow it in terms. Let it go to the North that the Representatives of that section of the Union are for the doctrine of free trade while here; and by the North, disgraced by the duplicity of their agents, let the rebuke be administered to them.

I call upon a gentleman from New York now in my eye—the Representative of the district of Mr. Van Buren's residence, [Mr. MCCLELLAN]—to tell this House whether he constitutes one of the "whole Democratic party"—whether he is an advocate for free trade?

Mr. MCCLELLAN. I will respond to the inquiry. If the gentleman means, by free trade, low duties——

Mr. WHITE. I do not yield the floor to the gentleman to make a speech. I ask him a plain question; and before he answers, he requires me to explain the meaning of one of the cardinal principles of his party.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. If the gentleman means——

Mr. WHITE. I mean nothing about the principle. I ask you a simple question. Will you answer, yes or no? The gentleman declines the answer! I thought it would be thus.

Let us now look to the operation of this principle when reduced to practice. The term free trade defines its own meaning: it is a trade free from all legislative restraints, and left to the control of its own laws. If the taxing power of this Government be applied to it, and it is compelled to pay contributions for its license, it is no longer a free, but a restrained trade. To be free, it must not be subjected to duties, and must be chargeable with the payment of no revenue to the Government. In short, the Government must be left without revenue, or resort to direct taxation to procure it, if this policy prevails. If this theory were established in practice, what think you, sir, each State would be bound to contribute by direct taxation as its portion of the Federal revenue? I have been curious enough to make the calculation upon the returns of the last census, assuming $28,500,000 as the amount of annual expenditure—an amount far below that required by the Secretary of the Treasury in his report—and assuming federal numbers as the basis of taxation. The account would stand thus:

Maine	$1,003,530	Delaware	$130,140
New Hampshire	569,150	Maryland	671,450
Massachusetts	1,465,390	Virginia	1,771,130
Rhode Island	217,260	North Carolina	1,078,310
Connecticut	619,950	South Carolina	594,390
Vermont	563,880	Georgia	691,390
New York	4,867,840	Alabama	656,360
New Jersey	746,610	Mississippi	375,660
Pennsylvania	3,345,060	Louisiana	293,670
Ohio	3,033,930	Tennessee	1,184,680
Indiana	1,371,730	Kentucky	1,114,040
Illinois	952,360	Missouri	564,140
Michigan	424,530	Arkansas	139,390

In the calculation which I have made, to avoid placing too high the ratable proportions of the slaveholding States, I have assumed for each that the voting population are the tax-payers; which is, in effect, true. It may be that many voters do not pay taxes; but the deficiency is fully, if not more than supplied by taxes paid by widows, the guardians of minor children, and foreigners who have estates in land. Could New York pay this sum of $4,857,840 annually? The statement of the amount is a sufficient reply. During the late fall election in that State, the party leaders were rampant at the thought of Whig ascendency and a "forty million debt;" and their stump and caucus orators, in doleful strains, besought the people to restore the State Government to the keeping of the Democracy, because Whig mismanagement had imposed upon them a direct tax of about six hundred thousand dollars, which they were unable to pay. The Government was restored to them; and how do they propose to alleviate or remove this popular burden of a six hundred thousand dollars direct tax? By free trade. In other words, as the people of the State of New York cannot pay the sum of six hundred thousand dollars annually, without great inconvenience, if they can ever pay it at all, Democracy proposes to relieve them of the inconvenience or inability by exacting annually an additional sum of FOUR MILLION EIGHT HUNDRED AND FIFTY-SEVEN THOUSAND EIGHT HUNDRED AND FORTY DOLLARS by direct taxation for Federal uses. A New York city member informed us a short time since that his was the "progressive or improvement party," and that ours is the "stand-still party." I do not now stop to controvert his position; but, for myself, sir, I would rather always remain in that condition of blissful ignorance to which the gentleman has consigned me, than to purchase progression or improvement at the enormous price of public misery and ruin which must be paid for it. I would rather forever "stand still" than to "progress," when each advancing step must tread upon the prostrate interests and the crushed and despairing hopes of a nation. No, sir; I desire no party improvement, or party progression, if it must be based upon public wretchedness.

I turn now to examine the blessings in reserve for my own State under this financial policy of "free trade and direct taxation." The gentleman who last addressed the House [Mr. HOLMES], thought proper to indulge in many censorious commentaries upon the conduct of Western members in endeavoring to withhold large appropriations for the navy; and he invoked the liberality of our patriotism to sustain in future that branch of the national service. Strange invocation from a strange quarter! How many times and for how many years has the West appealed to the gentleman, nay, to the whole school of "strict-construction" politicians—master and disciples—to give us appropriations to improve the navigation of the Western rivers! And how often have those appeals been burdened with minute specifications of the loss of property and human life, in consequence of appropriations being refused! How often have they been implored to vote money to continue the Cumberland road—a great national thoroughfare, which has peopled the wilderness and brought untold millions into your treasury! And what answer has been given to those appeals and invocations! "The appropriation is unconstitutional." This is the unvarying and eternal response. In their estimation, the Constitution is general in theory—local in practice. It was made exclusively for that portion of the Union lying east of the Alleghanies, and most especially for South Carolina, to which State alone belongs the right of interpreting its provisions! Appropriations for harbors, light-houses, buoys, dry-docks, fortifications, arsenals, armories, are tolerated by the Constitution, under a South Carolina construction; but an appropriation for Western rivers, upon whose bosoms float one-half the agricultural wealth of this nation, and by means of which more than one-half of the internal commerce of the country is carried on,—such an appropriation is forbidden by the Constitution! And thus it is that the gentleman, by the aid of "strict construction," refuses to us all benefit of part or lot in the appropriations made by this Government; and yet he cannot understand the motive which influences Western members to vote against large appropriations for expenditure upon the seaboard. Let me explain to him the position of my State, and he will sufficiently understand the motives which govern its Representatives upon all questions of appropriation.

Since Indiana was admitted into the Union as a State, she has paid into the national treasury nearly $16,000,000, proceeds of the public lands sold within her limits. This amount has been expended somewhere, but none of it has found its way back again to the State by which it was paid. South Carolina has had her share of it.

For the last eight years the people of Indiana have paid, in difference of exchange alone, about seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars per annum. I say paid; because the difference of exchange (which during that period has averaged eight per cent.) has been added to the price of all commodities purchased by our merchants in the Eastern cities and consumed within my State. In this case, as it ever will be in all others where pecuniary loss must be sustained in consequence of the derangement of currency and exchange, mercantile sagacity throws that loss off the shoulders of dealers to those of consumers. This annual burden is imposed upon us because "strict construction" has withheld a charter for a national bank; and patiently have we paid the yearly contribution for South Carolina interpretation of a Constitution not made for us; and pay it we ever must while the star of "Democracy" is in the ascendant. I will state the annual account between Indiana and the General Government.

Government of the United States to Indiana,

DR.

To difference of exchange per annum paid by the people in consequence of refusal of the Government to give to them a national currency	$750,000
To amount paid by sale of public lands, per annum	500,000
To amount paid by consumers of articles of foreign merchandise in consequence of tariff duties	500,000
Total	1,750,000

By appropriation for the Cumberland road	000,000
By appropriation to improve the navigation of the Wabash river	000,000
By appropriation for harbor at Michigan city	000,000
By appropriation for the improvement of navigation in Western rivers	000,000

Thus stands the account. But this is far from being the entire amount of our annual burden. There is to be added to this the sum of $120,000 for the ordinary expenses of the State Government, and the further sum of $800,000 interest upon our debt; which, with the sum of $1,750,000 before stated, makes an annual amount of $2,670,000, chargeable upon the industry and enterprise of our citizens. It is true, the demand for interest on our debt has not been punctually met, because of our inability to meet it. It stands charged against us, however, and must and eventually will be paid, without the repudiation of a farthing. In the language of my colleague, [Mr. LANE,] we will settle fair if we never pay. Well, sir, what is the proposition which Democracy makes to relieve us from this insupportable liability? Free trade again; by which the sum of $500,000 now paid by the consumers of tariff duties would be withdrawn from the account, and the sum of $1,371,730, to be raised by direct taxation, substituted. This would leave our liability for each year $3,541,730—an amount which we cannot pay while this Government pursues this "strict construction" policy, and a large portion of which we need not pay, because it would not be charged against us if the Government shall be ever administered, as it should, for the common benefit of all in every part of the Union. Is the gentleman surprised now that we oppose extravagant appropriations of money, no part of which is to be expended amongst ourselves? When he aids in establishing, for our benefit, a national bank, and thus strikes from our account $750,000; when he votes an appropriation of money to improve the navigation of western rivers to prevent the loss of our property and the lives of our adventurous people,—his appeal to our generosity will not be characterized by the selfishness that now marks it, and will be entitled to more respect and receive more consideration.

The Atlantic States, in effect, pay nothing of the revenue of the Government. That a large portion of it is collected upon the seaboard, I admit; but what becomes of it? True, it is paid into the national treasury, and so is the $500,000 annually collected from Indiana; but it does not remain there. Congress appropriates the money, under the lash of "strict construction," for the army and navy, fortifications, light-houses, dry-docks, building vessels of war, the improvement of harbors, &c., not one of which objects is local to the West. And thus it is that what the Atlantic States pay into the treasury to-day, they get back again to-morrow in the form of an appropriation. This we could endure—of this we would not complain; but the amount paid by these States, in its return, comes not alone as it went; it brings with it what the Western States pay; the $500,000, paid by Indiana contributes to swell the return tide, and that is in like manner expended upon the Atlantic coast.

For this reason I say that the Atlantic States, in effect, pay nothing. The public revenue alternates periodically between them and the treasury, performing a reliable and almost constant circulation; while the toiling, adventurous West is deprived of all participation in the pecuniary benefits resulting from the administration of the Government. It is constitutional for us to pay everything; unconstitutional for us to receive anything. Constituting, as our people do, nearly one-third of this Union, we have been made pack-horses to bear the load of the whole, and have been kept on "short allowance" at that. The inequality of the burdens imposed by a bad administration of national affairs upon the State of Indiana has been, and is, tenfold greater than those of which South Carolina ever complained; and yet I feel a just pride in saying, such has always been her attachment to our free institutions, in all her broad forests, her verdant prairies, and her populous towns, that not one traitorous hand was ever found to raise the standard of "nullification;" no demagogue to attract a passing crowd, to gasconade about "State sovereignty;" no patriot orator to talk grandiloquently of a "resort to original rights." That State has thus far abided her time, and will continue so to do.

The second principle of "Democracy" is hard money; and this, with that of free trade, constitutes, as far as I have been able to learn, the whole affirmative creed of the party; the residue of it being a mere string of negatives. They are opposed to a United States bank—opposed to a State bank paper—opposed to extravagance in the national administration—opposed, in short, to everything that is of Whig origin—opposed to all but two political principles, and these are free trade and hard money. If they hold any other affirmative principle, it has been my misfortune never to see or hear it published.

Hard money! It is a very primitive idea for an "improvement party," and one that, discarding all the lessons of experience and all the conveniences of modernized society, carries us back by historical association to the pastoral age for examples in finance. A strange "progression" this, that with one bound leaps back over all civilization, and snatches from the darkest age of barbarism a light to guide the financial policy of the American Republic! But how is this principle to affect the country, if established in practice by the restoration of the "Democracy" to power? That the circulating medium of the country, composed of a mixed currency of bank paper and specie, is the representative of the value of the property of the country, is a fact conceded by all parties; and that, in proportion to the increase of the circulation, prices rise, and in proportion to the decrease prices fall; or, in other words, if the standard of value decreases, everything represented by it retrogrades in exact proportion. Hence it is, that, in the years 1836 and 1837, when the circulation was inflated to double the present amount, prices were double what they now are. That inflation of circulation and consequent inflation of prices was caused by "Democratic policy, which gave to us the State banks, and stimulated them to extravagant emissions of paper; but, no sooner was the object accomplished, than the popular prejudice which was awakened by the appeals of demagogues against the United States Bank; and, not sated by its revels amid the ruins of the best currency ever given to a nation, turned like a hungry tiger upon these "little monsters," and the leaders of the party were compelled to join in the attack, or be swept from the political world by the fury of that spirit which, for another purpose, they had invoked. They did join in the attack, and these currency bantlings of theirs were denounced; their very fathers at first cast imputations upon their legitimacy, and ultimately threw off all disguises, and with bold profligacy declared them to be of Whig origin, and unworthy of the countenance of the Democracy. Credit cannot exist against popular will; and the credit of these institutions, by the ceaseless attacks of party leaders, was destroyed. They were compelled to contract their circulation one-half or more, and the country was deprived of one-half its currency; the representative of value was decreased, prices fell in proportion, and the people were ruined. And now, to remedy the evils wrought by their hands, they offer to us this hard-money panacea as the only one left in their budget of nostrums. The mixed currency of this country amounts to about two hundred millions of dollars, of which eighty-seven millions is of gold and silver. For the purpose of illustrating the position which I shall assume, I will state the amount of gold and silver at $100,000,000, which is more favorable to the hard-money party. Under the present circulation, the real and personal property of the State of Indiana is assessed for purposes of taxation at $100,000,000, and upon each hundred dollars' worth a tax of thirty cents is levied. If the circulating medium were reduced one-half, by striking from it all bank paper, the property of that State, being represented by one-half less than at present, would sink in value to $50,000,000. But how would it affect the taxes? A given sum must be collected, to raise which requires a tax of thirty cents upon each hundred dollars of the one hundred millions. If the one hundred millions be reduced to fifty millions, does it not follow that a tax of sixty cents upon each hundred dollars must be imposed to raise the sum required? Here, then, we have a remedy proposed, which, if adopted, will double the taxes paid by every citizen of Indiana, and at the same time reduce one-half his present means of paying them. But it will stop not with tax-payers; it will operate in ruinous effect upon all classes of society, except the money-lenders; and upon none more rigorously than the poor day-laborers. A policy that reduces in value one-half each farm, and all the produce raised upon it, in my State, will not except from its operation manual labor. This must also come down, to preserve the proportion between its value and that of property; and the ripening glories of "Democracy" are only to become visible when the humble laborer shall return at night to a family begging bread, with twelve and a half cents in his pocket—the reward of a day's hard toil! Such a doctrine may find advocates among rich creditors, but hardly, I should apprehend, among the indebted class of society; and I know but little of the farming population of my State if they are ready and willing to aid in establishing a policy that will compel them, by its process of reducing prices, to sell four hundred instead of two hundred bushels of wheat to raise the sum of one hundred dollars to pay a debt. The State of Indiana now can neither pay her debt nor the interest upon it; and it is but a poor compliment to her intelligence to suppose that she will be found acting with a party that proposes to double her indebtedness by way of relief to her inability to pay!

I have examined hastily, sir, the results of this Democratic faith, if ever reduced to practice, upon the people and upon the interests of my State; and, as Indiana has no national interests separate and distinct from those of her sisters of this great Confederacy, the effect of these measures upon her is but an example of what it will be upon the whole Union.

Henceforth, let there be no misunderstanding or confusion about principles or positions. It seems to be agreed, upon all sides, that the great parties are to meet each other in the coming struggle, and do battle for their principles. On the one side we have free trade and direct taxation; on the other, a tariff for revenue and protection to American industry. One party swears eternal hostility to all banks, and offers to the country hard money only; the other opposes to it a national bank to regulate the currency and exchanges. One party proposes to reduce trade to the standard of currency; the other to increase the currency to meet the demands of trade. There is one measure besides, which the Whigs propose, that finds no antagonist principle in the Democratic party of an affirmative character. It is the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands—a measure which, if adopted, would annually distribute to the States large sums of money arising from the sales of their own lands. The sums which would be thus thrown into the treasuries of the various States would enable many of them, without a resort to such onerous taxation as now prevails, to meet their liabilities with punctuality. To this measure the "Democracy" are opposed, but offer nothing as a substitute. I know of no other clear and well-defined principle advocated by either party, unless it be the hackneyed one of "economy," which is, and ever has been, professed by all politicians of every age and school; and if there be any other in the "Democracy," they would confer infinite obligations by disclosing it to the country.

Now, sir, I have said all that I desired to say by way of counter-attack upon the measures, principles, and policy of the minority of this House. I do not frequently obtrude my counsel upon the House, and should not have addressed it to-day, but that the "spirit was moved" by the fierce assaults which the gentleman from South Carolina thought it proper to make upon that party with which I have always acted. And this, Mr. Chairman, is perhaps the last time that my voice will ever be heard within the walls of this Capitol, speaking to my constituents or the nation the language of advice or warning. Since I have been here I have not sought to gratify my desire for display; but rather, like the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MATTOCKS,] have played the part of a good listener to the speeches of others, and, by submitting patiently to what, in many instances, has been rather an "afflicting dispensation," I give it as an opinion that I have richly earned my eight dollars per day. Still I have endeavored, by an unyielding devotion to the great principles which I have ever advocated, to deserve at least the commendation of that constituency through whose generous confidence I became a Representative.

And now, when about to retire from all participation in the legislation of the country, (as retire I shall, and surrender my trust to the power from which it emanated,) I cannot but be moved by the contemplation of the future condition, as it is to be affected by legislation here, of those from whom I have received unvarying demonstrations of kindness and favor. I disdain all affectation of philanthropy, nor do I arrogate to myself more than an ordinary share; but with others of my party I can and do feel for the misfortunes of my fellow-men. The time is not now, when I can look with the cold practised vision of the stoic, unconcerned, upon such testimonials as everywhere surround us, of deep, pervading, hopeless distress; and when a line of national policy is proposed for adoption which is to increase these testimonials and adds to this distress, I should be recreant to all duty to return to my constituents without first raising my voice here in warning and remonstrance.

Free trade! direct taxation! and hard money! To the "Democracy" here I say, You may, by one of the many accidents incident to a political campaign, succeed in establishing this faith in practice; but success will be the signal for revolution. The beggary of the subject is the security which the tyrant has of obedience to that will by which he is fed; but the free-born citizens of this Republic know that the Government itself is but an emanation from their will; and, with a scrutinizing intelligence, they watch the influence of its administration upon their interests. They will endure much—suffer more; but I warn you, push not their forbearance too far, or the time may come when the toiling millions, impatient of the hard condition to which you would reduce them, will rebel against the power that oppresses, and, in all the majesty of frenzied despair, rush to the rescue of those rights which you would wantonly wrest from them; and if that shall ever come, happy will it be if their pathway be not reeking with fraternal blood, and strewn with the fragments of your glorious Republic.

Free trade, direct taxation, and hard money, are emblazoned upon your banner; and, if you shame not of it, meet us in the field with it at the head of your columns in 1844. Our ensign stands where it has always stood—upon the battlements of the Constitution; and upon its folds are inscribed in bold, clear characters, Protection to American industry, a sound national currency, and the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands.

REMARKS OF MR. LEVY,

OF FLORIDA,

IN THE House of Representatives, Feb. 11, 1843—On the claim of inhabitants of West Florida for indemnity under the 9th article of the treaty of 1819, between Spain and the United States.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will endeavor, with as much brevity and directness as possible, to present to the consideration of the House the views I entertain respecting this bill. I hope to be able to satisfy the minds of those who will favor me with their attention, that there is nothing in the grounds taken against its passage, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] which ought to prejudice its success. I shall even hope that the mind of the gentleman himself, upon a review of those grounds, may yield to the strong claims which the case provided for in this bill presents upon the justice and good faith of the nation.

The objections urged by the gentleman rested on two principal grounds—to wit: 1. That the bill, as reported, would be inefficient of the object it contemplates; and, 2. That the claims it relates to were not intended to be provided for by the treaty between Spain and the United States.

I shall endeavor to reply to these objections; and will then take the occasion to add some further observations to the reply formerly made to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, respecting his proposed amendment, with the view of showing that he has entirely erred in his assertions as to the practice of this Government upon questions affecting the rights of property in slaves.

The first objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts is to the phraseology of the bill. Now, sir, is this—if even well founded—a justifiable reason for laying the bill on the table, as proposed by the motion of the gentleman? If there be merit in the claims of the persons designed to be provided for by it, does it comport with the justice of this House, and the honor of the nation, to refuse any action at all, because the form of the bill does not comprehend all the relief which is intended to be granted? If the bill is defective in its phraseology, it is the fault of its draughtsman, not of the claimants; and it is in the power of the House to amend or remodel it at pleasure. It would be monstrous to refuse that justice which has already been too long delayed, for the reason of supposed verbal inaccuracies in the form of a bill, the shape of which is entirely subject to the control of the legislative will. But although the bill is, perhaps, loosely prepared, I shall be quite content to take it as it stands. It is the reason of a law—the purpose of its passage—the intention of the Legislature, which controls its construction, even against its literal import; and I should have no fear whatever that the bill, if it becomes a law, would be so construed by any intelligent Secretary of the Treasury, as to render it fully effective of its palpable purpose. I repeat, sir, I am content to take it as it is; and if I, who advocate the measure it embodies, am satisfied, surely those who are opposed may very well forego objection upon this score. If there be no other objection, give me the bill, and let us test its sufficiency.

The next, and the important objection of the gentleman, was, that the claims referred to by the bill were not designed to be comprehended in the provisions of the treaty for indemnity; and, in support of this position, (which the gentleman stated he knew to be the fact, having negotiated the treaty,) he referred to a former report made from the Committee on Foreign Affairs by Mr. Archer, and to the rejection of the claims by Mr. Crawford upon the same ground.

Now, sir, so far as the report of a former Congress may weigh, I propose to meet the one adverse report, from which the gentleman read, by exhibiting more than one favorable report, made to the House. The first and full report, made prior to that referred to, and subsequent to the rejection of the claims by the Secretary of the Treasury, emanated from a source challenging the respect and confidence of this House. It proceeded from a gentleman whose ability as a statesman and jurist was long acknowledged in these halls, and who is even now filling a high and distinguished place in the service of the country—I allude, sir, to Mr. Everett of Massachusetts, then a member of this House, and now minister to England. Well, sir, Mr. Everett, and the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which he belonged, reported directly in favor of the claims provided for in this bill, after a full review of the subject, and of the grounds upon which the objection to them rested.

[Mr. LEVY here read extracts from the report.]

Then, again, sir, we have the able and elaborate report of the Committee on the Territories of the 26th Congress, made by a gentleman from New York, [Mr. MORGAN,] still a member of this House, in support of these claims, accompanied by a bill, of which the present is a literal copy. And we have now the report of a committee of the present Congress in favor of them, and upon whose report the bill under consideration has progressed thus far. Here then, sir, we have the weight of three reports of different Congresses in favor of these claims to balance against the one adverse report to which the gentleman has referred. The weight of reports, then, so far as that is of consequence, is clearly with the claimants.

The next item depended upon by the gentleman as a conclusion against the claim, was the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury against their validity under the treaty.

Now, sir, the decisions upon this point have been diverse. In the first place, the people of Florida regarded them as having been provided for; and presented them, under this belief, to the judge of West Florida. Here, then, was the popular understanding and conclusion. The judge of West Florida received and adjudicated them, as comprehended by the ninth article of the treaty, and provided for by the act of 1823 for carrying that act into effect. Here was the judicial decision upon the question. The Secretary of the Treasury decided that they were not so comprehended. This was the political decision. The claimants appealed from the decision of the Secretary to Congress. And, as I shall show at a future stage of the argument, the decision of Congress, as exhibited in the act of 1834, was against the Secretary, upon the principles of his decision, although these claims of 1814 were not provided for in that act. Here, then, was the legislative decision. With the popular, the judicial, and the legislative constructions of the treaty in favor of the claimants, is the adverse political decision of the Secretary to be conclusive against them? I call it the political decision, because it is stated in one of the reports to have been the result of Cabinet advisement. Now, when it is considered that this was the decision of a quasi interested Executive, construing a treaty of its own negotiation in a manner most favorable to its own claims upon the thanks of the country for obtaining, by its diplomacy, great advantages at little cost, I respectfully submit whether its weight ought to be regarded as conclusive, or even equal to the popular, the judicial, and as I expect to prove, the legislative construction of the article involved.

Without stopping to discuss at present what I conceive to be the error of the argument in the report of the 21st Congress against these claims, I will proceed at once to present to the consideration of the House the views which have satisfied my own mind as to the obligation of the Government to award the indemnity claimed by the sufferers of West Florida in 1814.

The first, and, to my mind, sufficiently decisive proposition, I shall present, is, that the claim of the inhabitants of West Florida is a good one, without reference to any treaty stipulation, but considered separately, upon its own merits; and that the United States Government is bound by every established principle of national law and natural equity to recognise and discharge it as a debt.

If the same damages had been done within the limits of our own boundary to the private property of our own citizens, by an army in the service of the country, there would have been no hesitation on the part of the Federal Government to indemnify the sufferers. The duty has been recognised, in practice, by the acts of 1816 and 1818, and the innumerable private acts since then, providing indemnification for private property used or destroyed during the late war by the American army. In a single volume of the laws, which I have near me, (vol. 9,) there are no less than fifty private bills of this description. Now, if the obligation be admitted in the case of injury to the private property of the citizens of our own Government, who are component members of the social compact, and sharing in the benefits of the Government and in the fruits of its military achievements, how infinitely stronger is the obligation in the case of such injury to the citizens of a foreign and friendly power—the peaceable inhabitants of neutral territory. But the duty and the obligation are expressly defined and established, in cases such as this now presented, by writers upon national law.

What is the case? Pending a public war between the United States and Great Britain, a fleet of one of the belligerents sails into a harbor of a neutral province, and seizing upon a fort at its entrance, designs to employ the harbor for shelter and recruital in the prosecution of hostilities. A commander of the other belligerent marches by land with a large army, consisting of three thousand men—one-third of whom were savages, known to be difficult, and, indeed, incapable of restraint—entirely through the dominions of the neutral, without stopping to ask admission or passage, attacks and captures a city of the neutral, dislodges the enemy from the harbor, and afterwards, releasing the city, retires. In the course of the march to and fro, in the country of the neutral, ravages upon the private property of the peaceable peasants, and other inhabitants of it, are committed. Provisions are taken for the use of the army, or wantonly destroyed; and the loss of other property, consisting of slaves, &c., occasioned to the owners.

Now, what is the law of nations applicable to the case? It must be remembered that no nation has the right to march an army within the territorial limits of a friendly or neutral power, without express permission of the sovereign. In certain cases, however, of actual or supposed necessity, it is justified; but with restrictions, and under obligations expressly defined. The law of nations, as laid down by Vattel, and applicable to the case, is to be found in the following passage:

"Extreme necessity may even authorize the temporary seizure of a neutral town, and the putting a garrison therein, with a view to cover ourselves from the enemy, or to prevent the execution of his designs against that town, when the sovereign is not able to defend. But when the danger is over, we must immediately restore the place, and pay all the charges, inconveniences, and damages which we have occasioned by seizing it."—Book 3, chap. vii, section 121.

The obligation is here clearly stated to pay all the damages occasioned.

Now, let the necessity for the march of the American army into Florida be admitted: I seek not to dispute it. Yet that necessity grew not out of the hostile disposition of the neutral province, but resulted from its weakness, and inability to prevent the lodgment of the British force at Pensacola. This fact will be established by reference to vol. 7, p. 11, of Niles's Register, where it will be found recorded that the British applied to the Governor of Cuba for permission to rendezvous at Pensacola, and land troops; which permission was peremptorily refused, and a packet despatched to Pensacola, with orders to the Governor "to repel the landing of British troops in that province, with all the force under his control." But what could the inconsiderable military strength of a small provincial town, upon peace establishment, do in repelling from its harbor seven frigates, with an army on board? Where, then, is the excuse for refusing the discharge of an obligation so clearly imposed by the laws of nations?

But are not the plain dictates of equity equally imperative? Why should the innocent inhabitants of a foreign territory be made to bear any part of the cost of an invasion undertaken for your own advantage, without fault on their part? For it is not pretended they took any hostile part against the United States; and surely the weakness of their Government attached no fault to them.

But suppose, however, even that the invasion of West Florida was a legitimate act of war against the Spanish Government, and was subject only to the rules and principles governing a state of public war:—still the private property of its inhabitants was not legitimate subject of capture or destruction on land; the more especially as the inhabitants of Florida were non-combatants. No principle is better settled, in the practice of civilized nations, than that, by the laws and usages of war, the private property of the citizens shall not be taken or destroyed, without indemnity being made. This principle is vouched in our own practice, and has been distinctly asserted by the American Government. It will be found in the instructions of Mr. Monroe (then Secretary of State) to the American plenipotentiaries at Gottenburg, dated January 28, 1814; (see Wait's State Papers, vol. 9;) and again in the diplomatic correspondence of the gentleman from Massachusetts himself, while Minister to Great Britain, on two occasions, to wit: in his letter of August 22, 1815, to Mr. Monroe; and of February 17, 1816, to Lord Castlereagh. [Mr. L. read extracts from these several letters.]

And here occurs the proper occasion to point to the error in the argument of the adverse report of the twenty-first Congress. That argument rests upon the ground that the invasion was a justifiable act. What legitimately follows? That the Spanish nation would have no rightful claim for damages to public property, or for the violation of her territorial sanctity. But the fault of the report is, that it carries its conclusion still further, and denies to the inhabitants indemnity for damages to private property; a right which they would possess by the usages of civilized nations, even in the case of open public war.

Regarded, then, in any point of view, the inhabitants of West Florida had, at the date of the destruction or capture of their property, a perfect, indubitable, and valid right to indemnity from this Government. Has their claim to this indemnity been cancelled? Certainly not by payment; and, with equal certainty, not by the relinquishment of the losers; for they have never ceased to demand the due indemnity. Has it been renounced? Show me where. By the treaty? Sir, the very same construction of the terms of the 9th article, which is necessary to establish the renunciation of the claims of the Spanish Government to indemnity for the violation of her territorial domain, is unavoidably decisive of the agreement by this Government to indemnify the Spanish inhabitants for the injuries they suffered.

But can it be possible that the claim would have been renounced—nay, would have been permitted by this Government to be renounced, without indemnification? It is undeniable, that, up to the date of the treaty, the individual sufferers by the invasion of West Florida had a valid and subsisting claim to indemnity. Had they continued Spanish subjects, they would have had the right to demand of their Government the assertion and enforcement of their claim against the United States. This Government would have been compelled to recognise and discharge the obligation to indemnify them: yes, sir, compelled—not by the physical force of the Spanish nation, (which, it is well known, would have been incompetent;) but by that moral force which the obligations of justice, and the established rules of international law, as recognised and existing among the civilized communities of the earth, exert over each nation. Now, sir, would it have suited the pride, the generosity, the dignity, and morality of this great nation, to have treated with Spain for the unqualified cancelment of debts due to private individuals, when, by the same instrument, the allegiance of those individuals was to be transferred, and thus all possibility of justice withdrawn from them? If it was a good debt, Spain, in relinquishing it, of course, received consideration; and thus we will have been a party to a cruel wrong, by permitting her to rob the people she was about to transfer, at the very moment they were becoming, and by the very instrument which made them, citizens of the United States. No, sir: it cannot be that this Government designed to inflict upon these people so great a wrong. If the claim has been renounced, that renunciation must have been coupled with a provision for the indemnification of the individual sufferers. No other supposition would be consistent with the magnanimity and justice of the nation; and no other construction, as I before said, is possible to be given to the clause of the treaty. If it has not been renounced, then the debt remains still binding; and it is incumbent on you, as I humbly conceive, since the claimants have become incorporated with you as your own citizens, to do, as an act of free duty and grace, what, if they had remained subject to Spain, you would have done, upon the demand of that Government, as an obligation of justice. The purchase of the country, and transfer of their political obligations, should work no injury to their private rights.

But I propose to show now, sir, that these claims for the losses of 1814 were, in fact, provided for by the treaty; that such is the fair construction of the ninth article of that treaty; that, whatever may have been the understanding or design of the negotiators, the words in which they have expressed their intention incontrovertibly establish the right of the inhabitants of West Florida to the relief provided in this act.

The distinguished negotiator of the treaty on the American side [Mr. ADAMS] represents, in his place here, that it was not intended to include these claims in the provision made in the treaty for indemnity, which provision was designed to apply only to the damages occasioned by the operations of the American army in West Florida in 1818; and that those of 1814 did not enter into the contemplation of the negotiators at all.

I readily, upon the assertion of the gentleman, concede that such is a correct representation of his understanding and intentions at the time of the treaty. But I must be allowed to offset this understanding of the American negotiator, by the contrary understanding of the Spanish negotiator. De Onis published a work shortly after his return to Spain, in which he gives a sketch of the condition of the relations between Spain and the United States, and of the history and result of his recent negotiations, which ended in the treaty not then ratified by Spain. In the enumeration of the causes of difference between the two nations, which his negotiation was designed to settle, he says:

"To these public acts of aggression and violence were afterwards added General Jackson's march through West Florida, with the troops under his command, and his entrance into Pensacola, to drive from that place the few English who had landed there; and the march of another body of American troops into East Florida, to assist a party of revolters, who, from the United States themselves, were endeavoring to excite disorder in that province. I protested, in the name of the King, against all and each of these excesses: but the cabinet at Washington refused to reply to me, and inflexibly adhered to their system of policy."

The title of the book from which this extract is made, is "Memoir upon the Negotiations between Spain and the United States of America, which led to the treaty of 1819."

Thus it will be seen, that, according to the understanding of De Onis, the damage occasioned by the invasion of 1814 was one of the very grounds of difference intended to be arranged by the negotiation he conducted.

This difference in the understanding of the two negotiators might naturally exist, without the slightest imputation upon the integrity or accuracy of either; and without injury, too, to the rights of the claimants. It is perfectly explicable.

The gentleman from Massachusetts was not in the United States when the invasion of West Florida, in 1814, occurred. He was at that date in Europe, as one of the commissioners for negotiating a peace with Great Britain. His mind and feelings were naturally absorbed with the great mission he was upon, and which, about that time, was reaching the point of happy consummation. The invasion of West Florida was not likely to strike his attention at such a time; and when he did hear of it, it was in connexion with the ever-memorable victory of New Orleans, among the preliminary incidents of which the incursion into Florida formed but an item. No wonder that the invasion of Florida, overshadowed and lost sight of in the greatness of the final event with which it was connected, failed, under the existing circumstances, to impress itself upon the mind of the gentleman at the time of its occurrence; and there were reasons why it may well have failed to attract his attention during the negotiation. His mind was given to what constituted the really great objects of the negotiation, and upon which his diplomatic powers were about being exercised. The boundary line west of the Mississippi—the acquisition of the Floridas—the undisputed title to the extensive and valuable country between the Perdido and Mississippi rivers;—these were the great topics of the negotiation. The subject of Spanish claims was despatched in a few sentences of an immensely voluminous correspondence.

On the other hand, there was every reason why the Spanish minister should have had his attention fixed upon the subject of these losses. Reduced by the superior genius and diplomacy of his antagonist, he was consenting to almost every demand of the American Government. The western boundary—the Floridas—the payment of the claims of American citizens—all were being yielded. And what was he receiving, by which to save even the appearance of reciprocity, and to justify himself at home? The small and only stipulation in favor of the inhabitants of Florida. No wonder, then, that, upon his part, he should have looked with interest and anxiety to this matter of the claims for indemnity. To him, it was all important; and therefore dwelt upon during the negotiation, and treasured after it. To the American Government, it was a trifle; and therefore not heeded in the negotiation, and, it would seem, not remembered after it.

But it is a matter of indifference what may be the variant understanding or recollection of the two negotiators. The meaning of the treaty is to be gathered from its own words and context. It is to the instrument itself, and not to its negotiators, that we are required to look for the intention and stipulations of the parties to it. This has been acknowledged by the gentleman from Massachusetts, in commenting upon a letter from Earl Bathurst to him, in 1815, respecting the meaning of the 1st article of the treaty of Ghent.

IN SPANISH.	IN ENGLISH.
"Las altas partes contratantes renuncian reciprocamente todos sus derechos a indemnizaciones por qualquiera de los ultimos acontecimientos y transacciones de sus respectivos comandantes y oficiales en las Floridas.	"And the high contracting parties, respectively, renounce all claim to indemnities for any of the recent events or transactions of their respective commanders and officers in the Floridas.
"Y los Estados Unidos satisfaran los perjuicios, si los hubiese habido, que los habitantes y oficiales Espanoles justificquen legalmente haber sufrido por las operaciones del exercito Americano en ellas."	"The United States will cause satisfaction to be made for the injuries, if any, which, by process of law, shall be established to have been suffered by the Spanish officers, and individual Spanish inhabitants, by the late operations of the American army in Florida.

Nothing can be more evident—looking to the English version alone—than that the stipulation to pay for the injuries suffered by individuals in their property, was co-extensive with the renunciation; that, if the renunciation on the part of Spain extended to each of the three invasions; the stipulation, on the part of the United States, to make indemnity to individual private sufferers, extended also to each of them. If the stipulation to pay applied only to the last invasion—that of 1818; then, also, the renunciation applied only to that, and the United States remain liable to the claim for those indemnities. Taking either horn of the dilemma, the result is the same. But if there is even doubt, the Government should not hesitate as to its course. The high and sensitive impulses of national honor will not brook even suspicion of wrong. The very shadow of dishonor should be spurned. It should be sufficient that there is even a doubt as to the right to deny indemnity to these claimants, to ensure the passage of this bill. The faith of treaties is too sacred an obligation to be trifled with by a people professing a place in the ranks of moral and civilized nations.

But if the English version of the treaty admits of doubt in its construction, the Spanish does not. There the word "late," found in the English version, and upon which the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury turned, has no correspondent word in the Spanish version. There is nothing which can limit its sense to the last invasion; but, on the contrary, the descriptive terms are all in the plural—showing that the allusion was to all the operations, and to both the Floridas. No one will deny, after a critical examination of the Spanish version, that the losses of 1814, as well as those of 1812 and 1818, are meant to be provided for.

Now, then, by which of these versions are we to be governed? Fortunately, the Supreme Court of the United States has furnished the answer. In a case in which a similar difference in the phraseology of the Spanish and English versions of the 8th article of the same treaty was discovered, the court thus comments:

"The original treaty has been examined in the Department of State. It is executed as an original, and headed "original" in both languages. It cannot have escaped our attention that it relates to the territory ceded, the boundaries between those two Governments, the mutual renunciations, and the rights of the inhabitants of the ceded territories. There is an obvious reason for its being in Spanish, as well as in English. The King had a direct interest, as far as affected his own dominions adjoining the United States, and a laudable desire to protect the inhabitants of the ceded provinces in all their rights and property."—U. S vs. Arredondo, 6 Peters's R. 736.

Again: "His minister was not willing to trust so important a matter to a treaty only in the English language. The present situation of the holders of the grants, the state of the country, the opinion of this court in Foster vs. Nelson, and the argument in this cause, show the wisdom and justice which prompted him to express the intention of the King in his own language, and that of his subjects. Similar, or equally good, reasons may have induced the ministers of this Government to have the treaty drawn in its language; and thus, considering the treaty in both languages, and each (as is declared at its head) 'original,' the one version neither controls, nor is to be preferred to, the other; each expresses the meaning of the contracting parties, respectively, in their own language; as, in the opinion of each, expressing and declaring the intention of both."—Ib. 737.

"The Spanish version was in his (the Spanish monarch's) words, and expressed his intentions; and, though the American version showed the intention of this Government to be different, we cannot adopt it as the rule by which to decide what was granted, what excepted, and what reserved. The rules of law are too clear to be mistaken, and too imperative to be disregarded by this court."—Ib. 741.

Well, then, the clause referred to on the present occasion expressed what was excepted and reserved by Spain from the preceding renunciation. It is connected with the clause of renunciation by the conjunction y, [and,] and forms a part of it. It is by the Spanish version, then, and the Spanish version alone, by which we must decide what was intended. It is the intention and understanding of the Spanish Government which is to rule. That intention is testified to by De Onis, who expressly enumerates the losses of 1814 as among those causes of difference comprehended in the negotiation, and inevitably results from the legitimate construction of the clause.

But I will go further, and proceed to show that the whole history of the negotiation justifies the opinion that the losses of 1814, as well as those of 1818, were contemplated by the Spanish Government to be provided for in the treaty. I design to show that, from the commencement of the negotiation, the losses of 1814 were intended to be comprehended; that they were considered to have been so included at the time by De Onis, who wrote (pending the negotiation) to Pensacola for a statement of the losses; that the invasion and losses of 1818 did not occur until after the article had been substantially agreed upon, though not reduced to form; and that this construction of the treaty has been expressly recognised by the legislation of Congress as the true one.

The first projet of a treaty was submitted at Madrid, by the Spanish cabinet, to Mr. Irving, the American minister to that court, in a communication from Mr. Pizarro, dated August 17, 1817, only two and a half years subsequent to the invasion of West Florida. And it may as well here be mentioned, as worthy to be borne in mind, that the movements between the two nations for a settlement of the existing causes of difference by treaty commenced in the early part of the year 1816, but little more than a year after the occurrences in that province. In the very first general conference which took place between Mr. Irving and the Spanish cabinet minister, the invasion of West Florida, and the damages occasioned by it, were dwelt upon as one of the causes of complaint and difference. The particulars of this conference will be found detailed in an official communication from Mr. Irving to the Secretary of State, on file in the State Department, but never printed. The very first article in the first projet before referred to, has reference to this subject of indemnification, and is as follows:

"1st. His Catholic Majesty and the United States, carrying into effect the convention which is pending since the year 1802, oblige themselves to the reciprocal indemnification of the losses, injuries, and prejudices produced to the Government or subjects of either country, in consequence of excesses committed by individuals of either nation, against the law of nations, or the existing treaty; comprehending in this reciprocal obligation, not only the epoch to which the said convention of 1802 refers, but also indemnities for posterior excesses of the same kind, committed by individuals of either nation, from such epoch till the day in which the present convention shall be settled and signed."

This proposition was virtually for the extension of the convention of 1802 to all posterior excesses of a similar kind to those for which indemnification was provided by that convention. And what were the claims provided for by that convention? They are described in the 3d article as follows:

"All claims, as well by the subjects of his Catholic Majesty, as by the citizens of the United States of America, who may have a right to demand compensation for the losses, damages, or injuries, sustained by them in consequence of the excesses committed by Spanish subjects, or American citizens."

Nothing can be more clear than that the losses suffered by the inhabitants of West Florida, in consequence of the excesses committed by the American army, were comprehended in the description of cases for which indemnity was proposed by the Spanish cabinet in this first projet.

The negotiation was then transferred to Washington. And I propose to follow the course of it, so far as the subject of indemnities was concerned.

The first reference to the subject is in the letter of Mr. Adams to De Onis, dated January 6, 1818, in which he proposes, among other things, the following:

"The claims of indemnities for spoliations, whether Spanish or French, within Spanish jurisdiction, and for the suppression of the deposite at New Orleans, to be arbitrated and settled by commissioners, in the manner agreed upon in the unratified convention of 1802."

In a letter dated January 24, De Onis thus replies:

"I now proceed to state the most obvious and essential difficulties which render your three proposals for the settlement of indemnities inadmissible. I observe that, in speaking of them, you only mention the indemnity for spoliations suffered by American citizens, and omit that which is equally due to Spaniards for spoliations committed on them by the citizens and authorities of this republic, in violation of the law of nations and the existing treaty."

And, in a subsequent part of the letter, proposes as follows:

"His Catholic Majesty to ratify the convention of 1802, and both Governments to abide by the decision of the joint commission on the question of indemnities, classing as such those which regard American citizens, and the Crown and subjects of his Catholic Majesty, for spoliations reciprocally committed to the period of the said convention, and thereafter, to the date of the confirmation of the adjustment by the joint commission."

And, in a letter of the 10th February, adds further:

"The question of indemnities can be attended with no difficulty. The Spanish Government has always been willing to give due satisfaction for the losses and injuries sustained by citizens of this republic, and committed by Spaniards, contrary to the law of nations and the existing treaty; but it cannot relinquish its claim to comprehend, in like manner, in the adjustment of those losses and injuries, such as have been committed by citizens and authorities of this republic on the Crown and subjects of Spain, in violation of the same right and treaty. Your Government, sensible of the justice of this demand, cannot fail to accede to it."

On the 12th of March, Mr. Adams replies in the following terms:

"With regard to the third of the subjects of difference between Spain and the United States that remain to be adjusted, the claims of indemnification for injuries, losses, and damages suffered by American citizens from Spanish authorities and subjects, and within Spanish jurisdiction, I flatter myself, from the tenor of your note, devoted particularly to the consideration of this point, that it is not absolutely unsusceptible of being brought to a favorable issue. You express the willingness of your Government to resume the unratified convention of 1802, and to extend its stipulation to the cases of complaint of a similar character to those provided for in it, which have since that time accrued. It is undoubtedly the intention of this Government that its engagements should be reciprocal; and, if this was not expressly declared in my note of the 16th of January, it was merely because the President was not aware that any such claims of Spanish subjects for indemnities from the American Government were in existence. I am authorized to assure you that there will be no difficulty in including any such as may exist in the convention, and in making the United States answerable for all indemnities which may be justly due by them."

Here the matter rested. The principles of the convention of 1802, which was proposed by Mr. Pizarro, in the first instance, as the basis of the clause on indemnities, were adopted by De Onis and Mr. Adams, with a reciprocal extension of its application down to the date at which they were treating. No further reference was made to the subject of indemnities, until long afterwards, when the treaty was being thrown into form. Now, all this had transpired prior to the invasion of Florida in 1818, which, it is alleged, was the only matter of damage referred to in the negotiation. The invasion of 1814 had occurred but shortly before the negotiation opened. It had been referred to as one of the subjects of complaint, in the first conference between Mr. Pizarro and Mr. Irving. It was stated by De Onis, in his memoir before referred to, as one of the differences requiring adjustment by a treaty. These circumstances strongly prove that at the time the subject of indemnities was discussed and substantially concluded upon, the injuries intended to be provided for were those which had occurred prior to the invasion of 1818; to wit—that of West Florida in 1814, provided for in the bill now under consideration; and those of East Florida in 1812 and 1813, provided for by the act of 1834. This conclusion is rendered certain by the circumstance, that directly after the occurrence of the invasion of 1814, De Onis had addressed to the Secretary of State an official protest against it, and a demand for satisfaction; which shows that when he opened the negotiation, the subject must have been impressed upon his mind; and by the further circumstance, that, during the negotiation, he wrote to the Governors of East and West Florida for an official statement of the losses suffered by the inhabitants in consequence of the invasions of 1812 and 1814; showing thus that he regarded them as comprehended among the subjects of the pending negotiation. The protest and reclamation on account of the invasion of 1814 was under date of the 16th December, 1814. It has never been printed or made public, nor does it even seem to have been translated. I found it in the State Department, in a volume of original letters, after a troublesome search.

After the subject of indemnities had been thus disposed of, and the correspondence had continued in relation to boundaries and the French spoliations, the invasion of Florida in 1818 by Jackson, and other circumstances of disagreement, caused a suspension of the negotiation at Washington. When it was again resumed, the proposed cession of extensive territories, and the arrangement of boundaries, led to a proposition for a mutual renunciation of claims. The interposition of M. Hyde de Neuville (the French minister) was employed in reconciling the differences between the two negotiators as to the details of the treaty; and in the paper furnished by him as a memorandum of the history of his intervention, (to be found in the American State Papers, at page 621 of the 4th volume of Foreign Relations,) the following facts appear in reference to that part of the ninth article which relates to the Florida claims. Mr. Adams had proposed as follows:

"And the high contracting parties respectively renounce all claims to indemnities for any of the recent events or transactions of their respective commanders and officers in the Floridas."

Mr. Hyde de Neuville says, in reference to the above:

"To the above claim Mr. de Onis adds, that the United States will satisfy all the just claims which the inhabitants and Spanish officers of the Floridas may have upon them in consequence of the damages they may have sustained by the operations and proceedings of the American army, as is customary with the citizens of the United States under similar circumstances."

To this reservation, Mr. Adams remarks: "Agreed."

The matters referred to in this paper, prepared by Mr. de Neuville, occurred on the 15th of February, 1819. On the 16th, Mr. Adams received from President Monroe authority to conclude the treaty; and on the 22d the treaty was formally signed by Mr. Adams and De Onis, in the shape in which it now stands.

Nothing can be more evident than that the object of De Onis was to secure to those of the Spanish subjects who were about to become American citizens, by the transfer of Florida, the indemnities they were entitled to in consequence of the repeated invasions of those provinces which had occurred within the few preceding years; and that the reference in his mind was to all the invasions. At all events, it is evident that the condition and the renunciation are co-extensive; that if the condition does not cover the losses of 1814, neither does the renunciation; and that they would, therefore, remain unrenounced, and valid as a yet existing obligation.

But the legislation of Congress has settled the point, that the engagement to pay for injuries suffered in Florida is not confined to the invasion of 1818, and that the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury was erroneous.

The first legislation upon the subject was in 1823. The act passed that year was entitled "An act to carry into effect the ninth article of the treaty concluded between Spain and the United States on the 22d of February, 1819." The first section directed that the judges of the superior courts at Pensacola and St. Augustine should receive and adjust all claims of the inhabitants, arising within their respective jurisdictions, "agreeably to the provisions of the ninth article of the treaty with Spain." The second section required the Secretary of the Treasury to review those decisions, and to pay the awards "on being satisfied that the same are just and equitable within the provisions of the treaty." Two things are to be remarked in respect to this act—that the execution of the ninth article was the evident and exclusive object; and that the ninth article was considered to apply to other claims besides those growing out of the invasion of 1818; for that was confined to West Florida, while the act contemplates claims "arising within the jurisdiction" of the judge of East Florida also.

Under this act, the judges of East and West Florida received and adjudicated upon claims arising out of the invasion of East Florida, under Mathews, in 1812 and 1813; and the invasions of West Florida, under Jackson, in 1814, and again in 1818. The Secretary of the Treasury rejected the claims of 1812 and '13, and of 1814, altogether, upon the express ground that the provisions of the treaty comprehended only the losses of 1818. Appeal was made to Congress by the rejected sufferers. The act of 1834 was passed as the sense of Congress upon the subject. That act, in the first section, directed the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the amount awarded by the judge of the superior court at St. Augustine, "under the authority of the 161st chapter of the acts of the 17th Congress, approved 3d March, 1823, for losses occasioned in East Florida by the troops in the service of the United States, in the years 1812 and 1813, in all cases where the decision of the said judge shall be deemed, by the Secretary of the Treasury, to be just." This section decides the question that the losses of 1812 and 1813 did come within the intent of the act of 1823; and, therefore, also within the intent and provisions of the 9th article of the treaty; and, overruling the decision of the Secretary that they were not comprehended, confines his discretion, in the payment, to the point of their being "just." It is the legislative decree that the provision of the 9th article was not confined to the losses of 1818. The claims of the sufferers of 1812 and 1813 were ordered to be paid, not upon any grounds of equitable consideration independent of the treaty, but expressly as being in execution of the 9th article. The intention of Congress is made still more manifest in the 2d section of the act, which authorizes the reception and adjudication of any further claims not before presented, or in which the evidence was withheld, "in consequence of the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury that such claims were not provided for by the treaty of February 22, 1819, between the Government of the United States and Spain." Thus showing that the decision of the Secretary was fully before Congress, and that the conclusion was against him, expressly UPON THE CONSTRUCTION OF THE TREATY.

The losses of 1814 were not included in the provisions of this act of 1834, because the committee confined the bill reported to those of 1812 and '13; and the Delegate from Florida, (anxious, I presume, to avoid embarrassing its passage, by pressing the question as to those of 1814 upon the House for decision at the time,) took it as it was offered, without discussion. The distinction made by the committee which reported the bill, between the losses of 1812 and those of 1814, is altogether, in my view, a mistaken one. It is, that the invasion of East Florida, in 1812, was unauthorized; and that, therefore, the Government was liable for the damages; but that the invasion of West Florida, in 1814, being justified by the laws of nations, was in a different predicament. Now this would have been a good answer to a claim from Spain for reparation for the violence done to her sovereignty by the invasion, or for injury to public property occasioned by it—as, for instance, the destruction of Fort Barancas, &c.; but it is not a justifiable answer to a claim for the use or destruction of the private property of peaceable and unoffending peasants, and other inhabitants. Not even the pendency of open public war justifies, as I have before shown, the refusal to pay for such injuries among civilized nations.

I have endeavored, Mr. Speaker, to make intelligible to the House the grounds upon which I rest the passage of the bill. I had designed to add some further remarks to what I said on a former occasion, touching the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS;] but the sense of the House, as manifested in the entertainment of the demand for the previous question, which cut off, and virtually rejected his motion, rendered it unnecessary. Without further trespass, therefore, upon the patience of the House, I will conclude.

NOTE.—In the midst of the remarks of which the foregoing is the substance, Mr. LEVY was arrested by the application of the hour rule. Mr. ADAMS then obtained the floor, and addressed the House again in opposition to the bill. When he concluded, Mr. LEVY endeavored again to obtain the floor, for the purpose of concluding his argument, and replying further to Mr. ADAMS; but he failed in this endeavor, the previous question having been called, and being insisted upon by one of the members. The House was thus brought to a direct vote upon the bill before it was in possession of all the facts and arguments depended upon in its support. The natural consequence of this was its rejection. Mr. LEVY afterwards, during the day, obtained the floor upon a motion to reconsider, and pursued his remarks. The argument, such as it was, has been written out, and thrown into continuous form; in order that, when the subject shall hereafter be again brought before Congress, the necessity may not exist for the consumption of time by the oral repetition of what has before been said.

REMARKS OF MR. GWIN, OF MISSISSIPPI.

In the House of Representatives, February 11, 1843.—On the motion of Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL to print 10,000 extra copies of the majority and minority reports upon the assumption of the State debts.

Mr. ADAMS having concluded,

Mr. GWIN of Mississippi got the floor, and replied as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] seems to entertain great dread of the appearance of British vessels in the waters of the Mississippi. Has the gentleman always been as anxious to prevent their appearance in those waters as he seems to be at present? If I recollect aright an important era in the history of our country, the gentleman was accused of an attempt, at the treaty of Ghent, to bargain away to Great Britain the navigation of the Mississippi river and its tributaries, for some advantage in the fisheries to the North. He was so charged by one of the most distinguished citizens of this country, [Mr. Clay,] between whom and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] an adjourned question of veracity exists to this day on this subject. I should like to hear the gentleman clear up that charge, ere he presents himself as the special champion of the navigation of the Mississippi. Treacherous once, he may betray us again; and I am the more induced to doubt him on this occasion, as the alternative presented to avoid the horrors of war with Great Britain, and thus the appearance of British war steamers in the waters of the Mississippi, is the assumption of the debts of the several States by the General Government.

Sir, is it not degrading us as a nation, to hear a Representative in the American Congress warn us against the danger of a war with Great Britain, by holding up the result of the recent contest of that nation with China as our probable fate in the event of a collision between the two nations? Shall we be threatened in our own halls with the payment of twenty-one millions, to buy a dishonorable peace with that powerful, arrogant, and haughty nation? Can any American patriot forget the glorious termination of our two wars with Great Britain, then in our infancy as a nation, and destitute of resources; and shall we now, when in full manhood, be forced to commit a grievous WRONG upon the Constitution of our country, to avoid a war that it is predicted will terminate so disastrously to us? Sir, it is humiliating to hear such remarks from any quarter, but especially so when they emanate from one of the Representatives of this great nation on this floor.

I have not been disposed at any time, Mr. Speaker, to introduce the question here of the validity of the bonds issued in the name of the State, for the Mississippi Union Bank, and the liability of the State to pay these bonds; but the question appears to be so entirely misunderstood and misrepresented, both here and elsewhere, that I shall avail myself of this occasion to state the grounds that have been taken by a majority of the people of the State on this subject. It is simply this: shall the State assume the payment of a debt contracted in her name, in violation of her constitution? For I contend that these bonds were issued by authority of an unconstitutional law; and that even the requirements of that law, inoperative as it is upon the State, were disregarded in the sale of the bonds.

During the summer of 1841, a letter was written by my colleague, [Mr. THOMPSON,] and extensively circulated, giving a clear and concise history of the charter of the Union Bank, and its conflict with the State constitution. In order to a proper understanding of the question, I will read an extract from that letter.

"The constitution provides that 'No law shall ever be passed to raise a loan of money upon the credit of the State, or to pledge the faith of the State for the payment or redemption of any loan or debt, unless such law be proposed in the Senate or House of Representatives, and be agreed to by a majority of the members of each House, and entered on their journals, with the yeas and nays taken thereon, and be referred to the next succeeding Legislature, and published for three months previous to the next regular election, in three newspapers of this State; and unless a majority of each branch of the Legislature so elected, after such publication, shall agree to and pass such law; and, in such case, the yeas and nays shall be taken and entered on the journals of each House.'

"This wise provision of our constitution is peculiar to our State; and, amidst the general pecuniary embarrassments which now press so heavily upon the energies of several of our sister States, arising from imprudent and hasty legislation, and from an unadvised pawning of that brightest jewel of the State—her faith—for the purpose of raising money to be used by the FEW to the prejudice of the MANY, every Mississippian should feel grateful to the framers of our constitution for their prudence and forecast in thus guarding our honor and our property, by restraining from tampering with our faith or credit as a State, a Legislature whose course of conduct has evidently proceeded from impulse, rather than wise and deliberate councils. But it would be a mockery of constitutional government to say to their agents, 'thus far shalt thou go, and no farther,' and yet QUIETLY SANCTION EVERY INFRACTION OF RESERVED RIGHTS.

"At the January session of 1837, the Legislature of our State passed an act entitled 'An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Mississippi Union Bank,' in which you must mark the fact that no provision is made that the State of Mississippi shall be a subscriber for stock. But, on the contrary, section 4 of the law says 'that the owners of real estate situated in the State of Mississippi, and who are citizens thereof, shall be the only persons entitled to subscribe.' This law provides that the capital of the bank shall be $15,000,000; that the books of subscription shall be kept open for six months, under the inspection of ten managers, to be chosen by the Legislature; that so soon as five thousand shares shall have been subscribed, the Governor of the State shall appoint thirteen directors, to serve for twelve months, who shall take charge of the bank and the books of subscription; that, after the books are closed, the bank may go into immediate operation, whenever it shall appear that at least $500,000 shall have been subscribed and paid in; that these declared stockholders by the directors shall pay into the bank the sum of ten dollars upon each and every share subscribed; that the stockholders shall give their bonds to the bank for the amount of stock allowed to each, and shall also execute mortgages upon real estate, with the privilege of including one-fourth of the amount on slaves, to secure the payment of their stock-bonds—(thus not only the property mortgaged, but the whole estate of the stockholder, would have been bound for the redemption of the stock;) and that both the principal and interest of the bank bonds were to be paid by the bank as they severally fell due. Then it is further provided, that the State shall pledge its faith for the redemption of the capital stock; or, in other words, shall become the security of the subscribers for stock, upon being allowed five per cent. of the profits of the bank, the appointment of five of the thirteen directors, and a standing accommodation loan of $200,000; and the 30th section requires the Governor to execute to the said bank, from time to time, bonds in amount proportioned to the sums subscribed and secured to the satisfaction of the directors, until the whole amount of bonds shall be furnished. In this charter you will at once perceive no risk, no hazard of taxation whatever.

"This act was published—not the length of time required by the constitution, it is true; but still, it was published; and it is unworthy of this great question to dwell on quibbles. At a succeeding Legislature, which met in January, 1838, the same law came up for re-enactment. While it was still pending, and before another vote was taken upon it, a joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives—a committee of the greatest weight and highest responsibility that can at any time be raised—was appointed, and instructed to 'examine whether the said bill can be amended; and, if so, whether it be practicable to change it into a State bank exclusively.' From the unanimous report of that committee, permit me to draw your attention to the following extracts:

"'But as to that portion of the said charter which relates to the subscribers or stockholders to the said institution, being the primary condition on which the faith of the State is to be pledged, and as such constitutes a vital part of it, we have no power to change the same, unless it should be again submitted to the people for their sanction; which would have the tendency to postpone, for at least two years, its consummation. This course your committee believe would be directly at war with the wishes of our constituents,' &c.

"This report was received, and unanimously adopted by the Legislature. At that time, while the charter is still pending, and open, of course, to all amendments admissible under the constitution, it is the unanimous opinion that the vital parts of the bill cannot be changed without a re-submission the charter to the people; consequently, the iginal charter becomes a law on the 5th day of bruary, 1838, without change or alteration. Without calling in question the constitutionality of s charter, I might stop, and triumphantly ask, as a single bond of the State been issued and ld under this charter? If so, who were the di ctors appointed by the Governor to manage the nk? Who were the subscribers for stock? Had e books of subscription been kept open six onths? How many stockholders had paid ten llars upon each and every share subscribed? ow many bonds for stock had been given and se red by satisfactory mortgage? Not one of these ings had been done at the time the bonds in ques n were issued and sold: and the purchaser must ve known it.

"But here follows the explanation: Ten days af r the passage of the foregoing charter, the same egislature that determined, by unanimous vote, at the charter could not be amended while pend g before them, passed 'An act supplementary to n act to incorporate the subscribers to the Mississippi Union Bank;' wherein, under the magic title 'supplement,' they endeavored to do indirectly hat the conscience of every member checked him doing directly. They made changes in the char r, by way of supplement, which, but a few days efore, they had declared, under oath, would viti te the whole instrument. This procedure was in iolation of all parliamentary rule known in this r any other enlightened country; and it can be onsidered in no other light than a legislative fraud, ecause it violated not only the constitution, ac ording to their own showing, but also one of their xpress rules of order, which prohibited the repeal f any law the same session at which it was passed. On the 15th of February, 1838, this act took the form nd shape of law. The very first section changed ltogether the attitude of the State to the banks In the original act, the State, being amply indemnified, agrees to stand as the security of the stockholders; in this supplemental act, she becomes primarily liable for $5,000,000. In the original act, no individual but a citizen of the State can subscribe and take stock; in this act, the State becomes a subscriber for stock, and, by express repeal, gives up her ten per cent. of the profits, her five directors, and her accommodation loan of $200,000, and becomes a partner in the banking adventure. All this is done under the talismanic word 'supplement,' without submitting it in any way to the people! Now, it must be apparent to the commonest understanding, that it was not in the power of the Legislature to make the State a subscriber for stock in that bank—to render her liable for the sum of $5,000,000, or any other amount—to change her attitude in any respect towards the stockholders in the bank—to enlarge or diminish her interest in the bank, as it stood at the passage of the original charter, without submitting it to the action of the people. This right had been expressly reserved to the people in their fundamental law; and, until they had been consulted in the manner prescribed, all action by their supposed agents was null and void; and the whole world were bound to take notice of it. These propositions are so self-evident, no man of candor and discrimination will dispute them. The only question remaining is, Does the present supposed liability arise under and by virtue of the supplement?

"It is apparent that it does so arise—1st, from the very terms of the mortgages for stock, which were drawn up by the officers of the bank, and which have been recorded in almost every county of the State; in which it is set forth that the intent of the mortgage is to secure the payment of only $10,500,000; leaving $5,000,000 (the sum already sold) to be paid by the State, by virtue of the supplemental act. 2d. It is apparent, from these facts, that, at the time of the issuance of the five millions of bonds now held abroad, there were no subscribers for stock; that the books of subscription had not been kept open six months, as required by the original charter; that no bonds for stock, and no mortgages to secure them, had been taken; that no directors had been appointed by the Executive to examine and pass upon the validity of the mortgages; and that not a dollar had been paid in on a single share of stock: therefore, they must have been issued in pursuance of the supplemental act; or else there is more baseness in this whole transaction than ever characterized any other act of public functionaries. 3d. It is apparent, from the very terms of the power of attorney from the managers of the bank to the commissioners who went abroad to sell these bonds. This power of attorney—after reciting that the act to incorporate the subscribers to the Mississippi Union Bank had been passed by one Legislature, and, in conformity to the constitution, had been published, and referred to the next succeeding Legislature, which had passed and confirmed the said original act; and that the same was approved by the Governor, on the 5th day of February, 1838,—continues: 'And whereas the said Legislature last above mentioned passed an act entitled An act supplemental to an act to incorporate the subscribers of the Mississippi Union Bank, which was approved by the Governor, February 5th, 1838; and whereas the Governor of the State of Mississippi has, pursuant to the provisions of the said supplemental act, subscribed, in behalf of the said State, fifty thousand shares of the capital stock of said bank, and has executed twenty-five hundred bonds of the said State of Mississippi, for the sum of two thousand dollars each,' &c. If truth can produce conviction, surely this question is now placed beyond cavil. 4th. It is self-evident, that the purchaser of the bonds had not only constructive, but actual, notice that the faith of the State could not be pledged under the constitution by an act of the Legislature, without a confirmation by the people; that the supplemental act had not been confirmed by the people; and that the bonds he purchased were issued 'pursuant to the provisions of the said supplementary act!!'—because this power of attorney to the commissioners is made part and parcel of his contract with them, and it contains a full statement of these facts."

This is the ground taken by the State in regard to these bonds. Not a dollar of the money for which the bonds were sold was received by the State; they were sold by agents of the bank, appointed by authority of the unconstitutional supplement, and the money received by the bank, and used by it. Not a dollar ever went into the State treasury, or was under the control of a State officer. The archives of the State exhibit no evidence of the existence of these bonds as an obligation upon the State; nor was there ever deposited there any evidence that the State is a stockholder in the bank. For these reasons, the State has refused to assume the payment of these bonds. No party in the State is in favor of levying a tax for their payment. The question between the two parties is assumption or non-assumption. The first contend that the State shall assume the debt, at the same time they refuse to provide by taxation for its payment. "Settle fair, if you never pay," is their motto. The latter contend that the bonds were issued by virtue of an unconstitutional law; sold in violation of that law; and it would be a fraud upon the constitution and laws to assume their payment. While we refuse to acknowledge this to be a State obligation, yet no obstacle has been thrown in the way of the bondholders, if they desired to secure the assets of the Union Bank. In fact, the Democratic party in that State desire that these assets may be thus appropriated. I differ with Governor McNutt in the estimated value of these assets. If honestly appropriated to the redemption of the notes now unredeemed, after their payment a large surplus must exist, to be applied to the payment of the bonds. In addition to these, the assets proper of the bank, there are also the subscriptions of the stockholders for ten and a half millions of dollars, secured by mortgages upon some of the most valuable estates in that State, and equal in productiveness to any in the world, which some of the first legal men in the State contend will be held liable to pay these bonds. I do not give this as my opinion. I am no lawyer; but members of that profession, equal in learning and intellect to any in this country, entertain this opinion. No obstruction will be thrown in the way of the bondholders, if they wish to test the validity of these mortgages. The State and United States courts are open to them. Let them proceed to test this question; and, if they succeed, then this mortgaged property with the assets proper of the bank will, it is supposed, pay the whole debt of five millions, with the interest. Sir, I entertain no doubt but these bonds are much more likely to be paid than the bonds of several States, whose Legislatures are passing resolutions against repudiation.

I alluded, in the commencement of my remarks, to the course the gentleman from Massachusetts was reported to have pursued in the negotiations at Ghent, in regard to the navigation of the Mississippi by British vessels. I care not now whether the charge was true or false, further than to declare that I do not believe he would deprecate the appearance of British war steamers at Natchez as much as he has pretended on this occasion. Blue lights, kindled by traitorous hands in our own country, directed our enemies to our weakest points during the last war. The gentleman [Mr. ADAMS] may be designated as the finger-board directing the attention of Great Britain to what he at present considers our weakest point. He has declared that, in the event of war, or insurrection in the slave States, requiring the intervention of the General Government, our slaves will be free. The great object of his life seems to be to cause the emancipation of our slaves, regardless of the war of extermination that must ensue between the two races, should success attend his efforts. What more effectual aid can he obtain than the naval power of Great Britain, concentrated, at his suggestion, at the South, in the event of a war with that nation, sending war steamers to the very centres of the slave States? Martial law is proclaimed—insurrection excited—the Government of the United States send armies to expel the invaders and suppress the insurrections; and thus, according to the gentleman's doctrines and opinions, oft repeated on this floor, our slaves would be free, and his great object accomplished. If the gentleman does not desire this result, his course is well calculated to bring about a war between this country and Great Britain. The assumption of State debts, or war, are the alternatives presented to us by him; and he hesitates not to say that England will have cause for declaring war, if these debts are not paid. That powerful and rapacious nation will not be slow in adopting this suggestion, coming, as it does, from a member of this House who has filled the exalted station of President of the United States. He calls the refusal of Mississippi to assume payment of those bonds "metaphysical distinctions" which he does not understand. Foreigners have urged this same argument in favor of assumption—that they cannot understand the distinction or difference between the State and the Federal constitutions. After the remarks of the gentleman, they will have high authority on this side of the water in favor of assumption on this ground.

The gentleman entertains great horror of State repudiation of unacknowledged debts; yet he is the advocate of, and voted for, the bankrupt law, which established the most wholesale system of repudiation of honest, bona fide, undisputed debts ever known in this or any other country. According to the gentleman's theory, it is disgraceful for a State to refuse to assume a debt she declares was created in violation of her constitution, and for which she received nothing; yet it is perfectly fair and honorable for the citizens of that State, one or all, to repudiate all of their honest bona fide debts, under the bankrupt law—debts contracted in accordance with constitution and law, and for which full value was received. I will make a practical application of the gentleman's theory of dishonorable repudiation of unacknowledged State debts, and honorable repudiation of acknowledged private debts. During the glorious era of paper money, from 1835 to 1840, commercial houses in Europe established agencies in this country, to advance money to the planters, to secure shipments of cotton to their houses. Competition sprung up in this line of business, as in most others; and the agents advanced much more than the cotton was worth, which, on settlement, left the planters greatly in debt. These balances falling in part in the hands of the Barings, are sent over for collection; but the planters go into court under the bankrupt law, and pay off the debt at one cent to the dollar. This is all right and fair, and perfectly honorable, according to the gentleman's code of morals. But these same Barings have some bonds issued in the name of the State of Mississippi, for which she received nothing; and she is dishonored because she does not assume them.
